SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA IRON & STEEL CO. v. AMALGAMATED ASS'N OF IRON, STEEL & TIN WORKERS, GOLDEN STATE LODGE, LOCAL NO. 3, et al. (L. A. 6049.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 4, 1921.)

1. Master and servant ⇨8(1)—Workman has right to quit employment.

In the absence of contract, the right of a workman to quit his employment is as absolute as the right of a fellow employee to remain in the employment, or of another workman to take the place vacated by the one who has quit, or the right of the employer to dispense with an employee's services.

2. Conspiracy ⇨3—Striking employee peaceably may persuade fellow employee to leave position.

It is lawful for an employee who has quit peaceably to persuade a fellow employee to leave his position, and, if there are a number of employees who had left a common employer, they are within their legal rights if and when they attempt as a group to persuade other employees who continue to work to quit, provided there be no force, violence, or intimidation, physical or moral, used—that is, the mere fact of numbers does not necessarily make such persuasion illegal.

3. Injunction ⇨101(3) — May be granted where employees are intimidated by strikers.

Where violence, threats, or intimidation are used in an effort to induce another to quit his employment, then the acts of an individual or a number of individuals are unlawful, and may be enjoined, and it is not necessary to the enjoining of such acts that it be shown there was actual force or expressed threats of physical violence used.

4. Appeal and error ⇨994(3), 1012(1) — Weight of evidence and credibility of witness for trial court.

It is not the province of an appellate court to weigh the evidence nor to determine the credibility of the witnesses, but only to decide whether the evidence as matter of law supports the findings.

5. Injunction ⇨128 — Evidence held to show intimidation of employees of complainant.

In suit to enjoin union and its members, who were striking employees of complainant, evidence held sufficient to sustain findings that the union and its members entered into a conspiracy to intimidate other employees of complainant by picketing and other means, and to harass complainant in its business.

6. Injunction ⇨190—Judgment against union and striking employees held too broad in its terms.

In suit to enjoin union and its members, who were striking employees of complainant, from intimidating by picketing and other means other employees, and harassing complainant in its business, judgment held too broad in its terms, in that it prohibited acts which may or may not be unlawful according to the purpose for which they are done, and not clearly coupling the acts with the unlawful purpose.

7. Injunction ⇨101(1)—Legal picketing may not be enjoined.

In suit for injunction against union and its members, who were striking employees of complainant, placing of pickets near respondent's place of business for a purpose not at all connected with the business, and not for purpose of intimidating employees of complainant, so as to coerce them to quit, nor for the purpose of intimidating persons intending to become employees so as to prevent them from doing so, could not be enjoined, since such an act would not be wrongful as against the respondent, and would not be calculated to injure the respondent's business.

8. Costs ⇨234 — Appellants not entitled to costs on immaterial modification of decree.

Where obvious purpose of appeal in injunction suit was to obtain a positive reversal appellants were not entitled to costs of appeal because the decree was modified, but no substantial features of the decree were changed.

Barnhill & Pratt and William A. Barnhill, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by the defendants, Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel & Tin Workers, Golden State Lodge, Local No. 3, et al. (hereinafter referred to as "the union"), and the 102 individual members thereof (hereinafter referred to as "the strikers"), from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, Southern California Iron & Steel Company, a corporation, in an action to enjoin the defendants from "picketing" plaintiff's place of business, from molesting plaintiff's employees, and from otherwise interfering with plaintiff's business.

Respondent conducts a steel rolling mill at the corner of Fourth and Mateo streets in the city of Los Angeles. The union is an unincorporated association, organized in 1907. Respondent employed a varying number of the members of the union. All of the strikers were employees of respondent up to November 1, 1917. On that day a meeting of the union was called, and it was voted to quit respondent's employment. Accordingly, all of the individual appellants, who, however, did not constitute all of respondent's employees, immediately went on strike. Their places were taken by other men, not members of the union, and to these we shall hereafter refer as "the employees."

Respondent continued to operate its plant under these conditions until the commencement of this action, on or about March 1, 1918. It was alleged that on various occasions after the strike was called the strikers have been seen on the street in front and in the immediate vicinity of respondent's mill, singly, and in groups of varying size, and that on those occasions they have engaged in conversation with certain of respondent's employees. At all times, respondent, in effect, alleges, the strikers were instructed by the union thus to visit the neighborhood of the mill in order, by intimidation, threats, and, in certain instances, actual physical violence, to induce respondent's employees to leave their employment; that, in carrying out these instructions, the strikers did threaten, menace, molest, and intimidate certain of the employees, so that a number of them were induced, through fear of personal violence at the hands of the strikers, to quit respondent's employ; and that, by reason of such acts on the part of both union and strikers, respondent has been greatly hindered and damaged in the conduct of its business.

The court made findings of fact and conclusions of law. The judgment is a permanent injunction restraining both the union and the strikers from interfering with the use by respondent of its property; hindering in the manner set forth, the respondent's business; molesting, intimidating, or harassing, using any force against, or applying vile names or language of ridicule or contempt toward any employee of respondent or person seeking to enter its employ; placing pickets near respondent's place of business to induce persons to quit respondent's employ or refrain from entering it, or for any other purpose; and from going to the homes of any employees of respondent to intimidate or threaten them, or to intimidate any member of their families for the purpose of inducing them to persuade the employees to quit respondent's employ.

Appellants contend "that the evidence in this case is insufficient to sustain any of the material findings as found by the trial court." Respondent insists "That the findings have ample evidence to sustain a conspiracy and the acts done in furtherance thereof."

We shall first consider the law on this general subject as laid down in numerous authorities. The leading case in the United States is United States v. Kane (C. C.) 23 Fed. 748. There the defendants had quit the employ of the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad, and the road was suing to enjoin them from interfering with the operation of its line. Mr. Justice Brewer, in that case, said:

"I think a few preliminary considerations, in reference to the common rights which we all have as free men in this country, may not be amiss. Every man has a right to work for whom he pleases, and to go where he pleases, and to do what he pleases, providing, in so doing, he does not trespass on the rights of others. And every man who seeks another to work for him has a right to contract with that man, to make such an agreement with him as will be mutually satisfactory; and unless he has made a contract binding him to a stipulated time, he may rightfully say to such employee at any time, 'I have no further need of your services.' * * *

"Supposing Mr. Wheeler had two men employed. * * * But supposing * * * one is discharged and the other wants to stay, is satisfied with the employment, and the one that leaves goes around to a number of friends and gathers them, and they come around, a large party of them—as I suggested yesterday, a party with revolvers and muskets—and the one that leaves comes to the one that wants to stay and says to him: 'Now, my friends are here; you had better leave; I request you to leave;' the man looks at the party that is standing there; there is nothing but a simple request—that is, so far as the language which is used; there is no threat; but it is a request backed by a demonstration of force, a demonstration intended to intimidate, calculated to intimidate, and the man says: 'Well, I would like to stay; I am willing to work here; yet there are too many men here, there is too much of a demonstration; I am afraid to stay.' Now, the common sense of every man tells him that that is not a mere request—tells him that, while the language used may be very polite and be merely in the form of a request, yet it is accompanied with that backing of force intended as a demonstration and calculated to make an impression, and that the man leave, really because he is intimidated. * * *

"That is really the question here: Whether these parties went there simply, as persons have a right to do, to request engineers and trainmen to desist from further labor, or whether they went there, under the circumstances, with such a demonstration of force, with such an attitude and an air, that although nothing but a request was expressed, it was a request which men did not dare decline to comply with. The fact that half a dozen men went there and asked an engineer, or a brakeman, or a trainman, to quit—that is all right, if it was simply a mere matter of request, a mere matter of giving views and reasons. That is a part of the common right of us all. We all can express our opinions. We can go to any friend and urge him to do this or do that; that is a part of the common liberties of every man in this country; and the question is not whether these gentlemen went there in a pleasant way and stated reasons, or urged their friends to quit work, but, Did they go with such an intended demonstration of power, and in such an attitude, that though, as they have stated here, they simply requested these engineers and employees to quit, they did it under such circumstances, that the engineers and the trainmen were intimidated, and quit because they felt compelled to? * * *

"Then there is another proposition that comes in—a familiar rule of law—that where a party of men combine, with the intent to do an unlawful thing, and in the prosecution of that unlawful intent one of the party goes a step beyond the balance of the party, and does acts which the balance do not themselves perform, all are responsible for what the one does. In order to make that rule of law applicable, there must be a concert of action; an agreement to do some unlawful thing. If there is no such agreement, no such preconcert of action, why then each individual is responsible simply for what he does. Thus, for instance, if there should happen to gather here on the street 50 or 100 or 200 men, with no preconcert of purpose, accidentally meeting here, and a street fight should develop in their midst, all of that crowd are not responsible for it; that would be unjust; that would be unfair; because they did not go there, they did not meet together, with a preconcerted purpose to do anything unlawful; and, although something unlawful may be done in that crowd, yet only they are at fault who do the unlawful thing. But if they all met, as I said, for the purpose of doing some unlawful act, having formed beforehand the purpose to do it, and are present there to carry that purpose into effect, then every man, by virtue of uniting in that preconceived purpose to do the unlawful thing, makes himself responsible for what any one does."

The liability of coconspirators is thus defined in 12 Corpus Juris, 610:

"Where two or more persons enter into a conspiracy, any act done by either in furtherance of the common design and in accordance with the general plan becomes the act of all, and each conspirator is responsible for such act. This is true even though the results were not specifically intended or the means specifically agreed on."

See, also, People v. Schmidt, 33 Cal. App. 426, 445, 165 Pac. 555.

In Jordahl v. Hayda, 1 Cal. App. 696, 82 Pac. 1079, the injunction enjoined the establishment of a picket for purposes of an unlawful boycott. The court said:

"Appellants contend that the words used in the findings such as 'threats,' 'acts of intimidation,' 'interfered with,' 'driven away,' or 'prevented,' as applied to the conduct of the defendants, * * * imply force, and that 'the evidence does not warrant a finding that implies that force was used.' We do not think these words * * * imply that it was necessary to show physical force on the part of defendants toward any one. * * * While the right of free speech is guaranteed to all citizens by the Constitution, there is also guaranteed to them by the same Constitution the right of 'acquiring, possessing, and protecting property; and possessing and obtaining safety and happiness' (article 1, § 1); and it is a maxim of jurisprudence prescribed by the statute law of this state that 'one must so use his rights as not to infringe upon the rights of another' (Civ. Code, § 3514). These guarantees are equally important to and equally necessary for the protection of all classes of citizens. The difficulty in most cases is to apply the principle governing these correlated rights in particular cases as they arise."

Parkinson Co. v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 98 Pac. 1027, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, 16 Ann. Cas. 1165, was a case of a strike, a threatened boycott of the employer, and of intimidation and threatened boycott of the nonstriking employees. The late Chief Justice Beatty, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"There was no force, violence, threat, or intimidation used toward the nonunion men. * * * There was not at any time any picketing of the plaintiff's premises or interference with its customers. * * * There was * * * some evidence that in three instances individual members of some of the unions had warned some of the strikers that they would incur some danger of personal violence if they returned to work while the plaintiff remained unfair, but these threats were not authorized or countenanced by the council or any of the unions, and not a single act of violence was proved against any one who did return to work. * * *

"A conspiracy is a combination of two or more persons to accomplish by concerted action a criminal or unlawful purpose, or a lawful purpose by criminal or unlawful means, and to support the conclusion that these defendants were guilty of a conspiracy it must be held that their purpose was at least unlawful, if not criminal, or, their purpose being lawful, that they proposed to attain it by the employment of some unlawful means.

"Limiting our consideration for the present to this question of conspiracy, it is clear that the avowed object of these organizations—the several unions of workmen, and the council in which they were combined—was in no sense unlawful, and the discussion may be confined to the question whether the means proposed for its attainment were unlawful. * * *

The judgment was reversed on the ground it was not shown that the strikers had used force, violence, threats, or intimidation.

In Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, 156 Cal. 70, at page 78, 103 Pac. 324, 328, which was a case of striking employees boycotting their former employer by means of threats and intimidation, it was declared:

"It is the absolute, unqualified right of every employee, as well as of every other person, to go about his legal business unmolested and unobstructed and free from intimidation, force, or duress. The right of a labor association to strike is no higher than the right of a nonunion workman to take employment in place of the strikers. Under the assurance and shield of the Constitution and of the laws, the nonunion laborer may go to and from his labor and remain at his place of labor in absolute security from unlawful molestations, and wherever such protection is not fully accorded, not the laws themselves, but their execution, is to be blamed. In this country a man's constitutional liberty means far more than his mere personal freedom. It means that, among other rights, his is the right to freely labor and to own the fruits of his toil. Ex parte Jentzsch, 112 Cal. 468, 4 Pac. 803. Any act of boycotting, therefore, which tends to impair this constitutional right freely to labor, by means passing beyond moral suasion, and playing by intimidation upon the physical fears, is unlawful."

We quote from Martin on Labor Unions, p. 229:

"The use of force and violence is not necessary to make picketing unlawful. Intimidation is not limited to threats of violence or to physical injury to person or property. It has a broader signification, and there may also be a moral intimidation which is illegal. In the guise of picketing, strikers may obstruct and annoy others, and by insult and menacing attitude intimidate them as effectually as by physical assault."

[1-3] From the foregoing authorities these principles may be deduced: In the absence of contract, the right of a workman to quit his employment is as absolute as the right of a fellow employee to remain in the employment, or of another workman to take the place vacated by the one who has quit, or the right of the employer to dispense with an employee's services. Furthermore, it is lawful for the employee who has quit to peaceably persuade a fellow employee to leave his position. Moreover, if there are a number of employees who had left a common employer, they are within their legal rights if and when they attempt as a group to persuade other employees, who continue to work, to quit, provided there be no force, violence, or intimidation, physical or moral, used—that is, the mere fact of numbers does not necessarily make such persuasion illegal. But where violence, threats, or intimidation are used in an effort to induce another to quit his employment, then the acts of an individual or a number of individuals, are unlawful, and may be enjoined. However, it is not necessary to the enjoining of such acts, that it be shown there was actual force or expressed threats of physical violence used. It was said in Allis-Chalmers Co. v. Iron Molders Union (C. C.) 150 Fed. 155, 173, that—

"Intimidation * * * includes persuasion by or on behalf of a combination of persons, * * * resulting in coercion of the will from the mere force of numbers."

The same rule is thus stated in Martin on Labor Unions, supra:

"Even a simple 'request' to do or not to do a thing, made by one or more of a body of strikers under circumstances calculated to convey a threatening intimation, with a design to hinder or obstruct workmen, is unlawful intimidation, and not less obnoxious than the use of physical force for the same purpose."

It was found in substance that between the middle of November, 1917, and the date of the commencement of this action, the union and the strikers entered into a conspiracy with the object of compelling respondent to unionize its plant, and to grant certain other of appellants' demands; that, in furtherance of this conspiracy, appellants entered upon "a course of harassing conduct" toward respondent and respondent's employees; that appellants have stationed pickets in the vicinity of respondent's plant "for the purpose not only of inducing but intimidating the employees of plaintiff's plant to quit the plaintiff's service;" that the pickets were stationed "singly and in bunches and groups of from two to eight, and on several occasions in several different groups;" that the strikers "on several occasions used force and violence toward certain employees of the plaintiff corporation, and on numerous occasions since that time have followed various employees of said plaintiff corporation as the said employees were going to and returning from their work for the plaintiff in an endeavor to get the said employees to quit working for the said plaintiff, and in some instances have threatened said employees in an angry and threatening manner, and used threats and intimidation against the said employees, and have * * * gone to the homes of several of the employees of plaintiff corporation and intimidated and frightened the wives of certain employees, * * * and tried to get the said wives to induce their respective husbands to quit working, * * * and have * * * carried on a course of conduct which has made the plaintiff feel that injury would come to the lives and limbs of its employees at said plant;" that, in order for respondent to fulfill its obligations under "a number of contracts entered into between itself and other persons," it has been necessary "that plaintiff's plant should be run at full capacity;" that a high degree of technical skill was required of respondent's employees; that, because of the scarcity of skilled labor due to the war, it was difficult for respondent to secure and keep a sufficient number of competent employees to keep its plant running at full capacity; that ever since the middle of December, 1917, respondent has had a sufficient number of skilled employees; that appellants "threaten to continue the commission of the acts hereinafter set forth to the great and irreparable injury of the plaintiff;" and that respondent had no adequate remedy at law.

We turn now to a discussion of the evidence. C. C. Peterson, secretary of the union, testified that some time prior to the strike the union "adopted a scale of wages the same as prevailed in other coast mills, and then we endeavored to have a meeting with Mr. Stephens, the plaintiff's superintendent, * * * but he wouldn't listen;" that subsequently the union and its members agreed to continue to work until certain improvements had been installed in the mill; that on Monday, October 29, 1917, two men, Wilcox and Harris, both recently initiated members of the union, were discharged; that on the same day Stephens told appellant Dave McMills to go home, because he was drunk; that forthwith a committee from the union visited Stephens and remonstrated with him for discharging McMills, but that Stephens refused to reinstate him; that on October 31 appellant Ed Hefferline was discharged; that the union committee, headed by the witness, immediately called on Stephens and demanded that Hefferline be reinstated in his job, which, it seems, was that of foreman of the "continuous furnace," but that Stephens refused so to do, and discharged the witness; that on the next day, November 1, a meeting of the union was held, at which "a 100 per cent. vote" was taken in favor of a strike, and that the individual appellants immediately quit work; that at this meeting a motion was made and carried to the effect that any striker "caught loitering about the mill would be fined $5;" that at no time were any instructions given by the union to the strikers regarding the conduct of the strike, "except that at nearly every meeting the president admonished the men to behave themselves; * * * he never did tell them to go down and stand on the street corner;" that about two weeks after the strike began appellants discovered respondent had been "misrepresenting things" as to the cause and purpose of the strike and the amount of "government work" on hand in the mill; that at that time the rule that loiterers should be liable to a $5 fine was repealed; "some of our members were requested by us to go down to the plant * * * and see the employees * * * and tell them our side of the story," and a motion was made "withholding strike benefits from any man who did not come four times a week" to interview employees at the mill; that he himself was frequently in the vicinity of the plant from that time on; that it was understood among the strikers that no "rough stuff" was to be used—"under no circumstances were we to be anything but gentlemen;" that he could not remember all of the strikers he had seen in the vicinity of respondent's plant, but did name 33 of them; that the strikers "were told not to bunch or anything like that;" that "there was nothing said at any meeting * * * with reference to trying to get any employee * * * to quit; we simply told them our side of the story, and if they were men they would quit;" that he always approached any employee in this manner: "Beg pardon, brother, can I speak to you?" that of those employees to whom he had spoken at the mill, about 12 quit; that after November 15th the strikers used to visit the homes of various employees in order to present "the union's side of the controversy"; and that he himself, with appellants Reeves, Moses, William Kilpatrick, and several others, with that object in view, had visited the home of A. C. Nolte, an employee, in order to talk to the latter's wife; and that the only ones who quit work on November 1 were the members of the union.

On cross-examination the witness stated the strikers "always made it a point to keep separated and stand in different places;" and that his purpose in talking to respondent's employees "was to have the members of the union get back their jobs on the same terms prevailing in the other coast mills."

Peterson's testimony was corroborated by appellant Carl D. Steele, corresponding secretary of the union, who further testified that on various occasions he had reported to the union that he had talked with employees; that he never saw more than 6 strikers in the vicinity of the mill; and that, while he had "no intention or desire to injure or damage" respondent, he "thought that if I talked to plaintiff's employees * * * they would quit under those conditions."

It was stipulated that Peterson's testimony "should stand as a criterion" of the testimony of each of the 33 strikers whom he testified he had seen in the neighborhood of the mill talking to employees.

Abram C. Denman, respondent's president and general manager, testified that respondent supplied iron and steel materials to the Allies and to various domestic firms; that between November 1 and December 1 the plant could not be run at more than "a 50 per cent. capacity" because he was "unable to acquire a full crew of laborers to take the place of the strikers;" that since November 1 it would have been necessary to "keep our plant running at full capacity in order to fill all of our contracts;" that since November 1 it had been very difficult to secure skilled labor; that he had seen some of the strikers every day since the strike began, near the gate of the plant, gathering in bunches and talking to employees; that he had seen certain of the strikers—whose names he did not know—shaking their fingers at employees, and, in one instance, pulling an employee by his overcoat; that, outside of the last-mentioned case, he had not seen and did not "know of a single, solitary act of violence;" that "the delay in installing new improvements is partly the cause for the delay in getting out some of our work—some of the delay was caused by some of our men who were not as skilled or as familiar with our plant as our old employees;" and that the only orders in which respondent was "behind" were those of one domestic firm.

L. H. Bristol, "efficiency man" for respondent, testified that every day since November 1 he had seen strikers "in and around the plant—never less than eight of them;" that he frequently saw them stop employees, detain them, holding them by the coat, surround them, talking to them "with loud voices and in an angry manner and with gestures;" that on one occasion he saw appellant Ray Hill and three Armenians surround Ogonesoff, an employee, "catch hold of his overcoat," and shake their fists at him, and that "the times when I have seen the strikers gesticulating, menacing, and threatening employees of the plaintiff have been so numerous I haven't kept track of any of the dates, other than as I have testified; it occurred practically every day since I was watching the strike."

G. B. Stephens, the superintendent, and W. G. Stidson, respondent's timekeeper, corroborated Bristol's testimony. Stidson also named 14 employees who, he said, had told him they were afraid of the strikers and quit. James F. Holvey testified that when the strike began he was not a member of the union, and continued at work, but that since that time he had quit and joined the union. An affidavit given by him on January 7, 1918, before he joined the union, was read to him, in which affidavit he had stated that while he was at work the strikers' attitude toward him was threatening, and that they had told him to quit. The affidavit of A. C. Nolte was to the effect that he had had a similar experience with the strikers; that on two evenings after the strike began three of the strikers had visited his home in an automobile; that on each of those occasions they had told him they would give him just one week to quit, and that if he did not quit they would force him to do so; that on each occasion their attitude and manner were threatening, and that "by reason of these things affiant has been in fear that they would annoy and harm affiant and his wife."

Thomas W. Collins, a colored employee, testified that he had frequently seen groups of strikers in the vicinity of respondent's plant; that he had been frequently approached by various strikers and asked to "come on out and join us;" that on each of these occasions the striker was "not very pleasant about it"; that about 4 o'clock one morning 4 strikers called at his home in an automobile and had tried to persuade him to quit; that he had been "afraid they would give me a beating up and would take me some time and whale me good," but that "there never has been a particle of violence offered to me or to any one else that I know of by any of the defendants."

B. H. Duzan, an employee, testified that on one occasion appellant Peterson had approached him as he was leaving the mill and had asked him in a tone which the witness "couldn't call a friendly manner" if he didn't think "the fellow who takes another man's job is a scab." John M. Nasian, an employee, testified that on January 4, 1918, one Manoogoff, a striker, had threatened to kill him, and had only been prevented from hitting him by two other strikers. Charles Ybarra testified that he had gone to respondent's mill to apply for a job, but had not made any application because Paul Gehrke, one of the strikers, had told him to stay away, and he was afraid of him. Setrak Arekeloff, an employee, testified that on two occasions a group of strikers had visited his home in the evening and had told him that if he continues in respondent's employ "we will lick you." Hambak Kevorkoff, an employee, testified that Sam Miskinoff, a striker, had struck him in the face on one occasion when they had met in the vicinity of respondent's mill. John Sarkisoff, an employee, testified that appellant Ray Hill had threatened to cut his throat. Yervant Nalbantian, an employee, testified that on one occasion, in the Armenian Café, Manoogoff, one of the strikers, had hit him and knocked him down, and that at another time the same man had told him that if he went to work the strikers would harm him. L. Kolesnikoff, an employee, testified that Mike Avakoff, one of the strikers, had told him, "If you come to work, I kill you." George H.

Pettingill, respondent's assistant superintendent, testified that "two or three times" he had seen groups of 7 strikers standing on the street in the vicinity of respondent's mill. H. S. Debinden, Charles W. Ryder, John Anderson, Garfield Parsons, L. L. Willfong, and F. V. Marquez, all employees, testified that the strikers had not threatened them, although Marquez stated that two other employees had quit, telling him that their reason was they were afraid of the strikers. A. H. Swennerton, an employee, testified that appellant C. C. Johnson had told him he (the witness) would be branded as a "scab" and "blacklisted" if he did not quit. Ross S. Mitchell, an employee, stated that toward him the strikers' attitude was "not very friendly."

Mrs. A. H. Swennerton and Mrs. Nolte testified that "since the middle of November" groups of strikers had twice called at each of their homes and told their husbands to quit work, and that they were greatly frightened when the strikers called their husbands "scabs."

All of the above testimony was admitted on behalf of the respondent and is fairly representative of all its evidence. On behalf of the appellants, 13 of the strikers denied that any of them had ever threatened, intimidated, or committed any acts of violence toward respondent's employees. Each of them stated he had never asked any employee to quit—"it was up to them to quit." Thirteen policemen, each of whom at various times since the strike had been stationed in the vicinity of the mill, testified that, while they had seen groups of strikers accosting employees, they had never seen, as one of them put it, "anything unseemly or any wrong act on the part of any one."

[4, 5] It is not our province to weigh the evidence nor to determine the credibility of the witnesses, but only to decide whether the evidence, as matter of law, supports the findings. We think it clear from the foregoing summary of the evidence that the trial court could have found that the union and its members entered into a "combination, confederation, and conspiracy" with the design and for the purposes alleged and found. It is uncontroverted that the strike itself was the result of "a 100 per cent. vote" of the union. As to whether the union authorized the strikers to visit the neighborhood of respondent's mill, Peterson stated that a number of them were "requested" by the union to "go down to the plant and see the employees," and that a motion was made to withhold strike benefits from any man who failed to comply with this "request." Steele and each of the other strikers stated that they had been instructed by the union to frequent the vicinity of the plant and approach the employees, and that they thought that by talking to them they would quit respondent's employment; but, even if it is assumed that this was the true object, there was an abundance of evidence that in carrying out the plan the strikers used unlawful means, and this evidence amply supports the findings of threats and intimidation. As to the responsibility of the union and all its members for the acts of individual strikers, it has been shown that the strike itself was authorized and directed by the vote of the union, and at a subsequent meeting it was voted to direct the strikers to visit the vicinity of the plant in order to persuade the employees to quit. If the acts of the strikers in congregating around the respondent's mill were unlawful, under the rule governing the liability of coconspirators, each of the strikers, "by virtue of uniting in that preconceived purpose, * * * makes himself responsible for what any one does." U. S. v. Kane, supra.

It is true that the strikers stated that they did not intend to threaten or intimidate the employees, and Peterson testified that they had been cautioned not to gather in groups or act otherwise than "in a gentlemanly manner." It appears, however, from the testimony of Denman, Stephens, and Bristol that they had seen various strikers standing in groups in the vicinity of the mill acting in a threatening manner, and using opprobrious language. Moreover, there is the testimony of Stidson that 14 employees had stated to him that they would not continue in respondent's employ because they were afraid of the strikers. In addition to the happenings around the mill, there is the evidence of acts of intimidation away from the works—going to the homes of the employees, the assault on Yervant Nalbantian, and the threat to harm him if he went to work. As was said in U. S. v. Kane, supra, even conceding that strikers used no language and committed no acts calculated to coerce or intimidate the employees, nevertheless if, at the time the employees were being "politely" requested to leave respondent's service, there were strikers present in numbers sufficient reasonably to inspire a feeling of fear in the employees, then the acts of the strikers in so doing were unlawful.

Appellants make numerous specifications of insufficiency of evidence, but, in view of what we have already said concerning the proof, it is not necessary to discuss them. And for the same reason appellants' motion for nonsuit must be held to have been properly denied.

[6-8] The judgment as entered, however, is too broad in its terms, in that it purports to prohibit acts which may or may not be unlawful, according to the purpose for which they are done, and it does not clearly couple the acts with the unlawful purpose. Thus, for example, the placing of pickets near respondent's place of business for a purpose not at all connected with said business, and not for the purpose of intimidating employees of respondent, so as to coerce them to quit that employment, nor for the purpose of intimidating persons intending to become employees of respondent, so as to prevent them from doing so, could not appropriately be enjoined, since such an act would not be wrongful as against the respondent, and would not be calculated to injure the respondent's business. The judgment is not clearly expressed in other respects, and it is therefore liable to be misunderstood in the enforcement thereof if it should be violated. Consequently it should be modified in these particulars. This can be done by a direction of this court to the court below to enter a new judgment in a prescribed form. But as the purpose of the appeal obviously was to obtain a positive reversal, and the modifications to be directed do not substantially change the important features of the judgment, the appellants should not recover costs of appeal.

It is ordered that the judgment of the court below be set aside, and that on the going down of the remittitur that court shall enter a new judgment as follows:

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendants Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel & Tin Workers, Golden State Lodge, Local No. 3, Lester Moses, Charles Boniver, R. Bugundo, George Colvin, A. C. Cole, Gus Phillips, John Phillips, Caspar Russ, E. J. Redden, C. E. Tracy, Ed Hefferline, O. Hayes, Tom Huling, Willard Harn, Wm. Pilz, C. C. Peterson, Chas. Steele, Ray Hill, Chas. Moss, Riley Delaney, Pete Pogasoff, Sam Soagoff, Anan Kazzerooff, Karo Alekoff, Mike Avokoff, Joe Alekoff, John Manogoff, and each of them be and they are hereby perpetually enjoined and commanded to desist and refrain from directly or indirectly, or by any means or method doing, or attempting to do, any of the following described acts, with the intent or purpose of intimidating the employees of the plaintiff, so as to prevent them from continuing in said employment, or with the intent or purpose of intimidating persons intending to or about to enter such employment, so as to prevent them from becoming such employees, to wit: stationing or placing, or causing to be stationed or placed, on the street or elsewhere, at or near the plaintiff's place of business, any picket or pickets; or applying vile names, words of ridicule or contempt, or words calculated to excite fear, to any employee of plaintiff or to any person who may seek to enter such employment; or going singly or collectively to any home of any employee for the purpose of intimidating, molesting or threatening such employee or any member of his household, or of frightening such members so as to induce them to persuade or try to persuade any employee of plaintiff to quit such employment.

The aforesaid defendants are also enjoined from and commanded to desist and refrain from interfering or attempting to interfere in any manner with the free use, occupation and enjoyment by the plaintiff, its agents, officers, servants, and employees of any of its property and premises of any kind or nature, or hindering or obstructing or attempting to hinder or obstruct, in any manner, the plaintiff's business or any part thereof; or molesting or interfering with or intimidating or harassing any employee of plaintiff or person who seeks to enter the employment of plaintiff or using any force or violence of any kind or nature or threatening or attempting to use such force or violence against any employee of plaintiff or any person who seeks such employment, with a design to intimidate or coerce them so as to prevent them from remaining or becoming such employee.

The place of business of the plaintiff referred to consists of the establishment of plaintiff at Fourth and Mateo streets, in the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, state of California, and all buildings, structures, equipment, and property of any and every kind thereunto appertaining or belonging, including all automobiles and other personal property used in connection therewith, either at said place of business or in carrying on said business at said place; and the business of the plaintiff referred to in this decree consists of the maintenance and operation of the said establishment and conducting of the business of a steel rolling mill at said establishment and making and supplying to the trade and to the general market products of iron and steel such as the plaintiff is and has been manufacturing, handling, making, or selling at said establishment.

It is further ordered by the court that the plaintiff recover from the defendants aforesaid its costs in the sum of $475.25.

It is further ordered by this court on appeal that the appellants shall not recover their costs of appeal.

NORTHWESTERN PACIFIC R. CO. v. HUMBOLDT MILLING CO. (S. F. 9113.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 3, 1921.)

1. Easements ⇨ 12(2)—Words of inheritance or succession not necessary to grant assignable fee.

The grantee of an easement by a conveyance containing words of grant without words of succession or inheritance is entitled to transfer to another the estate conveyed to him, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1072, 1092, 1105.

2. Railroads ⇨ 72(5)—Grant of easement held to include successors.

In a grant of easement for railroad purposes, the provision, "so long as the said company [grantee] shall actually maintain, use, and operate its road upon the premises aforesaid, but not longer," held to mean so long as the said company, its successors and assigns, shall operate its road upon the premises.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; George D. Murray, Judge.

Action by the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company against the Humboldt Milling Company. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Gillett & Cutler, of San Francisco, and De los A. Mace, of Eureka, for appellant.

J. F. Coonan, of Eureka, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. On July 10, 1884, the Eel River & Eureka Railroad Company purchased from G. F. Gushaw for $600 an easement for railroad purposes over certain property described by metes and bounds. It constructed thereon its main railroad track and certain switches, all being a part of its general railway system extending from Eureka to Burnell station. From that time forward said land has been used continuously for railway purposes. G. F. Gushaw died April 22, 1894. His estate was distributed to his widow June 5, 1895. The decree of distribution contained a general distribution to the widow of all property not now known or discovered. In 1896 the defendant began occupying a portion of the right of way not needed for switches or tracks and erected a building thereon. In October, 1902, the Eel River & Eureka Railroad Company transferred all its property, including its rights in the premises deeded to it by Gushaw, to the San Francisco & Northwestern Railroad Company, which thereafter operated said railroad. On December 28, 1918, that railroad transferred its rights to the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company, which company operates a railroad from Trinidad, in Humboldt county, to San Francisco, a distance of 330 miles, occupying and using the tracks on the property transferred by Gushaw. On May 20, 1913, Rachel

T. Gushaw, widow of G. F. Gushaw, executed a deed to the Humboldt Milling Company covering that portion of the land occupied by the defendant's building. On February 23, 1915, the plaintiff brought this action to recover possession of that portion of the property deeded to it by Gushaw, occupied by the defendant's building, and to quiet title thereto. The defendant's answer consisted of a denial that either the Eel River & Eureka Railroad Company, the San Francisco & Northwestern Railroad Company or the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company, either entered upon or occupied the land sought to be recovered by the plaintiff. The answer denies that plaintiff is entitled to the possession of any part of the property described in Gushaw's deed, and denies that the defendant ousted or ejected plaintiff from the lands sought to be recovered, and denies "that the said entry and possession of defendant was or is without right or title." The answer affirmatively alleges that through mesne conveyances the defendant has acquired all of the right, title, and interest in the land and premises described in the Gushaw deed, and is the owner and entitled to possession thereof, and—

"That the said Eel River & Eureka Railroad Company has not since the 3d day of October, 1902, actually maintained and used and operated its railroad upon the premises mentioned in the said agreement."

Defendant's claim is based upon the following provision in the deed from Gushaw to the Eel River & Eureka Railroad Company: "So long as the said Company shall actually maintain, use, and operate its road upon the premises aforesaid, but not longer"—its contention being that immediately upon the conveyance made by the grantee to the San Francisco & Northwestern Railroad Company, the condition subsequent contained in the deed was breached, for the reason that thereafter the grantee no longer operated the railroad, but that its grantee thereafter operated the same. The deed upon which this controversy turns, omitting the description of the land conveyed by metes and bounds, is as follows:

"G. F. Gushaw to the E. R. & E. R. R. Co. "Know all men by these presents that I, G. F. Gushaw, of the county of Humboldt, state of California, in consideration of the sum of six hundred (600) dollars gold coin of the United States to me in hand paid by the Eel River and Eureka Railroad Company, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged do hereby grant to the said Eel River and Eureka Railroad Company the right, privilege and easement of constructing and maintaining, exclusive of any other person or persons, its track and road switches, turnouts and turntables, and of passing and repassing with its cars and rolling stock, freight and passengers, without let or hinder-ance, over and upon that certain strip or parcel of land in the county of Humboldt, state of California, bounded and described as follows, to wit: [Here follows description of 2.35 acres of land.] And being the land upon which I reside and upon the line as near as practicable surveyed by R. E. Finley in 1884 and adopted by said company as the line of its road so long as the said company shall actually maintain, use and operate its road upon the premises aforesaid but not longer.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 10th day of July, 1884. G. F. Gushaw."

[1, 2] The trial court held that the transfer by the grantee to its successor was a breach of the condition subsequent, and gave judgment for the defendant. Plaintiff appealed. We think this was an erroneous construction of the deed. Under our system it is only essential that a conveyance should use the word "grant" to convey an estate in fee simple absolute. Civ. Code, §§ 1072, 1092. Section 1092 provides statutory forms of grant, requiring only the declaration that—

"I, A, B, grant to C. D. all that real property—[describing it]. Witness my hand this [insert day] day of [insert month], 18—." Signed, "A. B."

Section 1072, Civil Code, provides as follows:

"Words of inheritance or succession are not requisite to transfer a fee in real property."

This applies as well to the grant of an easement. Section 1105, Civil Code, provides:

"When Fee-Simple Title is Presumed to Pass.—A fee-simple title is presumed to be intended to pass by a grant of real property, unless it appears from the grant that a lesser estate was intended."

"These provisions of the Code were intended to change the common-law rule not only with respect to a transfer of the fee, but of all other estates in real property." Painter v. Pasadena L. & W. Co., 91 Cal. 74, 81, 27 Pac. 539, 541.

Section 1044, Civil Code, provides:

"What May be Transferred.—Property of any kind may be transferred, except as otherwise provided by this article."

And the only restriction upon such power of transfer is contained in section 1045, Civil Code:

"A mere possibility, not coupled with an interest, cannot be transferred."

It follows that the grantee of an easement by a conveyance containing words of grant without words of succession or inheritance is entitled to transfer to another the estate conveyed to him. The deed in question is to be construed as though the conveyance was to the Eel River & Eureka Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, and there is no good reason why the condition in the deed should not be construed in the light of this fact. The deed itself authorized the grantee to convey its rights thereby acquired to others. The words "said company" in the condition subsequent should be read as applying not only to the grantee, but to its successors. The evident purpose of the grantor was to require that the property should be used for a railroad. It was certainly immaterial to the grantor who operated the railroad as long as it was in fact operated, and there is no indication in the language of the deed which justifies the conclusion that it was the intention that the rights of the grantee should be forfeited upon a transfer of the property by the grantee. There was no reference whatever in the deed to a transfer or to the rights of the grantor in case of a transfer. There was nothing said in the deed concerning the effect of the dissolution of the grantee and no indication that it was intended that the rights of the grantee should revert to the grantor upon such a contingency. The defendant states:

"If the limitation clause in the Gushaw deed had read 'so long as the said company, its successors and assigns shall actually maintain, use and operate its road upon said premises' there could have been no doubt that the estate did not cease by the transfer of the railroad to the San Francisco & Northwestern Railroad Company."

We hold that the deed should be construed as though it contained the words thus conceded by defendant to be sufficient to defeat its claim in this action.

If there is any doubt about the proper construction of the deed, the acquiescence of the heir in the transfer by the original grantee without objection to such transfer, or to the continued use and occupation of the premises by the successor to the Eel River & Eureka Railroad Company and by the plaintiff, would be a practical construction of the condition subsequent by the parties. Duryee v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 96 N. Y. 477.

Briefs were filed after the argument, and it is stated in the respondent's brief that:

"Appellant at the oral argument admitted it did not get title by virtue of deed from Gushaw and abandoned its claim under the Gushaw deed. * * *"

This statement is incorrect. It is true that the argument was directed along other lines, partly by the attitude of the court and partly by reason of the previous decision of the matter by the District Court of Appeal. The argument of the appellant was largely based upon the assumption that the court might hold that there had been a breach of the condition subsequent. By reason of the questions of the court the argument was also diverted somewhat to the question of adverse possession by the defendant. But the appeal is on the judgment roll alone, and the findings do not show either an adverse claim of title or payment of taxes by the defendant or its predecessor in interest, and hence, title by prescription was not established by defendant.

In its opening brief appellant thus states its contention:

"The transfer by the Eel River & Eureka Railroad Company of its property and rights continued in use for railroad purposes the land described in the Gushaw deed, and there was no reversion thereof."

This point has not been waived, and for the reasons above stated is correct.

Judgment reversed.

OVERSTREET v. MERRITT.
(Sac. 2765, 2875.)

Rehearing Denied Aug. 25, 1921.)

1. Evidence ☞445(1)—Parol evidence as to agreement relating to matter not covered by written contract admissible.

Where contract for a business association between the parties left open for future negotiations the matter of contribution to the capital stock, parol evidence as to subsequent agreement relating to the matter of contribution was admissible.

2. Partnership ☞120—Count held insufficient to state cause of action for prospective profits.

In action for breach of contract to enter into business, count setting up the contract, its breach and defendant's representations as to the great profits to be derived from the proposed business, without alleging that a profit might or would have resulted as represented had the contract been carried into effect, and without giving data upon which a finding of prospective profits might be based, held insufficient to state a cause of action for prospective profits.

3. Partnership ☞122½—Findings held not to warrant recovery of prospective profits.

In action for breach of contract to enter into a business association, plaintiff could not recover prospective profits, in the absence of findings as to actual or potential profits upon which to base the conclusion that he was damaged by defendant's default.

4. Partnership ☞122½—Loss of prospective profits in business contemplated by contract and damages for loss sustained by sacrifice of plaintiff's existing business cannot both be recovered.

In action for breach of contract to enter into business with plaintiff, plaintiff could not recover for loss of prospective profits which would have been earned by the contemplated firm, and at the same time recover damages sustained in sacrificing the business in which plaintiff was engaged at the time of making the contract.

5. Partnership ☞122½—Measure of damages for failure to enter into business association stated.

Where plaintiff, who had built up a profitable business in buying and selling cattle, was induced to dispose of such business at a sacrifice in order to enter into business with the defendant in another part of the country, on defendant's representations as to the prospective profits of such business, he could not, on defendant's refusal to perform and engage in such business, recover the prospective profits of such business, where such profits were largely speculative, but could, under Civ. Code, § 3300, recover the losses and expenses incurred in preparing to carry out his part of the contract, including the losses sustained in sacrificing his existing business, less the advances of money made by the defendant.

6. Partnership ☞122½—One who induces another to enter into business not liable to other for loss sustained in sacrificing previous business.

One who induces another to enter into a business association, and pursuant to the contract establishes the business and engages in the new business in good faith, is not liable to other party for loss incurred in sacrificing other business in which he was previously engaged.

7. Damages ☞22—One who violates contract in bad faith liable for all damages, including those which could not be foreseen.

Under Civ. Code, § 3333, one who in bad faith violates his contract is liable for all damages traceable to the breach, including even those which could not be foreseen at the time of making the contract.

8. Partnership ☞121—Evidence held to sustain verdict for $50,000, for breach of contract to form business association.

In action for breach of contract to enter into business association, where plaintiff had been induced to sacrifice the business in which he had been previously engaged, and which had brought him a profit of $20,000 a year, in order to enter into business with defendant, evidence held to sustain verdict for $50,000.

9. Witnesses ☞275(5) — Cross-examination as to plaintiff's earnings, following defendant's breach of contract to enter into business with plaintiff, held improper.

In action for breach of contract to enter into business with plaintiff, question asked plaintiff as to his earnings after he had re-entered business, following defendant's breach of the contract, held improper cross-examination, the matter being relevant only for the purpose of mitigation or recoupment of defendant's liability, and being a matter of defense, and the witness not having been questioned on direct examination as to such matter.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by E. E. Overstreet against Hulett C. Merritt. From judgment rendered, both parties appeal. On hearing after judgment in District Court of Appeal reversing judgment of superior court, judgment of superior court affirmed.

Pendleton & Rankin, of Los Angeles, and C. W. Pendleton, Jr. (Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Farnsworth & McClure, of Visalia, and Frank Freeman, of Willows, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. Both parties appeal from the judgment in this action. The main point in controversy is the measure of damages; neither party being satisfied with the judgment of the trial court in this particular.

The action is one to recover damages for failure and refusal of defendant to carry out the terms of a contract for a business association between the parties.

The findings cover the history of the transaction as determined by the trial court under the pleadings and evidence, as follows:

That for many years prior to about August, 1913, plaintiff was engaged in the business of buying and selling cattle at National Stockyards in the state of Illinois; that by a great expenditure of money, labor and time, plaintiff had built up a large and very profitable business, from which plaintiff made profits of $20,000 cash each year of the last three years during which he was engaged in said business, so that at the time said business was disposed of, as hereinafter found, said business and the good will thereof was of the value of $100,000. That said business was personal in its character, and that no person other than the plaintiff could take advantage of the good will or benefit thereof, and that, in the absence of plaintiff's continued personal attention, the business would become, because of such character, of no value to him; that plaintiff was at all times mentioned, and now is, unusually competent to manage the cattle business generally, and was a well-versed and thoroughly competent man, unusually fitted to manage and control the cattle business as agreed to be entered into by plaintiff and defendant as hereinafter found and stated.

That the defendant at all times from the 1st day of November, 1912, to August, 1913, represented to plaintiff that he, defendant, was anxious to enter into the business of importing cattle from other states in the United States and from Mexico into California, and of breeding, fattening, and selling the same, and of breeding and raising cattle in California, all for the purpose of sale, and of selling the same for profit. That defendant further represented to plaintiff that he, defendant, was a man of great wealth, and that he owned and possessed property of great value; that he was amply able, willing, and desirous at any time to draw and use for all the purposes of the proposed business of plaintiff and defendant large amounts of money, if plaintiff would engage in such business with defendant. Defendant further represented to plaintiff that he had for many years been seeking a man having the qualifications and characteristics that he knew plaintiff had, in order to induce such a man to become and be known to the world as his business associate during his lifetime; that plaintiff was that particular man; that defendant sought plaintiff as a business associate more because of his social and personal qualities than for the great profits he (defendant) expected to make from such proposed business association with plaintiff. Defendant further represented that he was the owner of a ranch in the county of Tulare, state of California, known as the Tagus ranch, claimed by experts to be the best and richest alfalfa ranch in the known world, consisting of about 2,800 acres of land, capable of producing an immense quantity of a superior quality of hay, all of which ranch and its products defendant promised to devote on advantageous terms to the uses of the proposed business, and that from such use large profits would be made in said business; that he owned contracts for the purchase of beet pulp in said Tulare county, from which a profit of $25,000 to $37,500 could be made each year, and that he controlled a large tract of land adjacent to said Tagus ranch from which a profit of $100,000 could be made, both of which said last-named profits and the profits and the benefits of its properties and opportunities for the making of said profits he promised to assign and turn over to the business to be organized and managed by said plaintiff. Defendant promised that he could and would, at any time plaintiff desired, furnish the funds to use as plaintiff thought best in such proposed cattle business of plaintiff and defendant. Defendant further agreed that if plaintiff would dispose of and abandon his cattle business, hereinbefore described, at once, and come to the state of California to live, and would engage in said proposed cattle business with defendant, and manage the same, that he (defendant) would furnish $100,000 in money, from his own funds, for capital to engage in said proposed cattle business of plaintiff and defendant, and would furnish for the plaintiff one-third of the said $100,000 capital, provided plaintiff would execute his note to the defendant therefor for such time as plaintiff desired, which said note would bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum; that said business should be so managed and controlled by said defendant that plaintiff should be appointed manager thereof, should receive a salary of $6,000 per year from the funds of the same, and should also receive payments in advance of plaintiff's profits from the said business, amounting to the sum of $4,000 per year, with interest at 5 per cent. per annum, until such time as the same would be repaid to the defendant from plaintiff's share of the profits of said proposed business when the same were realized. Defendant further represented to the plaintiff that, by means of the foregoing, a large business could and would be built up and operated whereby profits would be made of more than $100,000 annually.

That plaintiff believed the said representations of the defendant and that defendant intended to keep and perform the said promises and agreements so made, and, so believing and relying thereon and for no other reason, plaintiff agreed with defendant to enter into the said contract and business, and to do and perform all the things provided for plaintiff to do and perform in connection therewith, and on or about July 1, 1913, plaintiff agreed with the defendant to dispose of plaintiff's said business as best he could and in the event of failure to dispose of the same to abandon said business, if necessary, in order to enter at once into the proposed business agreement with defendant.

That plaintiff was unable to dispose of his said business hereinabove described, and in order to conform to his part of the agreement with defendant was compelled to, and did, on or about the 1st day of August, 1913, abandon the said eastern business, receiving therefor only the actual moneys invested therein and the theretofore earned profits therefrom, and because of the said representations, agreements, and promises of the defendant and the belief of the plaintiff therein, and in reliance thereon, and in order to perform his part of said proposed agreement, removed his residence from the city of St. Louis to the state of California, for the sole purpose and intention and expectation of carrying out the agreement with defendant, and that at all times since said agreement plaintiff was ready, willing, able, and anxious to in every respect perform his contract with the defendant, and at all times offered so to do.

That plaintiff often demanded that defendant perform his part of said contract, but that defendant refused so to do, and abandoned the same, and without reason therefor refused to perform any part thereof; that the promises of defendant were made and his agreement was entered into by him with the fraudulent purpose and intent not to keep the same, but for the sole purpose of inducing plaintiff to abandon and give up his home and business in the East, and of inducing him to remove to California with the hope and belief on the part of defendant that when thus deprived of his business and residence plaintiff would be compelled for a salary to assist in founding a business of farming and cattle raising for the profit of defendant and his son.

That defendant did pay to, or cause to be paid to, plaintiff the sum of $500 a month for a period of 22 months, amounting in all to the sum of $11,000, and did pay to, or cause to be paid to, plaintiff from time to time the further amount of $4,000 a year, until the amount of $5,387.46 had been paid to plaintiff in the manner agreed upon by plaintiff and defendant, and that such payments of salary and such advance payments were not made in good faith, but were made by defendant for the purpose and with the intent to deceive plaintiff and induce him to believe, and plaintiff did believe, that the same were made for the purpose and with the intent on the part of defendant to carry out said agreement between plaintiff and defendant, and with the purpose and intent by defendant to induce plaintiff to remain and conduct defendant's business for him. That because of such payments and pretense and the belief induced that defendant was delaying the commencement of said business for good cause, plaintiff did devote his time and endeavors to defendant's farming and cattle-raising business, but that plaintiff was given no personal interest in said business, and there was an entire refusal and failure on the part of defendant to carry out his part of the contract.

Most of the allegations and findings setting out the contract between plaintiff and defendant are sustained by correspondence between the parties, consisting of letters from defendant to the plaintiff, giving in considerable detail the resources and equipment of defendant by way of his alfalfa ranch, beet-pulp contract, and other facilities for producing and acquiring feed for fattening cattle, and proposing the terms on which he desired to associate plaintiff with him in the business, and urging him to dispose of his eastern business, and accept defendant's proposition. This proposal was accepted by plaintiff through a telegram to the defendant.

The only part of the arrangement left open by this correspondence was that relating to plaintiff's contribution to the capital fund of the venture. Defendant in his written proposal suggested a capital investment of $100,000, of which amount he would advance one-third for himself, and one-third for his son, the plaintiff to provide the other one-third. The telegram of acceptance from plaintiff proposed a modification of this contribution. The message was as follows:

"Letter twelfth received feeding company do not need hundred thousand east capital can arrange that later I need income until company gets going if company allows me six thousand salary for one year from June first I accept and will be there by May first I have complete confidence in you am not bartering but above is necessary wire answer."

Replying to this the defendant wired the following:

"Terms outlined your telegram March twenty second accepted and satisfactory."

[1] This was, and we think properly held by the trial court to have left open for future negotiations the matter of contribution to the capital stock, and made admissible the introduction of parol evidence as to subsequent agreement between the parties on this point.

The testimony as to the agreement thereafter reached was conflicting, but plaintiff testified, and was corroborated by other evidence, to an oral agreement that defendant would advance all the money needed, taking plaintiff's note at 5 per cent. interest for his one-third thereof, payable at such future time as plaintiff desired. In this, as in other matters of conflict in the evidence, plaintiff's testimony, if not directly corroborated by other witnesses, finds support in the representations contained in defendant's letters as to his extensive resources, and in the prolific liberality of his proposals to provide all necessary financial support and assurances of great profits from the proposed business.

Without further discussion of the evidence we think it sufficient to say that the allegations of the complaint and the findings of the court are fairly supported by the evidence as to all the representations, terms, and conditions of the contract, and as to the refusal to carry out the same on the part of defendant.

The only point open to discussion is the evidence as to damages suffered by plaintiff, and the rules of law governing the same. The plaintiff presented his cause of action on the facts as stated, in two counts, one for a recovery of damages for the loss sustained by the sacrifice of his eastern business in order to enter into the association with defendant; the other, for damages from loss of prospective profits through defendant's refusal to carry out the contract. This latter division of the complaint may be ignored. There was but one cause of action stated in either or both counts of the complaint, and plaintiff is entitled to but one recovery for the breach of the contract to be measured by the "amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom." Civ. Code, § 3300.

[2, 3] Indeed, it may be doubted if the second count states a cause of action. It sets out the contract and its breach and the representations of defendant as to the great profits to be derived from the proposed business, but nowhere alleges that a profit might or would have resulted as represented had the contract been carried into effect, nor does it give any data upon which a finding of prospective profits might be based. The findings under the second count are defective in the same way, there being no findings of fact as to actual or potential profits upon which to base the conclusion that plaintiff was damaged by the default of defendant.

[4] However, while the court made a finding that plaintiff was damaged by the acts complained of in the sum of $30,000 under the second count, no judgment was given under this finding, and had judgment been given thereon it could not be sustained in connection with a judgment on the other count, for the reason that plaintiff had but a single cause of action and was entitled to but one recovery.

For the reasons stated, plaintiff was not entitled to judgment on the second count, and we think the complaint and finding thereon may be entirely disregarded on this appeal.

The first count stated the same contract and breach thereof, with the added averments of the loss occasioned to plaintiff by reason of the sacrifice and abandonment of his eastern business at the instance of defendant, in order that he might enter into the business association with defendant.

[5] Plaintiff cannot recover the actual fruits of the business, which was never consummated. He may, however, recover damages caused by defendant's breach of his contract to establish such business. One element of that damage is that, through reliance upon his contract with defendant he was induced to incur certain losses and expenses which, while they were within his contemplation as part of his investment in the new business, have become a dead loss to him now that the business has failed to materialize.

[6] Of course, if defendant had carried out his part of the contract and established and carried on the new business in good faith, he would have assumed no liability to plaintiff for any loss incurred from the sacrifice by plaintiff of his old business, even though the new venture had proved wholly unprofitable. That was a risk plaintiff was assuming on the strength of the prospects offered by his contract with defendant of realizing the greatly increased possibilities held out to him by defendant's representations. But when defendant by the breach of his agreement deprived plaintiff of all opportunity to make good on the new venture, he became liable in damages for any loss suffered by the plaintiff as the natural result of such default, and which was within the reasonable contemplation of the parties in entering into this agreement.

The true measure of that recovery would be the amount the plaintiff would have realized under the contract if it had been faithfully carried out, less the necessary expense to him in performing on his part. But in a business of the character contemplated by the parties it is evident that the profits thereof were largely speculative. The business might have resulted in the $100,000 per year net income that defendant estimated and held out to plaintiff as an inducement to surrender his former employment and investments, or it might have resulted in an actual loss, Defendant cannot, however, on this account, after having held out these glowing assurances to the plaintiff, and after failing and refusing to allow the plaintiff an opportunity to make good on them, be allowed to avoid recompensing him both for the sacrifice of his old business, because the loss is too remote, and for the failure of profit on the new because it is uncertain and speculative. The defendant in any event should be estopped from disputing that the profits of the new business would have at least recouped the loss of the old. Cederberg v. Robison, 100 Cal. 93, 34 Pac. 625; U. S. v. Behan, 100 U. S. 338, 4 Sup. Ct. 81, 28 L. Ed. 168.

The evidence here discloses that defendant had knowledge of the nature and general extent of plaintiff's established business, and it is alleged in the pleadings and found by the court that defendant was aware that the plaintiff was sacrificing and to an extent abandoning such established business in order to accept the contract with defendant, and was indeed urging him to adopt such a course, on the representations that the assured profits of the new enterprise justified such sacrifice. The contract may be said to have been entered into with this as one of the recognized conditions, and under such circumstances the rule is well established that the loss thus sustained, and unrecompensed from the new venture because of defendant's default, is a proper element of damages in the case.

The general rule covering this class of damages is established by a very long line of decisions founded on the leading case of Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Ex. 341, 26 Eng. L. & Eq., 396, 156 Eng. Reprint 145, where it is said:

"Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect to such breach of contract should be such as would fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally; i. e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it. Now, if the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated by the plaintiff to the defendant, and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such contract, which they would reasonably contemplate, would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from the breach of contract under these special circumstances so known and communicated."

The rule in Hadley v. Baxendale has been discussed in a multitude of cases and generally followed.

What Sedgwick on Damages refers to as the leading case in this country, Griffin v. Colver, 16 N. Y. 489, 69 Am. Dec. 718, states the rule thus:

"The broad, general rule in such cases is that the party injured is entitled to recover all his damages, including gains prevented as well as losses sustained, and this rule is subject to but two conditions: The damages must be such as may fairly be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties when they made the contract, that is, must be such as might naturally be expected to follow its violation, and they must be certain, both in their nature and in respect to the cause from which they proceed."

The above case arose upon the failure of a contracting party to deliver a steam engine which he knew was to be used for a special service. It was held that the loss of profits could be recovered for the delay because the contractor had notice of the consequences that would follow. Messmore v. N. Y. Shot & Lead Co., 40 N. Y. 422; McHose v. Fulmer, 73 Pa. 365.

Sedgwick on Damages states the rule as adopted from Hadley v. Baxendale, supra, as meaning that the plaintiff may recover such damages as normally result from the breach of the contract, or he may in addition allege and show certain special facts to have been known to the defendant at the time of the contract which would give notice to him that a breach of the contract would result in an otherwise unexpected loss, and in such case the plaintiff may also recover his special loss. Sedgwick on Damages, vol. 1, § 146; Hawthorne v. Siegel, 88 Cal. 159, 25 Pac. 1114, 22 Am. St. Rep. 291.

The same author further says at section 182 of the same volume:

"Where it clearly appears that the defendant has interrupted an established business from which the plaintiff expected to realize profit, the plaintiff should recover compensation for whatever profit he makes it reasonably certain he would have realized." Barnes v. Berendes, 139 Cal. 36, 69 Pac. 491; 72 Pac. 406.

So, as was held in Ark. Val. Town & L. Co. v. Lincoln, 56 Kan. 145, 42 Pac. 706, where the defendant, wishing the plaintiff to come into a new town, with his business already established in another place, guaranteed that a railroad would come to the new town, and plaintiff accordingly abandoned his old business and moved to the new location, and because of the railroad not being built the new business was unsuccessful, it was held that he could recover for the loss in making the change, and show the profits of the former established business to prove his damages.

Likewise, where a physician abandoned his profession to become agent for the sale of a patented article, giving his entire time to it, and the contract to furnish him the article was broken by defendants, it was held that he could recover, not only the amounts he had expended in the business, but the professional earnings he would otherwise have made. Meylert v. Gas Consumers' Benefit Co. (Cir. Ct.) 14 N. Y. Supp. 148.

The fact as disclosed in the findings of the court in this case that the abandoned business is one depending for its value upon the personality of the owner does not deprive it of a value, the loss of which should be compensated. The Supreme Court of Illinois in Chapman v. Kirby, 49 Ill. 219, says:

"We all know that in many, if not all, professions and callings, years of effort, skill, and toil are necessary to establish a profitable business, and that when established it is worth more than capital. Can it be said that a party deprived of it has no remedy, and can recover nothing for its loss, when produced by another? * * * And to measure such damages, * * * what more reasonable than to take the profits for a reasonable period next preceding the time when the injury was inflicted. * * *

In the instant case we not only have the liability arising from the breach of the contract which was the consideration for the abandonment of his former business by plaintiff, but the court finds that the inducements held out to plaintiff for making his change of occupation were in bad faith, and with no intention of their fulfillment.

[7] One who in bad faith violates his contract is liable for all damages traceable to the breach, including even those which could not be foreseen at the time of making the contract. Beck v. Fleitas, 37 La. Ann. 492; Civ. Code, § 3333.

Recognizing the element of bad faith, this court has said in Kline v. Guaranty Oil Co., 167 Cal. 476, 140 Pac. 1:

"The element of bad faith would clothe a court, upon plain principles, with the power to fix damages according to the detriment shown by the existing special circumstances of the case. * * * The damages, therefore, would be those which would ordinarily and proximately follow from the breach of such a contract under the peculiar circumstances which were known to both parties."

We think the trial court in this case adopted the proper measure of damages in the absence of any means of determining the value of prospective profits of the contemplated business; this was the loss sustained by the plaintiff in preparing to carry out his part of the contract, less the advances of money shown to have been made to him by the defendant. The finding as to damages was as follows:

"That by reason of the acts of the defendant hereinbefore described plaintiff has been damaged by defendant in the sum of $50,000 over and above all sums received by the plaintiff from or through the defendant."

The court has attempted here to fix a value by way of compensation to the plaintiff upon the loss incurred by the sacrifice of his former business in entering upon the contract with defendant. We do not agree with the contention that in doing this the court is confined to the mere loss of profits for the period he was engaged with defendant. He not only sacrificed such profits for the time referred to, but obviously was placed at a disadvantage in returning to that or a similar line of business after a couple of years' absence. The value of any line of occupation depending upon the patronage of a clientèle largely gathered from the permanency and reputation of the business and its management is not limited by the yearly or monthly income. It is a capitalization of the reputation, skill, and personality of the owner, and cannot be laid down and taken up again after years of suspension without a serious loss to its earning capacity.

To reach a satisfactory determination of the loss sustained by plaintiff through the sacrifice of the business interests involved presents a very difficult problem, but the defendant, having caused the loss by his own wrongful conduct, cannot be absolved from liability because the damages are not susceptible to exact measurement. Northern Light Co. v. Blue Goose Co., 25 Cal. App. 292, 143 Pac. 540; Shoemaker v. Acker, 116 Cal. 239, 48 Pac. 62; Cederberg v. Robinson, supra, 100 Cal. 99, 34 Pac. 625.

It appears that the business in which plaintiff was engaged and which he claims to have sacrificed in order to enter upon the contract with defendant was carried on by two corporations and a copartnership. Each of these branches of the business was conducted as an association of a few individuals, and dependent for its success upon the personal efforts and ability of the members, rather than upon the investment of capital.

[8] Defendant earnestly contends, however, that it does not appear from the evidence what part of the income or of the value of the business was represented by plaintiff's stock in the corporations, and what by the personal participation of the plaintiff. It is true that the only data the trial court had to go on was the testimony as to the general character and conduct of the business, and plaintiff's annual net income from all enterprises for a series of years, which amounted to over $20,000 annually. Plaintiff sold his stock in the two corporations, on abandoning the business, and received therefor precisely the amounts of his cash investment. It is evident therefore that he suffered no loss of cash capital. Just what this amount aggregated is not shown but it is apparent that it was but a small element of the earning capacity of the business as a whole. It is fair to assume that with these conditions in view the trial court based its findings of a loss of $50,000 to the plaintiff upon the value of plaintiff's personal experience, acquaintance, and association in the business. This was a capital asset which could not be sold, and which could not in the nature of things be transferred to a new business after a lapse of two or more years. In other words, the plaintiff sacrificed, not only the proportion of the income incident to his personal connection with the old business for the two years he was in California with the defendant, but suffered the handicap of having to build up a new clientèle and patronage when he thereafter returned and started anew in the old field. The nature of his business was such that the situation may be likened to that of a lawyer or physician who, as the leading partner in a well-established firm, has abandoned this connection to enter a new business in another state. It is a fact confirmed by common experience, that if he returns to the same field after years of absence to re-enter the work of his profession, the loss from the abandonment of his established business is not compensated by making up the difference in his income for the period of his absence, but he must also face the handicap of building up a new practice. We are of the opinion that the facts in evidence here afforded a basis for fixing with reasonable fairness the detriment suffered by the plaintiff through defendant's fault, and that the amount so found is not excessive under all the circumstances of the case.

[9] The only other point raised on the appeal which we deem it necessary to refer to is the assignment of error upon the ruling of the court in sustaining an objection to defendant's query to the plaintiff as to the amount of plaintiff's net earnings in the year 1915, after he had re-entered business in St. Louis. The question was asked on cross-examination, and objection was sustained thereto, on the ground given by the court that it was not proper cross-examination. We think this ruling was correct. The matter was relevant only for the purpose of mitigation or recoupment of defendant's liability, and was a matter of defense. The witness had not been questioned on direct-examination as to this matter, and the burden was on defendant to establish such earnings by way of defense. Lally v. Cantwell, 40 Mo. App. 44, 50; Wood, Master and Servant, 245, 246; Hahn v. Mackay, 63 Or. 100, 126 Pac. 12, 991; Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362, 19 Am. Rep. 285; Gillis v. Space, 63 Barb. (N. Y.) 177.

The judgment is affirmed.

GEORGE L. EASTMAN CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION et al.
(S. F. 9624.)

Rehearing Denied Sept. 7, 1921.)

I. Master and servant $\S$ 405(4)—Finding of cause of death of autotruck driver warranted by evidence in support of compensation claim.

In a proceeding for compensation, under the Workmen's Compensation Act for the death of an autotruck driver, whose crushed body was found within the line of the trail made by the wheels of his truck, evidence held sufficient to support the finding of the Industrial Accident Commission that he was crushed to death by being run over by the truck.

2. Master and servant $\S$ 403 — Burden on compensation applicant to show injury arose out of employment.

The burden is on the applicant for compensation to show that the injury arose out of, as well as in the course of, the employment; there being no presumption that because an injury occurs in the course of an employment it arises out of or because of such employment.

3. Master and servant $\S$ 373 — Compensation recoverable for death of truck driver falling while suffering heart attack, brought on by exertion.

If the incapacity of a truck driver with heart disease to drive his truck was caused by a heart attack, brought on by exertion, sudden shock, or excitement incident to his employment on the highway, compensation may be recovered for his death by being run over after falling off.

4. Master and servant $\S$ 373—Injury, caused by disability arising solely from idiopathic condition, not compensable.

Where the proximate and immediate cause of an injury is from disability arising solely from an idiopathic or subjective condition, compensation cannot be recovered under the Workmen's Compensation Act, though the injury clearly occurs in the course of employment.

5. Master and servant $\S$ 373 — Employee's state of health incident of employment within compensation act.

The mere fact that an employee's state of health is such as to expose him to greater risks in performing his duties, or at times to incapacitate him from safeguarding himself from danger incident thereto, does not render such danger and risks less incident to the employment than if he were better able to meet them.

6. Master and servant $\S$ 417(7)—Findings on evidence in compensation case conclusive.

Where two rational conclusions can fairly be drawn from the evidence, one sustaining and the other opposing the right to compensation, the conclusion adopted by the commission is beyond the scope of review by the court.

7. Master and servant $\S$ 416 — Direct finding of ultimate fact warranting compensation held not affected by negative finding as to accident.

The commission's direct finding of the ultimate fact that the injury to deceased truck driver, who was run over by his truck, occurred in the course of and arose out of the employment, cannot be disturbed by a negative finding that "in some unexplained manner, which, however, was probably not connected with any heart or other subjective ailment, he was caused to be thrown or to fall."

In Bank.

Certiorari by the George L. Eastman Company and others against the Industrial Accident Commission and others, to review an order awarding compensation for injuries. Award affirmed.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner and Warren H. Pillsbury, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. This is an industrial accident case in which the petitioners are seeking to set aside an award of the Industrial Accident Commission on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain a finding that the injury arose from the alleged employment.

One Tylee W. Ellsworth, who was an auto-truck driver in the employment of the petitioner George L. Eastman Company, a corporation, was found dead at the intersection of Hollywood boulevard and Camino Real in the city of Los Angeles. His truck was standing at the curb of the latter street with one of the front wheels on the parking between the curb and the sidewalk.

No one witnessed the casualty resulting in his death. Enough can be deduced from the surrounding facts to clearly justify the conclusion that the deceased fell from his driver's seat and was run over by the right hind wheel of the truck. The course of the machine was plainly marked by the track of the tires for some distance back on Hollywood boulevard in the direction from which it had come.

The decedent, Ellsworth, driving the truck, in the course of his employment, had approached the place of the accident from the west on the right-hand side of the roadway. There was a slight upgrade in the direction he was driving, and his truck was loaded with decomposed granite, or gravel. At a point opposite the intersection of Martel street, which connects from the south with Hollywood boulevard, the truck had suddenly swerved to the left in a sharp curve, or at an angle of about 45 degrees, and had crossed to the opposite or northerly curb of the boulevard, where the left front wheel came in contact with the curb. The truck then proceeded easterly against the curb for a short distance, and then turned slightly out into the boulevard and continued easterly several yards until it reached nearly the center of the intersection of Hollywood boulevard with Camino Palmero, which latter street connects with the boulevard from the north. Here the truck made another abrupt curve to the left until it came to a stop at the place where found standing on the west line of Palmero street some 15 to 25 feet north of its intersection with Hollywood boulevard.

The dead body of Ellsworth was found at that point where this sudden turn of the machine into Palmero street began, and within the line of the trail made by the right-hand wheels of the truck. The body was found face down, with the head to the southeast outside the wheel marks. The back was broken, the neck was broken, the ribs were all broken on both sides, the collar bones on both sides were broken, the right arm was broken, the liver was ruptured, the lungs punctured, the pericardium was punctured, the face had abrasions of the skin.

[1] Upon the facts stated and under the authority of numerous decisions, if the claim rested upon this evidence alone, it could not be doubted that there was justification in the evidence for the findings of the Commission that "Tylee W. Ellsworth, while employed as a truck driver on June 10th, 1919, at Hollywood, Cal., by defendant George L. Eastman Company, * * * sustained injury occurring in the course of and arising out of his employment" and that "in some unexplained manner he was caused to be thrown, or to fall from the seat of the truck he was driving, and crushed to death under the wheels of the truck." Certainly, in the absence of any other plausible or probable explanation, it might legitimately be inferred from all the circumstances given that the accident arose from some of the natural contingencies attendant upon the driving and operation of the truck. Western Grain, etc., Co. v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 136, 159 Pac. 423; Robinson v. Western States Gas & Elec. Co., 194 Pac. 39; Pacific Portland Cement Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., S. F. No. 9152 (writ of review denied); Rosenberg v. Ind. Acc. Comm., S. F. No. 9269 (writ of review denied); Sparks Milling Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 293 Ill. 350, 127 N. E. 737; Meyers v. Mich. Cent. R. Co., 199 Mich. 134, 165 N. W. 703; Heileman Brewing Co. v. Shaw, 161 Wis. 443, 154 N. W. 631. In the industrial accident cases above cited in which writs of review were denied by this court, employees were found dead with no witnesses to the accident, but there were traumatic injuries inferentially attributable to the employment, with no proof of other cause of death.

The autopsy in this case, however, disclosed that, while the decedent had been in apparently good health, and neither he nor his family or employers had any knowledge or premonition to the contrary, he was afflicted with a chronic myocarditis, a disease of the heart of long standing, and which the physicians stated was a condition which, while the subject might not know there was anything wrong with him, might at any time cause him to faint or cause sudden death.

While the evidence discloses that on this particular morning of the accident the decedent was in apparently vigorous health and in good spirits, and there is an entire absence of direct evidence of any effects from heart trouble, the petitioners insist that an attack of heart failure affords the only rational or plausible explanation for the loss of control of the truck and the falling from the driver's seat by the decedent. Even so, this inference cannot be carried so far as to discredit the finding that the cause of death was from being run over and crushed by the truck.

Here was an obvious, palpable traumatic cause of death. There is no doubt but that the injury was inflicted, and that it was of a nature to cause immediate death. The mere possibility or even probability of the occurrence of an attack of heart failure cannot defeat the conclusion reached by the Commission that the truck caused the death, arising from the fact that the employee was alive and active a few minutes before the accident, and that when found dead he had just been run over and crushed by a heavily loaded automobile truck.

The evidence of the physicians is no doubt conclusive of the fact that Ellsworth had a diseased heart. Their opinions that he did or did not die from this affliction are of little value, for they are agreed that there was nothing divulged by the autopsy to indicate that death was from heart failure, and they are agreed that the injuries received from his being run over by the truck were such as would cause instant death.

The witness Dr. Wagner, whatever other possibilities he may have suggested, testified that he offered as his opinion at the autopsy that death was caused by a fracture of the cervical vertebrae in an automobile accident. Dr. Southworth, assistant medical director of the Industrial Accident Commission, answering a hypothetical question giving the subjective conditions of the disease of the heart, and the traumatic results of the injuries from the automobile, stated:

"I would say that these findings [as to the automobile injuries] so far overshadow the findings in the heart as to the cause of death, that it would be a larger percentage in favor of those conditions as causing death."

The only pretense of any basis for the theory that the decedent either fainted or died from heart failure while on the truck is the fact that his chronic condition was such that he was liable to such an attack, and that there is no other satisfactory cause shown for the erratic movements of the decedent's truck and for his falling therefrom.

It was, moreover, a fair deduction from the evidence that the decedent was at least in physical control of the truck up to the moment he fell off and attempting to guide it on its course. Both the surrounding conditions and the testimony of automobile experts indicate that every turn of the car from the time it left its due course opposite Martel street until its final turn into Palmero street must have been caused by manipulation of the steering wheel and of the gas throttle. Each turn was against the course of gravity. It was uphill to the north curb of Hollywood boulevard. The natural course of the car after running alongside the curb would have held it curb-bound. The turnout toward the center of the street was toward a higher point, and the final swerve into Palmero street indicated a sudden turn to the left and still uphill. It is, moreover, doubtful, had the driver been dead or inanimate at the time he fell from the truck at this final turn, if he would have fallen under the wheels. The driver's seat is well to the front of the machine on the right-hand side, and it is argued that the conditions were such that in falling inertly the body would have landed well without the track of the wheels in this abrupt left-hand turn, and that it would only be by catching hold of the side of the machine in falling one would be thrown beneath the wheels.

Neither is there any evidence to justify a conclusion that death was the result of the fall itself. True, the decedent's neck was broken and there were some abrasions on his head and face, but the testimony shows that the machine ran over the body from about the waist to the neck, both collar bones being crushed, and this offers a much more probable explanation of the broken neck than would follow from the effects of the fall.

We are satisfied, therefore, that the finding of the Commission that decedent was crushed to death by being run over by the truck cannot be disturbed.

[2, 3] This brings us to the debatable question on the appeal. What was the proximate cause of the death? The injuries from being run over by the truck were the immediate cause, but if, as claimed by petitioners, a fainting spell brought on by the condition of the heart, or any other subjective disability, not arising from the exigencies of decedent's employment as a truck driver, apparently or presumptively was the cause of his fall under the machine, can the award be maintained in the absence of evidence of some other effective cause arising from the employment?

It must be conceded that the burden is upon the applicant for compensation to show that the injury arose out of as well as in the course of the employment; and there is no presumption, as contended by respondents, that because an injury occurs in the course of the employment it arises out of or because of that employment.

It is quite evident that if decedent had not fallen from the truck he could not have been run over by it, and it is contended, on behalf of petitioners, that the fall is the proximate cause of the injury, and must be shown to have some causal connection with the employment to justify compensation in this case.

There is no direct evidence as to what caused the fall from the truck. But, excluding the theory that it was caused by a heart attack, as we have already stated it may be reasonably inferred that the driver lost his balance or was thrown out by some casual or inadvertent jolt or jar incident to the traffic of the highway or the abrupt movement of the truck, there are only two theories of the cause of the erratic movements of the truck that would seem to support a legal inference. One is that on entering the intersection of Martel street, where the first sharp turn to the left was made, decedent thus suddenly diverted the course of his truck to avoid some vehicle coming into Hollywood boulevard from the south, and that after righting his car after running into the curb on the north side of the boulevard, and starting to regain his position on the right side of the roadway, he was confronted by another car from the east, and made the quick turn into Palmero street to avoid a collision, and was thereby thrown out. The only evidence aside from the known exigencies of automobile traffic to support such theory is the fact that at a point about opposite where decedent was killed the fresh tracks of an automobile skidding under set brakes were discovered.

It must be confessed, however, that the erratic movement of the truck, and the absence of any direct evidence of physical conditions on the road to account for it, would strongly suggest the probability that the driver was suddenly incapacitated to intelligently steer his truck, and that its irregular course and the consequent fall was at least contributed to by this condition of the driver.

Even conceding this to be the case, it does not necessarily follow that the accident cannot be attributed to the employment. If the disability, although arising from a chronic heart trouble, was brought on by any strain or excitement incident to the employment, the industrial liability still exists. Acceleration or aggravation of a pre-existing disease is an injury in the occupation causing such acceleration. Fennah v. Midland, etc., Ry., 4 B. W. C. C. 440; Peoria Ry. Terminal Co. v. Industrial Board, 279 Ill. 352, 116 N. E. 651; Bradbury on Work. Comp. 385; Elliott's Work. Comp. Act (7th Ed.), 9; Fisher's Case, 220 Mass. 581, 108 N. E. 361; In re Madden, 222 Mass. 487, 111 N. E. 379, L. R. A. 1916D, 1000; In re Brightman, 220 Mass. 17, 107 N. E. 527, L. R. A. 1916A, 321. It can hardly be doubted under this rule that if decedent's incapacity to drive his truck was caused by a heart attack brought on by exertion or sudden shock or excitement incident to his employment on the highway, recovery could be had.

[4] Where, however, the proximate and immediate cause of the injury is from disability arising solely from an idiopathic or subjective condition, the weight of authority, including the decisions of this state, are against recovery, though the injury clearly occurs in the course of employment. Brooker v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 176 Cal. 275, 168 Pac. 126, L. R. A. 1918F, 878, citing Van Gorder v. Packard Motor Car Co., 195 Mich. 588, 162 N. W.

It will be noticed in all of these cases the injury or death was the direct result of a fall induced by some subjective condition of the injured party, and without any intervening or contributing cause connected with the employment.

Thus in Brooker v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra, the decedent was working on a scaffold 39 feet from the ground. He fell, and died from the result of the fall. He was subject to epileptic fits. It was held that the probable cause of the fall was an epileptic fit, and that this was the proximate cause of death.

[5] In the case before us it must be remembered that the cause of the fall, if accompanied by a heart attack, was the result of such heart trouble, combined with the irregular movement of the truck in suddenly being turned from its course, and that the immediate cause of death was not from the fall, but resulted from being run over by the truck.

There is nothing to indicate that the heart attack would have proved fatal, or that it entirely incapacitated the driver, or that the fall produced serious injury, or that the decedent would not be alive at the present time, if it had not been for whatever combination of circumstances brought him under the wheels of the moving truck, the instrument of his employment, after falling or being thrown from his seat.

A case very closely in point sustaining respondents' rights in the premises is Carroll v. What Cheer Stables Co., 38 R. I. 421, 96 Atl. 208, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 346. The facts are very closely parallel with the facts here. A hack driver while engaged in his employment was presumed to have suffered an attack of dizziness or unconsciousness, induced by hernia, hardening of the arteries, and Bright's disease. There was evidence tending to show that his horses, being thus out of control, ran against the curbstone, and the driver was thrown out and injured. The court held that the evidence did not show that the fall was caused solely by the workman's diseased condition, but was contributed to by the subsequent movements of the vehicle running into the curb, and that the accident was one arising out of the employment. Such was the precise condition here. Mr. Justice Shaw, in the opinion of this court in Brooker v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra, reviewing the case just cited, recognizes the distinction between that and the Brooker Case, which we have pointed out as applicable here. Although the unsafe movement of the team was apparently caused by the driver's illness, it was the subsequent lurching of the cab that at least contributed to the fall.

The case of Wicks v. Dowell, L. R. (1905), 2 K. B. Div. 225, goes further in sustaining industrial accident liability in such cases than is warranted under the decisions in this state, but we quote from that case the reasoning on which a distinction is made between the immediate and remote cause of the injury as connecting it with the employment.

In the case cited the deceased was seized with an epileptic fit while standing on a wooden stage in a ship close to the hatchway. By reason of the fit he fell into the hold and was injured by the fall. The court held that, while the cause of the fall was the fit, the cause of the injury was the fall that was incident to the employment over this open hatchway. In the case before us the alleged heart trouble may have caused the driver to lose intelligent control of the truck, but this was not the immediate cause of the injury, but only a contributing cause, and the reasoning of the court in the Wick's Case is peculiarly applicable to the conditions here. The court says:

"Then did the accident arise out of the man's employment? When we get rid of the confusion caused by the fact that the fall was originally caused by the fit and the confusion involved in not dissociating the injury, and its actual physical cause from the more remote cause, that is to say, from the fit, the difficulty arising from the words 'out of the employment' is removed. How does it come about in the present case that the accident arose out of his employment? Because by the conditions of his employment the workman was bound to stand on the edge of what I may style a precipice, and if in that position he was seized with a fit he would almost necessarily fall over. If that is so, the accident was caused by his necessary proximity to the precipice, for the fall was brought about by his necessity for his standing in that position. Upon the authorities I think the case is clear; an accident does not cease to be such because its remote cause was the idiopathic condition of the injured man; we must dissociate that idiopathic condition from the other facts, and remember that he was obliged to run the risk by the very nature of his employment, and that the dangerous fall was brought about by the conditions of that employment. I think, therefore, that the present case comes within the purview of the Workmen's Compensation Act. * * *

"Cozens-Hardy, L. J. I agree, and have little to add. It seems plain to me on the authorities that what happened here was an 'accident.' It is also plain, and indeed is not contested, that the accident happened in the course of the employment; the only difficulty is whether it arose 'out of the employment'; on the whole I am of opinion that it did. If I could adopt the view that has been pressed upon us, that the employer is not liable for the remote consequences of a disability which the workman brings with him to his work, I should come to a different conclusion; but I think the truer view is that a man always brings some disability with him; it may be a disability arising from age; it may be of some other nature. A workman who is put in a dangerous position in order to do his work is more liable to an accident by reason of the disability which he brings with him than he would otherwise be. Again, an old man is inherently more likely to meet with an accident than a young one, but an employer could not excuse himself on the ground of the man's age. The same consideration applies to a tendency to illness or to a fit; and if a man with such a tendency is told to go to work in a dangerous position, and there meets with an accident, the accident none the less arises out of his employment because its remote cause is to be found in his own physical condition."

The mere fact that the employee's state of health is such as to expose him to greater risks in performing his duties, or to at times incapacitate him from safeguarding himself from dangers incident thereto, do not render such dangers and risks any less incident to the employment than if the employee were better able to meet them in safety.

As is said in Hartz v. Hartford Faience Co., 90 Conn. 539, 97 Atl. 1020:

"By the terms of our Compensation Act compensation is not made to depend upon the condition of health of the employee, or upon his freedom from liability to injury through a constitutional weakness or latent tendency. It is awarded for personal injuries 'arising in the course of and out of his employment' and for an injury which is a hazard of that employment."

As Chief Justice Rugg points out in re Madden, 222 Mass. 487, 111 N. E. 379, L. R. A. 1916D, 1000:

"It is the hazard of the employment acting upon the particular employee in his condition of health, and not what that hazard would be if acting on a healthy employee."

Whatever predisposing physical condition may exist, if the employment is the immediate occasion of the injury, it arises out of the employment, because it develops within it.

[6] Under the construction of the law as we have stated it, even if it appears that an attack of dizziness or unconsciousness from heart trouble was a contributing cause to the accident, the finding of death from injuries arising from the employment finds support under the evidence. It is only where there is such an entire absence of evidence as renders the findings of the Commission unreasonable or in excess of its powers that this court is empowered to set aside its findings. Work. Comp. Act, § 67b, Stats. 1917, p. 875; Walker v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 177 Cal. 737, 171 Pac. 954, L. R. A. 1918F, 212; Cardoza v. Pillsbury, 169 Cal. 106, 145 Pac. 1015.

In denying an application for a hearing in Roebling's Sons Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 36 Cal. App. 15, 171 Pac. 987, this court has said that where two rational conclusions can fairly be drawn from the evidence, one sustaining and the other opposing the right to compensation, the conclusion adopted by the Commission is beyond the scope of our review. The law and the facts of this case present such a condition.

[7] Petitioners complain of the insufficiency of the finding as to the source of the injury resulting in the employee's death, in that the Commission in its finding recite that death was caused "in some unexplained manner, which, however, was probably not connected with any heart or other subjective ailment, he was caused to be thrown or to fall." This by itself would be an inadequate finding that the injury arose from the employment, but in addition to this, as is elsewhere quoted in this opinion, the Commission expressly found that the injury occurred "in the course of and arising out of the employment." This negative statement, therefore, as to the unexplained manner of the happening and the probable absence of heart failure cannot disturb the direct finding of the ultimate fact.

The award is affirmed.

LESSER V. NEW YORK LIFE INS. CO.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 17, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 15, 1921.)

1. Death ⚡4—Proof of absentee's contact with peril unnecessary.

In order to establish the death of an insured who has been missing for less than the necessary seven years which would raise a presumption of death under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 26, it is not necessary that the plaintiff produce evidence that the alleged decedent came in conflict with some specific peril to his life, and hence it could not be said as a matter of law that there was no evidence of death where insured, who was affectionate and very attentive to his wife, and had property of a net value of $23,000, with an income of $750 a month, disappeared from a bathing beach leaving his clothes in a bathroom.

2. Death ⚡2(3)—Evidence that absentee was seen admissible to rebut presumption of death.

Where action is brought to recover under an insurance policy based on the presumption of death of missing insured, insurer can show, to rebut plaintiff's case, that insured was seen after the supposed date of his death.

3. Death ⚡4—Circumstantial evidence sufficient.

It is competent in an action on a life insurance policy to prove from circumstantial evidence the fact and exact date of death of insured.

4. Insurance ⚡543—Proofs of loss held sufficient under life policy.

Where insured disappeared while on bathing beach, proofs of loss as required by policy were sufficient where beneficiary submitted numerous affidavits setting forth the facts constituting circumstantial evidence of the death, which facts later she showed to the trial court, which ruled that they were sufficient evidence of death.

5. Appeal and error ⚡882(7)—Party asking suspension of ruling on admission of evidence cannot complain of court failing to make formal ruling.

In an action on a life insurance policy, where defendants objected to the proofs of loss being read in the presence of the jury, and it was stipulated that the court might read the same and determine whether they were sufficient, defendant could not complain on an appeal that the trial court omitted to make a formal ruling on the admission of the proofs of loss, such proofs being sufficient, and no valid objection appearing as being made to the papers, and the case being conducted as though the proofs had been formally admitted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Alice Lesser against the New York Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Meserve & Meserve, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. F. Clark and W. R. Law, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover on a certain insurance policy. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and from a judgment entered thereon the defendant has appealed.

Emil Lesser, the husband of the plaintiff, was last seen at Venice, Los Angeles county, on the 2d day of November, 1915; at that time he was within a few feet of the bathing house where he was accustomed to go in bathing two or three times a week. In her complaint the plaintiff alleged that death occurred November 2, 1915, and the proof which she introduced to substantiate her allegation consisted wholly of circumstantial evidence. The plaintiff and the insured were married in 1896 at Birmingham, in the state of Alabama. In 1912 they removed to California, and at the time of the disappearance of the insured the family was residing at a house on East Adams street. At that time the family consisted of the husband and wife, a daughter, the wife's niece, and her nephew, and Mr. and Mrs. Minnis. During their married life the husband's conduct towards his wife was very affectionate and very attentive. He left the house in the morning at about 8 o'clock daily, and returned home about 6 o'clock in the evening. The wife was an invalid, and her husband remained at home during the evenings, excepting such evenings as he went to lodge. He was a member in good standing of the Masons, the Elks, the Odd Fellows, and the Knights of Pythias. In Birmingham he had been a member of the Press Club, and had also been a member of the police commission. At the time of his disappearance he owned equities in properties in Alabama and Los Angeles of a net value of $23,000, and one of the properties in Los Angeles, the Hotel St. George, was paying him net about $750 a month. He had been in the habit of going to Venice once or twice a week to take a bath. During the forenoon of the 2d day of November he left the hotel saying that he was going to the beach, and, later in the day, he was seen within a few feet of the bath. At that time he was dressed in his street clothes, and was talking and laughing with another man. After that he was never seen again, but during that evening his clothes, underclothes, hat, shoes, stockings, and jewelry were found in one of the bathrooms. Thereafter the plaintiff, her attorney, and Mr. Minnis made inquiries, not only in and about Los Angeles, but in various states of the Union, and no trace could be had of the insured. The plaintiff notified the insurance company of the death as early as January 12, 1916, and the case was not brought on for trial until nearly three years thereafter.

After the discovery of the personal effects in the bathroom, much publicity was given in the newspapers regarding the disappearance of the insured. Although the bodies of drowned persons are generally drifted to the shore, no body came ashore that was identified as being the body of the insured.

The foregoing facts stand in the record without conflict, although there are some other matters in the record concerning which there is conflicting testimony. The principal question presented by the briefs is as to the sufficiency of the foregoing evidence to support the judgment.

[1, 2] It is statutory in California that a person not heard from in seven years is presumed to be dead. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 26. Neither of the parties to this case contend that the rule so stated is exclusive. However, the appellant claims that he who would bring his case within a shorter period must produce evidence to the effect that the alleged decedent came in contact with "some specific peril to his life." The respondent, on the other hand, claims that the true rule is contained in the leading case, Tisdale v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 26 Iowa, 170, 176,

96 Am. Dec. 136, 138, where the Supreme Court of Iowa states the rule otherwise, and illustrates the reason for the rule as follows:

"An honored and upright citizen, who, through a long life, has enjoyed the fullest confidence of all who knew him—prosperous in business and successful in the accumulation of wealth, rich in the affection of wife and children, and attached to their society, contented in the enjoyment of his possessions, fond of the associations of his friends, and having that love of country which all good men possess, with no habits or affections contrary to these traits of character—journeys from his home to a distant city and is never afterward heard of. Must seven years pass, or must it be shown that he was last seen or heard of in peril, before his death can be presumed? No greater wrong could be done to the character of the man than to account for his absence, even after the lapse of a few short months, upon the ground of a wanton abandonment of his family and friends. He could have lived a good and useful life to but little purpose, if those who knew him could even entertain such a suspicion. The reasons that the evidence above mentioned raises a presumption of death are obvious; absence from any other cause, being without motive and inconsistent with the very nature of the person, is improbable."

To the same effect are Cox v. Ellsworth, 18 Neb. 664, 26 N. W. 460, 53 Am. Rep. 827; Boyd v. New England M. L. Ins. Co., 34 La. Ann. 848; Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Stevens, 71 Fed. 258, 261, 262, 18 C. C. A. 107; Lancaster, Adm'r, v. Washington Life Ins. Co. of N. Y., 62 Mo. 121; Coe v. National Council, K. & L. of S., 96 Neb. 130, 147 N. W. 112, L. R. A. 1915B, 744, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 65; Harvey v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 200 Fed. 925, 119 C. C. A. 221; Fidelity Mut. Life Ass'n v. Mettler, 185 U. S. 308, 319, 22 Sup. Ct. 662, 46 L. Ed. 922; Rogers v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 138 Cal. 285, 71 Pac. 348; Western Grain, etc., Co. v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 135, 159 Pac. 423.

As stated in the Tisdale Case, the facts there enumerated tend to show the probability of death. However, if the person at the time he was last seen was a fugitive from justice, was a bankrupt, or from other causes it would be improbable that he would be heard from even though alive, then no inference of death will be drawn. Such was the conclusion of the court in Ashbury v. Sanders, 8 Cal. 62, 68 Am. Dec. 300; Nelson v. Masonic Mut. Life Ass'n, 57 App. Div. 214, 68 N. Y. Supp. 290; Groff v. Groff, 36 App. D. C. 560; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Sheppard, 85 Ga. 751, 12 S. E. 18, 39; Garden et al. v. Garden's Executrix, 2 Houst. (Del.) 574, 579; Modern Woodmen v. Ghromley, 41 Okl. 532, 139 Pac. 306, L. R. A. 1915B, 728, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1063. The very nature of such cases is to the effect that the weight of the evidence is a question for the jury. Succession of Vogel, 16 La. Ann. 139, 140, 79 Am. Dec. 571; Smith v. Knowlton, 11 N. H.

191, 197. And the Tisdale Case, supra, was reversed because the trial court gave an instruction which determined the weight of the evidence, which was the peculiar province of the jury. 26 Iowa, 170, 96 Am. Dec. 136, 139. It has been expressly ruled in cases where the evidence was not as strong as in this case that there was sufficient evidence to take the case to the jury, and that it could not be said, as a matter of law, that there was no evidence of death. Cox v. Ellsworth, supra; Lancaster v. Washington Life Ins. Co. of N. Y., supra; Coe v. National Council, K. & L. of S., supra; Rogers v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., supra; Western Grain, etc., Co. v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 135, 138-140, 159 Pac. 423. If, after the plaintiff had introduced the evidence above recited, the defendant had been able to show that the missing husband had been seen after the supposed date of death, such fact would have been admissible as rebutting the plaintiff's case. Springmeyer v. Sovereign Camp, W. of W., 144 Mo. App. 483, 129 S. W. 273, 277. However, in this case, no such claim is made.

[3] Many exceptions by the appellant as to the admission of evidence are contained in the record; but all of the objections are disposed of by what we have just said to the effect that it is competent to prove by circumstantial evidence the fact and exact date of death. The jury having found for the plaintiff on the evidence which she introduced that her husband was dead, it had the right to find, and did find by its general verdict, that the husband died November 2, the day on which he was last seen. Harvey v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 200 Fed. 925, 928, 119 C. C. A. 221.

[4] The ruling regarding the admissibility of evidence in such cases also disposes of the contention of the appellant that the plaintiff did not submit proofs of loss. The appellant admits that she submitted numerous affidavits, but the contention of the appellant is that the affidavits contain ex parte statements of only such facts as she developed at the trial, and that such facts did not prove, nor tend to prove, the death of the plaintiff's husband. However, we have ruled against the appellant as to the probative effect of the facts proved by the plaintiff, and it follows that her proofs of loss were sufficient. In other words, she was entitled to make her showing to the defendant by affidavits setting forth the same facts which later she showed to the trial court.

[5] The appellant also makes a point on the fact that the trial court did not formally announce that the proofs of loss were admitted in evidence. The record with reference to that matter shows that the first witness called was the plaintiff. Shortly after she had taken the stand the proofs were handed to the witness. She identified them, and identified a letter written by her attorney, Mr. Clark, as being copies of the papers which had been transmitted to the defendant April 6, 1916. It was stipulated that the same were received by the defendant about April 14, 1916. Thereupon, Mr. Clark was about to read the papers to the court in the presence of the jury, when Mr. Meserve, attorney for the defendant, objected to the same being read in the presence of the jury, because the jury might be unable to confine the papers and the contents thereof as being proof solely of the fact that proofs of death had been made, but might also use the contents of the ex parte affidavits as being evidence of the fact of death, etc. Thereupon the papers were handed up to the judge presiding at the trial, and the attorneys stipulated that he might read the same, and if he found the papers sufficient the trial court might thereafter state to the jury that the proofs had been made as of date April 6, 1916.

The record does not show that thereafter the trial court made the formal statement which had been contemplated; neither does the record show that either counsel asked the trial court to do so. All of the papers are in the record and all of them are regular in form and are very full and complete in view of the peculiar facts of this case—they cover 25 pages of the printed transcript. Thereafter the case was conducted in all respects as though the proofs had been formally admitted. The defendant's attorney asked its witnesses many questions regarding the defendant's copy of the proofs. The day before the case was submitted to the jury the papers were marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit 3, filed December 11, 1918. H. J. Leland, Clerk, by A. B. Yorba, Deputy." The court's ruling having been suspended on the request of the attorney for the defendant, and no valid objection appearing as being made to the papers, and the papers being free from any objection, if one had been made, we think that the appellant may not now be heard to complain that the trial court omitted to make a formal ruling on the admission of the proofs of loss.

No error has been called to our attention. The judgment is affirmed.

SHAW v. UNION ESCROW & REALTY CO.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 3, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 4, 1921.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇐351(8) — Negligence held to constitute "bad faith" on breach of contract to convey.

It is not necessary, in order to establish "bad faith," within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 3306, permitting the recovery of damages for loss of bargain in case of bad faith, that the vendor be shown to have refused to go on with the transaction because of some gain which would accrue to him; it being sufficient that he refused to convey, where through his own negligence he has put it out of his power to fulfill the obligations of his contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Bad Faith.]

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇐349—Complaint in action for damages for breach held sufficient.

Complaint, in action for damages for breach of contract to convey land, was sufficient to warrant recovery of damages by reason of bad faith under Civ. Code, § 3306, where it alleged the making of the contract, the breach, the value at the time of the breach, and that the defendant, "without any just cause or just excuse," refused to make conveyance of the property.

3. Pleading ⇐406(1) — Defect in pleading waived by failure to demur.

If a complaint is imperfect in any respect, the defect is waived, where there is no demurrer and the parties proceed throughout the trial with the evident view that all of the issues adjudicated are properly before the court.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⇐350 — Evidence sufficient to justify finding of bad faith in refusing to convey.

In an action for damages for breach of contract to convey land, evidence held sufficient to justify finding that conduct of defendant in refusing to perform its contract amounted to bad faith within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 3306, permitting recovery of difference between value and contract price in case of bad faith.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Frank L. Shaw against the Union Escrow & Realty Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeals, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Haas & Dunnigan and Bordwell & Mathews, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bicksler, Smith & Parke, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This action was brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff because of breach of contract to convey real property. There was a judgment in plaintiff's favor, and defendant has appealed therefrom.

On the 5th day of June, 1919, defendant, then being the owner of two certain lots of land, entered into a written contract with the plaintiff whereby it agreed to sell and plaintiff agreed to buy the property. The purchase price as fixed by the contract was the sum of $1,500 and was made payable $200 upon the execution of the contract, the remainder in sums of $20 (or more) with interest monthly, the installments to be payable on the 5th day of each month after the date of contract. The plaintiff made the initial payment on the 5th day of June in the year mentioned; he made the further payment on July 5th of $20, and on the 5th day of August, 1919, tendered the third payment of $20, which defendant refused to accept. Thereupon, or within a few days, the plaintiff made a tender of the entire remainder of the purchase price agreed upon, and demanded a conveyance of the property, which demand was refused. Defendant's refusal to comply with its agreement was based upon the following facts: On May 26, 1919, an employé of the defendant, who was duly empowered to act in that manner, wrote a letter to a firm of real estate agents, authorizing them to sell the same property, which was later bargained for by the plaintiff. The letter written to the agents authorized them to "sell on or before thirty days from date" the property therein referred to and contained a statement that a commission of 5 per cent. would be paid for their services. It seems that the employé who had the preliminary negotiations with the plaintiff respecting the sale of the same property was not advised of the fact of the sending of this letter. However, the court found that on "about" June 10, 1919, the agents referred to notified defendant that they had sold the lots in conformity with the terms of the letter of authorization. On the 21st of June, 1919, the general officers of the defendant corporation executed the deed to the purchaser produced by the agents. At the time the deed was made the employé of defendant who prepared the deed had no actual knowledge of the existence of the contract made with plaintiff. It was between August 1 and August 14, 1919, that this employé communicated the facts regarding the sale to the employé who had dealt with plaintiff. It appeared in evidence, and the findings express the fact, that the price obtained through the real estate agents was not as much as that agreed to be paid by the plaintiff, the difference being about $300.

The defendant offered to pay back to the plaintiff all moneys delivered to it by him before the action was commenced. At the trial the plaintiff produced evidence showing that between the date of his contract and the date of the breach committed by defendant there had been a large increase in the value of the property, and the court found that on the 14th day of August, 1919, being the date when the plaintiff was advised that defendant would not fulfill its contract, the property was of the value of $7,000 and there was ample evidence to sustain that finding. The judgment was computed accordingly, by the making of required deductions, leaving the sum of $5,907, which plaintiff was held to be entitled to recover. This recovery was allowed under the finding that defendant had shown bad faith. Section 3306, Civil Code, provides as follows:

"The detriment caused by the breach of an agreement to convey an estate in real property, is deemed to be the price paid, and the expenses properly incurred in examining the title and preparing the necessary papers, with interest thereon; but adding thereto, in case of bad faith, the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate agreed to be conveyed, at the time of the breach, and the expenses properly incurred in preparing to enter upon the land."

[1] The main contention of the defendant in its attack upon the judgment is that a case of bad faith was not shown, and that the measure of plaintiff's recovery was limited to such sums as had been paid on account of the purchase price, together with interest thereon. Under the evidence presented to the court it appears that the subordinate employees of defendant corporation who participated in the two transactions, to wit, that with plaintiff and that with the real estate firm, had within their control means of ascertaining exactly what had been done by either with respect to the property, and the case as made out is one of the clearest kind of negligence shown to have been committed in negotiating the sale of the property in question to two different parties at the same time. By the appellant the suggestion is made that the letter to the agents constituted a valid option to purchase of prior date to the contract with the plaintiff. We have already characterized that letter as an agent's authorization to sell, and it can be called nothing more. Whether it amounted to an authorization giving the exclusive right to sell to the particular agents it is not necessary to decide, as it would not add any weight to appellant's position. Not only was it lacking in sufficient terms to constitute it an option, but no consideration was paid for it. The contract with the plaintiff was executed, and the initial payment of $200 made several days before the defendant had any notice from the agents that a purchaser had been secured by them. As we understand the law, it is not necessary, in order to establish bad faith within the meaning of section 3306, Civil Code, that the vendor be shown to have refused to go on with the transaction because of some gain which would accrue to him. It is sufficient if he refuses to convey, where through his own negligence he has put it out of his power to fulfill the obligations of his contract. It has been characterized as an anomaly in the law of damages which prevents a vendee under a contract for the purchase of real property from collecting in all cases full compensatory damages, which would ordinarily and naturally include damages for what is termed "loss of bargain"; the accepted rule being that a person is entitled to have in damages the worth of that which would have been rendered him under full performance of the contract. Placing contracts to convey realty in an exceptional class, very early cases, notably that of Flureau v. Thornhill (2 Wm. Bl. 1078), determined, as expressed by Chief Justice De Gray, that:

"Upon a contract for a purchase, if the title prove bad and the vendor is (without fraud) incapable of making a good one, I do not think that the purchaser can be entitled to any damages for the fancied goodness of the bargain which he supposes he has lost."

Considerable difficulty was encountered in subsequent decisions in reconciling the holding there announced with different facts presented, and the effort to so distinguish the cases seems not to have been always successful. The exceptional rule is justified on the reason given as that a vendor who contracts to convey a good title in the future, and who is unable to make such title clear, notwithstanding his best efforts so to do, should not be held for damages other than those which will return to the opposite party the purchase money paid, together with interest; and within the limitations of that reason the rule should find its scope. A full discussion of the history of the law may be found in any of the standard works on damages. See Joyce on Damages, vol. 3, § 1728; Sedgwick on Damages (9th Ed.) vol. 3, § 1002; Sutherland on Damages (3d Ed.) vol. 2, § 578. We find no decisions in this state which have directly adjudicated the matter from the angle presented here. The cases of Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 307, 27 Pac. 280, 25 Am. St. Rep. 123, and Clark v. Yocum, 116 Cal. 515, 48 Pac. 498, in some degree of inference support the conclusions herein expressed. A case closely in point is that of Sweem v. Steele, 5 Iowa, 352. The court there said:

"If the person selling is honest, and is prevented from making the conveyance by unforeseen causes, and which he could not control, the plaintiff should recover only nominal damages. * * * But if the person selling is in default, and either *did or should have known that he could not comply with his undertaking; * * * or, having the title, at the time of the agreement, afterward disables himself from completing it, by a sale to a third person; or, at the time of the agreement, knew he had no title—in these, and in all cases where the inability arises from fraud in the covenantor, the purchaser should recover substantial damages, including compensation for any actual loss, as by the increased value of the land to the time the contract should have been executed*" (citing cases).

To our mind the code provisions have added nothing to the law already established when it is declared that in case only of bad faith on the part of the vendor damages may be recovered because of profits which might have accrued to the purchaser.

[2, 3] Appellant makes the further contention that the complaint in the action did not state facts sufficient to present the issue as to the bad faith of defendant. The complaint did allege the making of the contract, the breach thereof, the value of the property at the time of the breach, and that the defendant "without any just cause or just excuse" refused to make conveyance of the property. We think that the complaint was sufficient, and that it tendered all of the issues which were passed upon by the court. If it was imperfect in any respect, the defect was waived by the reason that there was no demurrer to the complaint, and the parties proceeded throughout the trial with the evident view that all of the issues adjudicated were properly before the court. We find no error to justify a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank
Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [4] The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division 1, is denied.

We are not prepared to accede to the unqualified statement that gross negligence is the equivalent of bad faith as that term is used in section 3306 of the Civil Code. In this case, however, the court below made a finding:

"That the defendant acted in bad faith in refusing to carry out its contract with plaintiff and to convey said property to plaintiff on August 14, 1919, and in having conveyed said property to R. M. Goodman on June 21, 1919, without making in said conveyance provisions for the protection of plaintiff's rights in said property secured to him under the contract of June 5, 1919."

Upon looking into the evidence in the case we are satisfied that there was sufficient therein to justify the trial court in finding that the conduct of the defendant in so refusing to perform its contract with the plaintiff amounted to bad faith within the meaning of that term as used in said section 3306.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. RINDGE CO. et al. (two cases). (Civ. 3533, 3533½.)

1. Eminent domain ☞167(3)—Viewer method of condemning land for highway not exclusive.

Pol. Code, §§ 2681-2698, describing a method whereby counties may condemn land for highways, are not exclusive, and the county is not, in view of sections 2643 and 4041, restricted to the viewer method prescribed in sections 2681, etc., but may condemn by action instituted on resolution of the board of supervisors.

2. District and prosecuting attorneys ☞0—County attorney may consent to increase of compensation for land condemned.

Where there was an error in the computation of the compensation to which the landowner was entitled on condemnation, the county attorney acting as such may consent to an increase.

3. Eminent domain ☞66—Necessity for appropriation not subject of judicial cognizance.

When the use is public, the question of the necessity of appropriating any particular property is not a subject of judicial cognizance, but is one which appertains to the legislative branch of the government, and may either be exercised by the Legislature or such subordinate bodies to which by legislative grant the power is intrusted.

4. Eminent domain ☞167(2)—Property owner allowed compensation cannot question method provided by Legislature.

Where property owner is accorded his right to compensation secured by Const. art. 1, § 14, he cannot question the procedure or instrumentalities provided by the Legislature for acquiring his property.

5. Eminent domain ☞67 — Property owner cannot question statute making determination as to necessity conclusive.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1241, providing that before property can be taken by condemnation it must appear that the use to which it is to be applied is a use authorized by law, and that the taking is necessary, provided that, when the legislative body of the county shall by resolution adopted by two-thirds of its members determine that the public interests and necessity require the acquisition, such resolution or ordinance shall be conclusive evidence of public necessity, that the property is necessary, and that the proposed improvement is in the manner which will be most compatible with public will, is not open to attack, on the theory that the question of necessity is judicial in its nature, by a property owner whose right to compensation under Const. art. 1, § 14, was secured.

6. Eminent domain ☞262(5)—Landowners not prejudiced by ruling on finding of necessity.

Although the court in the first instance ruled that the finding of the board of supervisors as to the necessity for condemnation of land for road was sufficient prima facie showing, yet where the court thereafter heard evidence which established the necessity, the owners were not injured.

7. Trial ☞419—Denial of nonsuit immaterial where defect is later overcome.

An order denying a motion for nonsuit will not be disturbed, though the evidence at the close of plaintiff's case was such that it might properly have been granted, where the defect was later overcome.

8. Highways ☞20—Power of county to condemn for road cannot be denied because there was no corresponding road at the county line.

The power of a county to condemn land for a highway through a large ranch cannot be denied because at the county line there was no corresponding highway, but the terminus of the road was in the ranch; there being no such restriction on the county and the question of necessity being for the board of supervisors.

9. Appeal and error ☞1040(6)—Sustaining of demurrer to answer harmless, where all defenses raised were allowed to be presented.

The sustaining of a demurrer to an answer is harmless, where all of the defenses raised were disposed of and defendants given abundant opportunity to introduce evidence thereon.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Two actions of eminent domain by the County of Los Angeles against the Rindge Company, a corporation, May K. Rindge, and others. From judgments for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 174 Cal. 743, 164 Pac. 633; 200 Pac. 32.

Anderson & Anderson and Nathan Newby, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, and Paul Vallee, Chief Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The above-entitled actions were instituted by the county of Los Angeles to condemn certain lands described in the complaints therein for use as highways. In each case an interlocutory judgment as prayed for was rendered for the plaintiff, followed by a final order of condemnation, from which judgment and order so rendered in each case the defendants therein have appealed.

In the first above entitled case, and which appellants designate the "Main Road" case, the action was to condemn a strip of land from a public highway at a point on the southeasterly boundary line of the Malibu ranch, and through said ranch for a distance of some 20 miles or more to the westerly boundary line of Ventura county, at which point the proposed road terminated upon private land. In the other action, No. 3533½, it was sought to condemn land for a lateral highway beginning at a point on the proposed "Main Road" and running thence easterly to the east boundary line of the Malibu ranch and terminating likewise upon private lands owned by one Decker, which highway appellants designate as the "Alisos Canyon Road." The questions involved in each case are the same, and the grounds upon which appellants base their claim for a reversal are identical.

In both cases the proceedings were instituted by a resolution adopted ex parte and without a hearing accorded defendants by the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county. Omitting the description, the resolution initiating the proceeding as to the "Main Road" case (that adopted in the other being of like form and effect) is as follows:

"Whereas, the public necessity and interest of the people of the county of Los Angeles do require that a certain highway be constructed in said county over and across those certain parcels of real property hereinafter described, and for that purpose and for such public use it is necessary that those certain pieces or parcels of real property hereinafter described be acquired by said county by condemnation, namely, the following described property located in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, to wit: [Description of 40-foot right of way strip, and also of some 146 side parcels.] * * * Excepting so much of said land as is now included within any public highway, alley or lane.

"Further reference is hereby made to said county surveyor's map No. 8070, on which the location of all parcels of land herein described is accurately shown.

"Now, therefore, be it resolved, and it is the finding and determination of this board, that the public interest and necessity require the acquisition by the county of Los Angeles of those certain pieces or parcels of land hereinbefore described for a public purpose, namely, for public highway purposes, and for the construction and completion of a public highway thereover; and

"Be it further resolved, that those certain pieces or parcels of land hereinabove described be condemned for a public purpose, namely, for a public highway and the construction and completion thereof, and the county counsel of the county of Los Angeles is hereby directed to institute proceedings in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Los Angeles for the condemnation of those certain pieces or parcels of real property hereinabove described for public highway purposes and to take all steps necessary for the condemnation of said pieces or parcels of land in the name of said county" —in accordance with which the county counsel instituted the actions for the condemnation of the parcels of real estate described therein. Demurrers interposed by the defendants to the complaints were overruled.

[1] Appellants insist that such rulings constituted fatal error for the reason that the powers conferred by law upon the board of supervisors to establish public highways are those only embodied in sections of the Political Code numbered 2681 to 2698, inclusive, which procedure therein prescribed is designated the "viewer" method and not infrequently adopted by counties in acquiring lands for highways; hence the resolutions of the board of supervisors authorizing the condemnation suits were not sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the trial court, from which fact it follows that all proceedings had pursuant to such resolutions were void, including the commencement of the actions and the judgments and orders appealed from. It is unnecessary to enter upon an extended discussion of appellants' voluminous brief and argument in support of this point. Suffice it to say the identical question, involved in the case of Adamson v. County of Los Angeles, reported in 198 Pac. 52, was decided adversely to appellants by the District Court of Appeal for the first district, and a transfer of the case denied by the Supreme Court. In that action Adamson, as a taxpayer, set forth in his complaint the proceedings had and taken by the board of supervisors in the acquisition of the property in question, and, insisting the entire proceedings for condemning the same were unauthorized and void, sought to have the county enjoined from proceeding with construction work in the "Main Road" case. In deciding the case the court said:

"The provisions of article 6 of chapter 2 of title 6 of the Political Code, comprising sections 2681 to 2698 thereof, do not purport to be exclusive, and may not be held to be so, in view of the express grant of power embodied in subdivision 4 of section 2643 above quoted, and of the even more comprehensive enumeration of the general permanent powers of boards of supervisors contained in section 4041 of the Political Code by which such boards are expressly authorized 'to acquire and take by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise land for the uses and purposes of public roads, highways and so forth.'"

The contention of appellant in the Adamson Case was identical with that here urged, the argument of appellant there was identical with the argument made in the instant cases, and the adverse decision of the court in that case must be deemed determinative of the same question presented in these appeals.

[2] Another alleged erroneous ruling upon which appellants claim a reversal is that the court, upon defendants' motion for a new trial, denied it upon terms, the effect of which was an exercise by the court of the functions of the jury, by reason of which defendants were deprived of the constitutional right of having a vital element of damage determined by the jury. It appears that, among other things, the jury found it would require 29 miles of fencing to fence the Rindge Company's land along the roadway, and that the cost per mile would be $650, aggregating the sum of $18,850. On motion for new trial one of the specifications of error was that the jury improperly determined the number of miles of fencing which would be required, and it being made to appear to the court that, instead of 29 miles, as found by the jury, it would require 31½ miles, the cost of which would be $1,625 more than that found by the jury, the court, as a condition of its order denying the motion for a new trial, made an order requiring that plaintiff consent to the increase in the judgment, whereupon counsel for plaintiff filed a written stipulation consenting to such increase in the amount of defendants' compensation, and thereupon the court made its order denying the motion for new trial. Upon the same contention, based upon the same facts and supported by the same argument made by the same attorneys, the court in the Adamson Case, supra, held that in an action by a county for the condemnation of land for a public highway the county counsel, as attorney representing the county, has authority on a motion for a new trial to consent to an order increasing the amount of compensation awarded to the defendant by the verdict of the jury due to an error in computing the amount of required fencing of defendant's land along the roadway.

In support of its case plaintiff offered in evidence the resolution, copy of which is hereinbefore set out, together with a minute entry of the board, showing that it was adopted by a vote of more than two-thirds of the members thereof. Thereupon plaintiff rested, and defendants moved for a nonsuit. The motion was denied, and the ruling is assigned as error.

[3-5] Section 1241, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that before property can be taken by condemnation it must appear:

"1. That the use to which it is to be applied is a use authorized by law; 2. That the taking is necessary to such use; provided, when the legislative body of a county * * * shall by resolution or ordinance, adopted by vote of two-thirds of all its members, have found and determined that the public interest and necessity require the acquisition, * * * by such county * * * of any * * * public improvement, and that the property described in such resolution or ordinance is necessary therefor, such resolution or ordinance shall be conclusive evidence; (a) of the public necessity of such proposed * * * public improvement; (b) that such property is necessary therefor, and (c) that such proposed * * * public improvement is planned or located in the manner which will be most compatible with the greatest public good, and the least private injury."

Since the resolution declaring the land necessary for the proposed highway was adopted by a two-thirds vote of the members of the board of supervisors, it must, as provided by the statute, be accepted as conclusive evidence of the necessity for taking the property, unless, as claimed by appellants, that as so construed it is unconstitutional. This contention is based upon the claim that the determination of the facts so found by the resolution were in their nature judicial, and since the action of the board in adopting the resolution was had ex parte and without notice or hearing given to appellants, the effect of the judgment based thereon was to deprive them of their property without due process of law. That the purpose for which the property was sought to be condemned is a public use admits of no question. Section 1238, Code Civ. Proc. When the use is public, the necessity of appropriating any particular property therefor is not a subject of judicial cognizance, but one which appertains to the legislative branch of the government, and the right to so appropriate may be exercised by the state or such subordinate bodies to which by legislative grant the power is intrusted. See Lewis on Eminent Domain (3d Ed.) §§ 369, 595, 596; Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, p. 777; Secombe v. Railroad Co., 90 U. S. (23 Wall.) 108, 23 L. Ed. 67; Miss., etc., Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, 25 L. Ed. 206; Water Works Co. v. Burkhart, 41 Ind. 364; Lamb v. Schottler, 54 Cal. 319; Wulzen v. Board of Supervisors, 101 Cal. 15, 35 Pac. 353, 40 Am. St. Rep. 17; and People v. Smith, 21 N. Y. 595; all of which are authorities in support of the proposition that, in the absence of constitutional provisions so requiring it—and there are none in this state—the Legislature may delegate to the boards of supervisors of the counties of the state the power to determine ex parte by resolution, as in the instant cases, the necessity for taking property for public use, and make such resolution conclusive evidence of the facts enumerated in section 1241, Code of Civil Procedure. In Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, page 760, it is said that—

"A legislative act declaring the necessity, being the customary mode in which that fact is determined, must be held to be for this purpose 'the law of the land,' and no further finding or adjudication can be essential, unless the Constitution of the state has expressly required it."

And at page 777 of the same work it is said that, while the question of necessity may be referred to a local tribunal or submitted to a jury to decide upon evidence, "the parties interested have no constitutional right to be heard upon the question, unless the state Constitution clearly and expressly recognizes and provides for it." People v. Smith, supra, is authority for the statement that—

The Legislature "may allow the owner to intervene and participate in the discussion before the officer or board to whom the power of determining whether the appropriation shall be made in a particular case, or it may provide that the officers shall act upon their own views of propriety and duty, without the aid of a forensic contest. The appropriation of the property is an act of public administration, and the form and manner of its performance is such as the Legislature shall, in its discretion, prescribe."

In the case of Board of Water Commissioners v. Johnson, 86 Conn. 151, 84 Atl. 727, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1024, the court said:

"But the respondents urge that they have never had the opportunity to be heard upon the question of necessity, and that for that reason there has not been due process of law. They were not entitled to such opportunity. It is well settled that, as related to the exercise of the power of eminent domain, all questions which are political in their nature and lie within the legislative province may be determined without notice to the owner of the property affected, and * * * the owner is not entitled to a hearing upon it as a matter of right."

In Wulzen v. Board of Supervisors, supra, it is said:

"The determination as to whether or not the right of eminent domain should be exercised and as to what lands are necessary to be taken in the exercise of that right, is a political and legislative question, and not a judicial one. Its determination rests exclusively with the Legislature, or with such subordinate legislative bodies as it may be properly devolved upon, and the question of whether the exercise of the power is wise or not is one with which the judicial department has no concern."

Property is held in private ownership subject to the right of the state in its sovereign capacity to take it for public use; the only restriction upon such right being that—

It "shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having first been made to, or paid into court for, the owner." Section 14, art. 1, Const.

Hence, where the owner of land sought to be condemned by the state for a use declared by law to be a public use is accorded his constitutional right to compensation for the taking, he cannot question the procedure or instrumentalities which the Legislature has provided as a means for acquiring the property. Its motives or reasons for declaring that it is necessary to take the land are no concern of his. In our opinion, the provision of section 1241, Code of Civil Procedure, making the determination of the board of supervisors of the county conclusive evidence of the necessity for taking the land for a public highway, is not obnoxious to any provision of the state or federal Constitution.

[6, 7] However this may be, and contrary to the views herein expressed, the trial court agreed with defendants' contention that the resolution was not conclusive evidence of the facts so found, but did admit it as a sufficient prima facie showing of such facts, and upon this theory denied the motion for nonsuit. Thereupon, and after the denial of their motion, defendants were given the widest latitude in offering a mass of evidence for the purpose of showing there was no necessity for the proposed highway, followed by plaintiff, which, in rebuttal, introduced a vast deal of evidence, likewise touching the question of necessity for the improvement. Indeed, it appears from the voluminous record that no restrictions whatsoever were imposed upon either party in the introduction of evidence touching the question. Under these circumstances, and assuming the court erred in accepting the resolution even as prima facie evidence, nevertheless we cannot perceive how defendants were prejudiced by the circumstances, since the testimony which according to appellants' theory, should have been produced during plaintiff's presentation of its case in chief was later in the trial supplied. The error is predicated solely upon the order in which the evidence touching the question was admitted.

"It is well settled that an order denying a motion for a nonsuit will not be disturbed, although the evidence at the close of plaintiff's case was so weak that it might properly have been granted, if upon the trial the defect is overcome by evidence subsequently introduced." Peters v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 48, 116 Pac. 400; Lowe v. San Francisco, etc., Ry. Co., 154 Cal. 573, 98 Pac. 678.

Since both parties were permitted, after the ruling upon the motion, to introduce evidence, without restriction, touching the question of necessity, defendants could in no event have been prejudiced by the ruling.

[8, 9] As a separate defense the defendants May K. Rindge and Rindge Company alleged that all of the property which plaintiff sought to condemn was within the boundaries of the Malibu ranch in Los Angeles county; that while the ranch was owned in severalty by May K. Rindge and the

Rindge Company, it was, and had been for more than 20 years, with the knowledge of plaintiff, operated as a single ranch under one management and control; that the westerly end of said proposed highway terminates at and upon the boundary line between Los Angeles county and Ventura county upon the Malibu ranch, which, as owned by defendants, extends into Ventura county for a distance of ——— miles, all of which is managed, operated, and controlled by said defendants with the lands of said ranch so located in Los Angeles county; that there is no public road of any kind or character whatever within — miles of the Ventura county end of said ranch, and the only means of egress and ingress to the westerly terminus of said proposed road is by private trails and ways; that said proposed road or highway, if condemned, would be located wholly and solely upon that part of the Malibu ranch situated in Los Angeles county, and would end and terminate upon private property of the Rindge Company at the Ventura county line, and as constructed would give access wholly and solely to the private ranch property of defendants May K. Rindge and Rindge Company, and could not furnish any way of necessity or convenience to the general public; that the owners of said ranch have no need or desire for a public road thereon, which, if constructed, would be a constant menace and damage to their ranch property; by reason of which facts it is alleged the taking of said property for the purpose contemplated would be without necessity of any kind or right. Upon the grounds and for the reason that all of the matter so alleged as a separate defense was irrelevant, immaterial, surplusage, and conclusions of law, plaintiff moved to strike the same from the answer. This motion was granted, and appellants assign the ruling as error. Counsel for appellants insist the special defense so pleaded was upon the theory that an isolated road within the boundaries of what is practically one property and not desired by the owners thereof, and which could afford no real service to any part of the public as a road, could not possibly be a public necessity for which condemnation would lie. While this contention is fully answered by the fact that the resolution was conclusive evidence of the taking being necessary, nevertheless, conceding such theory warranted by the alleged facts, it appears that every material issue tendered by the so-called separate defense was not only raised by the complaint and the answers thereto, but that in the trial thereof defendant, without objection or restriction, was accorded every opportunity, of which it availed itself, in offering evidence touching every matter contained in the pleading so stricken out by order of the court. There was no error in the ruling, but, conceding as much, it is impossible to perceive how defendants, under the circumstances, could have suffered any prejudice by reason thereof.

It appears that while the eastern terminus of the main road connected with a public highway, the western terminus thereof was at the boundary line separating Los Angeles county from Ventura county, at which point it connected with no road extending into or connecting with roads in said last-named county, and that the Alisos canyon road, likewise extending from the proposed main road to the boundary line common to the Malibu ranch and the lands of one Decker, was not connected with a highway; and, basing their contention upon these facts, appellants insist that the board of supervisors had no power to lay out highways terminating at county lines or points on private lands which did not connect with or intersect other highways affording means of continuous travel. There is no merit in the contention. No such restrictions upon the power of counties to establish highways are imposed by statute, and to hold that a county could not condemn lands for a highway to the line of another county unless there existed an established highway in such latter county with which to connect its proposed road would obviously lead to embarrassment and difficulty in establishing highways from one county to another. Rice v. Rindge, 53 N. H. 530.

The use for which the property was sought to be condemned is declared by section 1239, Code of Civil Procedure, to be a public use. The resolution adopted by a vote of two-thirds of the members of the board of supervisors not only vested the court with jurisdiction of the proceedings for condemnation, but when received in evidence the finding and determination of the board as therein expressed, to the effect that the taking of the parcel of land described in the complaint was necessary for such public use and the proposed improvement located in the manner most compatible with the greatest public good and least private injury, was conclusive evidence of such facts; hence, while not prejudicial, any evidence touching such issue of necessity or hearings had before the board of supervisors other than the resolution was immaterial. In no event, and from whatever angle the facts are viewed, are we able to perceive how defendants' substantial rights were prejudiced by any ruling of the court during the trial.

The judgments and orders are affirmed.

Eminent domain —244—Final judgment of condemnation of land for highway justifies possession by public.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1254, it is proper for the court, after final judgment of condemnation, to make an order allowing the county to take possession of land desired for the construction of a highway.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

SHAW, J. In a proceeding against defendants for the condemnation of a strip of land for use as a highway, the plaintiff had an interlocutory judgment, followed by a final order and judgment condemning the property. Thereafter, under and in accordance with the provisions of section 1254, Code of Civil Procedure, the court made an order under and by virtue of which plaintiff was authorized to take immediate possession and use of the property, from which order defendants have appealed.

In the case of Adamson v. County of Los Angeles, reported in 198 Pac. 52, the plaintiff therein, alleging the order was void, sought to have the county enjoined from the prosecution of work in the construction of the road. From an adverse judgment rendered by the superior court, Adamson appealed. The Court of Appeal held the order was valid, and that no ground existed for the attack made thereon. The determination of the court there had must be deemed decisive of the question. Upon the authority of the decision in that case and what is said by this court in an opinion this day filed in County of Los Angeles v. Rindge Co. et al. (Civil No. 3533), 200 Pac. 27, the order appealed from is affirmed.

Where an open account for goods sold was due subject only to the vendor's promise that he would take acceptances payable at such future dates as should be agreed upon, and a large part of the goods were furnished with the additional understanding that the purchaser would procure his wife's signature to the acceptances, her signature thereto was not without consideration, since, if it had not been furnished, the vendor would have been entitled to demand immediate payment of the account.

3. Bills and notes ☞1 — Trade acceptances within rules governing bills of exchange.

There is nothing in Federal Reserve Act, § 13, or in the regulations made thereunder by the Federal Reserve Board, changing the character of trade acceptance as bills of exchange, and they are within the rules, under Civ. Code, §§ 3089 and 3219, that a draft may be signed by the acceptor before the name of the drawer is filled in, that a drawer may be any one whom the acceptor may accept as such, and that a negotiable instrument may be drawn payable to the order of a payee who is not a maker, drawer, or drawee.

4. Husband and wife ☞159—Wife's guaranty not obtained by fraud because of her misunderstanding of the effect.

A wife's guaranty of trade acceptances executed by her husband was not obtained by means of fraudulent representations, though she believed that the placing of her signature on the back of the acceptances was a mere formality, required of her as the acceptor's wife and because of her interest in the community, where the party taking the acceptances made no such representations to her and had no part in the conversations by which she was induced by her husband to give him the use of her name.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by C. C. Stafford against Edwin F. Hill and wife. From a judgment in favor of the defendant Frances B. Hill, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

J. Vincent Hannon, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Herbert Cutler Brown, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. In this action the complaint states three causes of action separately on three several bills of exchange, and a fourth cause of action on an account for merchandise sold by the plaintiff to the defendants. By reason of bankruptcy proceedings pending against the defendant Edwin F. Hill, prosecution of the action against him was stayed, and the case proceeded to trial to determine the liability of defendant Frances B. Hill. Judgment having been entered in her favor, the plaintiff appeals therefrom.

The defendants are husband and wife. The complaint alleged that at all times mentioned therein the defendants were associated together and engaged in the dairy business, conducting said business under the fictitious name of "Arden Dairy, Certified." Upon sufficient evidence the court found that Mrs. Hill was not interested or associated in the said dairy business; that her only relation thereto was that which a wife ordinarily has in the business affairs of her husband; and that the merchandise sold and delivered, as set forth in the findings, was sold and delivered to the defendant Edwin F. Hill only. The goods sold and delivered which are represented in the open account set forth in the fourth cause of action were so sold and delivered between the 18th day of November and the 6th day of December, 1918. The defendant Frances B. Hill never received any of said goods, and never at any time agreed to pay therefor. The judgment in her favor, so far as that cause of action is concerned, is fully justified.

Prior to November, 1918, the plaintiff, who was then engaged in the hay and grain business, was selling to Edwin F. Hill, and delivering from time to time at the Arden Dairy, hay and grain supplies. By agreement between them, the account was settled from time to time by agreed balances, for which accepted bills of exchange were executed by Hill, payable at such future times as were then mutually agreed upon between them. These were in the form known as "trade acceptances." On or about the 6th day of November there were two outstanding acceptances which had been issued in the early part of October, each for the sum of $1,088.81, not then due, together with an outstanding open account for goods delivered. Thereupon, and at that time, it was agreed between the plaintiff and Hill that Hill should have his wife sign the future trade acceptances with him. Mrs. Hill was not present at the making of this agreement, nor was the same made known to her. This agreement having been thus made, the plaintiff continued to furnish merchandise to Hill, so that on November 23, 1918, there was owing from Hill on the open account the sum of $2,594.82 for goods furnished from the 30th day of October to the 17th day of November.

At that time the plaintiff presented to Hill a statement of this account, together with two unsigned trade acceptances, each dated November 23, 1918, each for the sum of $1,297.42. The second and third counts of the complaint are based upon these two acceptances. One of these was made due on December 20, 1918, and the other on January 5, 1919. In both of these the name of the drawer was left blank. In each of them, in the space provided for the name or names of the drawee, were typewritten the words "Arden Dairy Cert.," and, underneath, the words, "Edwin F. Hill—Frances B. Hill." Hill having signed these bills as acceptor, they were also signed, at his request, by his wife as acceptor. Hill did not explain to Mrs. Hill the intent or meaning of her signature, or discuss the matter with her other than to ask for her signature. Each bill was in the form of a draft, in which were written the words, "The obligation of the acceptor arises out of the purchase of goods from the drawer." At the top of each paper were the words, "Trade Acceptance." After these acceptances were delivered to the plaintiff, he wrote on one of them his own name as drawer, and caused the name of "Nicholls-Loomis Co.—J. E. Loomis, Sec.," to be placed on the other bill as drawer thereof. This was done by the secretary of that company, to which the plaintiff was then indebted. Thereafter the Nicholls-Loomis Company assigned and transferred said acceptance to the plaintiff. The Nicholls-Loomis Company had not, in fact, sold any merchandise to Hill, but had only made sales to the plaintiff. The obligation evidenced by said acceptance arose out of merchandise furnished by plaintiff alone to Hill. Frances B. Hill did not at any time purchase goods or merchandise from the Nicholls-Loomis Company, or owe it any money (unless she became indebted by reason of her signature to said acceptance). The placing on said acceptance of the name or signature of Nicholls-Loomis Company as the drawer thereof was without the knowledge of defendants, or either of them. The plaintiff was not present when defendant Frances B. Hill wrote her name across the face of said acceptances of November 23, 1918, nor at the interview between defendants concerning the same. It was found by the court—

"That defendant had never, before the placing of her signature upon the face of the said two acceptances of date November 23, 1918, signed any notes or bills of exchange or commercial paper for or with her husband, save on a few occasions when she had signed notes secured by mortgages; that she was not familiar with banking or commercial usages; that she believed that the placing of her signature upon the trade acceptances was a matter of formality required of her as the wife of defendant Edwin F. Hill, because of her interest in the community property; that she did not at any time know or believe that she might be binding or affecting her separate estate."

The court further found:

"That the principal, if not the sole, purpose of plaintiff in requesting that these and the other trade acceptances be given was that the open accounts might be placed in negotiable form for discount at his bank or banks; that the consideration for the two trade acceptances dated November 23, 1918, was the goods delivered and the services rendered by plaintiff between the 30th day of October, 1918, and the 18th day of November, 1918, as set forth in the statement rendered defendant Edwin F. Hill on the 23d day of November, 1918; that it does not appear that any receipt was ever given by plaintiff for the payment in full or in part of said open account, nor was the said statement of account or bill therefor marked as paid; that the two trade acceptances of date November 23, 1918, were a transfer of the form of the open account, the total amount of which they together covered, and that no new or additional consideration was given therefor."

Upon these facts the court found that there was no consideration for the signature of Mrs. Hill upon these acceptances, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover judgment against her thereupon, notwithstanding the fact that none of the amounts sued for have been paid.

[1, 2] The statement in the findings of fact, and in the conclusions of law, that no new or additional consideration was given for these acceptances is an incorrect conclusion, drawn by the court from the other facts found. An extension of time granted for payment of an existing obligation is a valuable consideration for the new promise. Here the goods were sold upon an open account, which had become due subject only to the vendor's promise that he would take acceptances therefor payable at such future dates as should be agreed upon. A large part of the goods had been furnished upon the additional understanding that the purchaser would procure the signature of his wife to those acceptances. Except for the performance of that promise on the part of the vendee, the vendor would not have been under obligation to receive the acceptances, and would have been entitled to demand immediate payment of the account. Under these circumstances it cannot successfully be maintained by respondent that there was no consideration for her signature to those instruments. Burkle v. Levy, 70 Cal. 250, 11 Pac. 643; Rohrbacher v. Aitken, 145 Cal. 485, 489, 78 Pac. 1054; McDonald v. Randall, 139 Cal. 246, 256, 72 Pac. 997, 1000. In the case last cited, the court said:

"But if A. and B. had agreed at the time the note was made that a surety should be obtained on the note, the fact that the surety may have signed a week or a month after the delivery of the note would not affect its validity as to him, if he signed in pursuance of the original agreement."

We are of the opinion that upon the specific facts found—which are well sustained by the evidence—the court was not justified in finding that there was no consideration for the signature of Mrs. Hill, placed by her upon these acceptances, or upon the acceptance next to be discussed.

[3] Counsel for respondent in his argument sought to differentiate these instruments from ordinary bills of exchange by reason of the fact that they were executed in the form of trade acceptances conforming to the requirements of the Federal Reserve Act (39 Stat. 752). The pertinent provisions of that statute are found in section 13 thereof. See Fed. Stats. Ann. (2d Ed.) 1918 Suppl., p. 470. We find nothing, either in that law or in the regulations made thereunder by the Federal Reserve Board, sufficient to change the character of the acceptances as bills of exchange, or to change the obligations arising therefrom, so far as the parties to this action are concerned. There is therefore no merit in the contention of counsel that trade acceptances are not to be governed by the state laws relating to ordinary drafts or bills of exchange, and that they are not within the rule that an ordinary draft may be signed by the acceptor before the name of the drawer is filled in, or that a drawer may be any one whom the acceptor may accept as such. A negotiable instrument may be drawn payable to the order of a payee who is not a maker, drawer, or drawee. The bill may be accepted before it has been signed by the drawer, or while otherwise incomplete. Civ. Code, §§ 3089, 3219.

[4] The first cause of action set out in the complaint arises out of an acceptance dated December 11, 1918, due January 20, 1919, in like form as those heretofore discussed, except that respondent, Frances B. Hill, signed the same on the back thereof as guarantor, instead of signing on the face as an acceptor. The due date was actually written as January 20, 1918, but that was a mutual mistake of the parties; the intended date being January 20, 1919. The circumstances under which this instrument was executed are as follows: On the 11th day of December, 1918, one of the two October acceptances (each for the sum of $1,088.81) became due, and the other was past due. The plaintiff called at the home of the defendants with these two acceptances, and stated to Hill that he was badly in need of money. Hill replied that he would take up one of these acceptances if plaintiff would extend the time on the other. The plaintiff agreed to this. Mrs. Hill was not present in the room during this conversation, and did not hear the same. Hill gave plaintiff a check for the amount of one of these trade acceptances then due. Thereupon plaintiff handed to Hill a new blank form of trade acceptance, the blank spaces already partially filled in in typewriting, and Hill entered the date December 11, 1918, as the date thereof, and $1,101.73 as the amount thereof, and January 20, 1918, as the date of payment. This is the date which the court finds was intended to have been written January 20, 1919, and was the date to which the plaintiff agreed to extend payment of the trade acceptance in lieu of which it was given. Hill thereupon signed the instrument as acceptor. Mrs. Hill was then called into the room, and plaintiff handed to her said new trade acceptance, and requested her to sign the same. As she was about to sign the same across the face of the instrument beneath the signature of her husband, the plaintiff told her she should sign on the back thereof. She replied that she had signed the other trade acceptances across the face. Plaintiff replied that the other signatures were a mistake, and that she should have signed them on the back. Defendant Frances B. Hill, being then greatly worried over the condition of her husband who was ill and in bed, and being anxious that he be not further disturbed or annoyed, signed the same on the back thereof at the place indicated by the plaintiff, and under words printed or stamped thereon, which stated that she guaranteed payment thereof. Hill did not and had not agreed that Mrs. Hill was to sign on the back of the instrument as guarantor, or otherwise, and did not know that she had done so until some weeks later. Neither the plaintiff nor Hill explained to Mrs. Hill that in signing her name on the back of this instrument she might be liable as a guarantor, or that she could or would thereby involve or affect her separate estate. Mrs. Hill believed that in placing her name on the back of said instrument she was doing no more than she had done before in placing her name under that of her husband as acceptor on the trade acceptances of November 23, 1918. She believed that the placing of her signature on the back of said trade acceptance was merely a matter of formality, required of her as the wife of Hill and because of her interest in the community. She did not at that know or believe that by so placing her signature on the trade acceptance she was or might be in any manner involving or affecting her separate property or estate. The foregoing statement of facts concerning said instrument of date December 11, 1918, is taken from the findings of fact. The court further found:

"That the said trade acceptance bearing date December 11, 1918, for the principal amount of $1,101.73, was given by defendant Edwin F. Hill in lieu of a trade acceptance previously given by said defendant Edwin F. Hill to plaintiff, in the amount of $1,088.81; that the principal sum of the trade acceptance dated December 11, 1918, was made up of the sum of $1,088.81, being the principal sum of the said trade acceptance previously given, and the sum of $12.72, being interest on said last-named sum to December 11, 1918; that the said defendant Frances B. Hill had not signed or placed her signature in any manner upon the said trade acceptance for the principal sum of $1,088.81, in lieu of which the said trade acceptance of date December 11, 1918, was given, and upon the back of which trade acceptance of date December 11, 1918, said defendant Frances B. Hill had placed her signature; that said trade acceptance of $1,088.81 was given by defendant Edwin F. Hill to plaintiff in the early part of the month of October, 1918, and represented the agreed value of certain goods delivered and services rendered by plaintiff to defendant Edwin F. Hill prior to the giving thereof, and at the latter's instance and request."

The court further found:

"That plaintiff did not, in order to induce defendant Frances B. Hill to place her signature upon the back of the trade acceptance dated December 11, 1918, as a guarantor thereof, with intent to defraud said defendant or otherwise, advise and represent to her that her signature was required of her solely as the wife of defendant Edwin F. Hill, or solely as a matter of formality to perfect in any way the signature of her husband, but, on the contrary, the only representations made by plaintiff to defendant Frances B. Hill were those hereinbefore set forth."

From the facts thus found, the defense of the respondent Mrs. Hill, based upon her claim that her signature was obtained by means of fraudulent representations made by the plaintiff, is not sustained. The plaintiff was not responsible for her misapprehensions concerning the facts or concerning the legal effect of her signature knowingly placed by her upon these drafts. It is not established that she was incompetent to transact business, or that the plaintiff had any part in the conversations by which Mrs. Hill was by her husband induced to give him the use of her name in these transactions.

There are numerous specifications of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings, but these need not be discussed. For the reasons herein stated, we are satisfied that the findings are insufficient to support the judgment.

The judgment, in so far as it relates to the fourth cause of action, is affirmed. As to all other parts thereof, the judgment is reversed.

BROWN v. PEPPERDINE et al. (Civ. 3866.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 28, 1921.)

1. Negligence ☞ 32(1)—Owner owes licensee no duty except to avoid willful injury.

One entering the premises of another as a licensee does so at his own peril and is subject to the ordinary risks which attach to such premises, and the owner owes him no duty except to abstain from willfully and wantonly injuring him.

2. Negligence ☞ 32(1)—Ordinary care required as to invitee.

To an invitee the persons in control of premises are liable for mere failure to use ordinary care for his safety.

3. Landlord and tenant ☞ 167(8)—One using common entrance in calling upon tenant on business was an invitee.

Where defendants sublet a portion of their place of business to a tenant and used a common entrance to the premises, one using such common entrance to transact business with the tenant was an invitee of both the tenant and the defendants.

4. Landlord and tenant ☞ 167(8)—Sublessor using driveway in common with subtenant liable to person calling on subtenant for injury.

Where defendants sublet a portion of the building occupied by them and retained the right to use a driveway in common with the tenant, they were liable for an injury sustained by a person rightfully visiting the tenant due to the negligent operation of a motortruck on such driveway by their employee.

5. Landlord and tenant ☞ 169(3)—Complaint held to show one calling on defendant's tenant was where he had a right to be.

A complaint alleging that defendants conducted their business in a specified building, that they sublet a portion of the basement to P., that they and P. used a common entrance to the basement, that while plaintiff was entering the basement for the purpose of visiting P. on business as a salesman for his employer, and upon a runway going into such premises, defendant's employee so negligently operated an automobile truck as to collide with plaintiff, sufficiently showed that plaintiff was where he had a right to be and that defendants owed him the duty to exercise proper care for his safety.

Appeal from Supreme Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by W. Charles Brown against George Pepperdine, individually, etc., and another. From a judgment for defendants on demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

George Appell, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John F. Sheran and F. A. Jeffers, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered in favor of the defendants upon plaintiff's refusal to further amend his complaint after a general demurrer thereto had been sustained.

The amended complaint alleges that the defendants Pepperdine and McCalla were co-partners doing business under the firm name of Western Auto Supply Agency, and as such copartners conducted their business in San Francisco at No. 283 Golden Gate avenue; that on the 26th day of June, 1919, the plaintiff, being engaged as a salesman in the employ of the California Commerce Corporation, entered the basement of said copartners, which basement was located on the easterly side of Hyde street southerly from No. 283 Golden Gate avenue; that at said time Frank Pedro, an automobile machinist, rented and sublet from the said copartnership a portion of the said basement on Hyde street for and as an automobile repair shop; that the said copartnership and the said Frank Pedro used a common entrance into the said basement from Hyde street; that on said date and while the plaintiff was entering said basement for the purpose of visiting said Frank Pedro on business as a salesman for the California Commerce Corporation, and upon a runway going into said premises, the defendant Thomas H. Prior, an employee of said copartners, so unskillfully and negligently operated an automobile truck that he ran into and collided with the plaintiff, causing him serious physical injuries, to his damage in the sum of $20,000.

The general demurrer to the amended complaint was sustained by the trial court upon the theory that as to the defendants composing the aforesaid copartnership the plaintiff in entering upon the said premises by the medium of said runway was a mere licensee, such entry not being made upon the invitation of said defendants; and this is the question discussed in the briefs.

[1, 2] If he were a mere licensee the defendants owed him no duty except to abstain from willfully and wantonly injuring him, for when one enters the premises of another as a licensee he does so at his own peril and subject to the ordinary risks which attach to such premises. If, on the other hand, the plaintiff was an invitee, the defendants would be liable to him for their mere failure to use ordinary care for his safety. Giannini v. Campodonico, 176 Cal. 548, 169 Pac. 80; Foley v. Hornung, 35 Cal. App. 312, 169 Pac. 705.

[3-5] We are of the opinion that the plaintiff, while using the common entrance to the basement to transact business with the tenant of the defendants, was an invitee of both the tenant and the defendants, and that, having been injured while he was such an invitee, the complaint states a cause of action against the defendants. It has been repeatedly held that when a building is let in flats or offices, the hallways, entrances, and stairways not being demised to the tenants but used in common by all, the landlord owes a duty to those visiting the premises to use ordinary care to avoid injuring them. 3 Shearman & Redfield on Neg. (6th Ed.) § 710; 1 Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, § 175a. So here, the defendants having retained the right to use the driveway in common with tenant, they are liable for any injury sustained by persons rightfully visiting such tenant due to their ordinary negligence. While the allegations of the complaint are not as clear as might be desired, we think it sufficiently appears that the plaintiff was where he had a right to be, and that the defendants owed him the duty to exercise proper care for his safety.

Judgment reversed.

FLINT v. CONNER. (Civ. 3539.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨296—Vendee in possession cannot repudiate contract and retain possession.

A vendee in possession of land cannot repudiate his contract of purchase and at the same time hold possession under and by virtue of it; such a repudiated contract being no protection to the vendee in possession against the vendor's legal title.

2. Ejectment ⇨26(2)—Defendant, to prevent recovery, must make out complete equitable title and right to possession.

When plaintiff in an action of ejectment is the owner of the legal title to the property, and defendant relies on an equitable defense, he must, in order to prevent recovery, make out a complete equitable title and the right of possession thereunder.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨189—Vendee estopped from questioning ownership of vendor.

The vendee of property, who took possession claiming under the vendor and in subordination to his title, is estopped from questioning the vendor's ownership.

4. Pleading ⇨406(8)—Objection of misjoinder not properly taken to complaint by demurrer waived.

An objection that several causes of action have been improperly united or are not separately stated is ground for demurrer under Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subd. 5, and if the complaint appears to be demurrable upon such ground, and no objection is taken by demurrer, the objection is waived under section 434.

5. Appeal and error ⇨873(2)—Order denying motion to recall writ of execution not reviewed on appeal from judgment.

Order denying defendant appellant's motion to recall writ of execution, a special order made after judgment, was an order appealable under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2, and, no appeal having been taken from it, the appellate court, on appeal from the judgment, is without jurisdiction to consider the objection that the lower court improperly denied appellant's motion to recall the writ of execution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Fred W. Flint, Jr., against W. J. Conner. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Howard Prowse, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Donald Barker, of Los Angeles (Wm. H. Neblett, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to recover possession of a lot of land, with the dwelling house thereon, and certain personal property, consisting of household furniture. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Plaintiff and defendant entered into an oral agreement whereby the former agreed to sell, and the latter agreed to buy, the property, real and personal, for the sum of $17,250. Pursuant to such oral agreement, plaintiff and wife signed two instruments; one purporting to be a deed to the lot and the other a bill of sale of the personal property. Neither instrument named any grantee or purchaser. On June 4, 1919, plaintiff delivered the instruments to the Title Insurance & Trust Company of Los Angeles as escrow holder, at the same time filing written escrow instructions authorizing the escrow holder to deliver both instruments "to parties in interest or their representatives, upon payment to you, within 20 days from date hereof, for my account, the sum of $17,250." On July 2, 1919, the following, over plaintiff's signature, was written at the bottom of the original escrow instructions: "The time limit of this escrow is hereby extended to and including July 17, 1919." No grantee or purchaser is described by name in the escrow instructions. The only words in the writings signed by plaintiff to which resort might possibly be had to identify the intended grantee or purchaser are the words of the escrow instructions "parties in interest or their representatives." We have serious doubt as to the sufficiency of these words to meet the requirements of the statute of frauds. In order to ascertain who are the "parties in interest," it would be necessary to receive oral evidence as to which there might be a possible conflict. In Potter v. Duffield, L. R. 18 Eq. 4, the Master of the Rolls, speaking of a memorandum that described the seller as "vendor," said:

"If you could go into evidence as to the person who is described as 'vendor,' the answer would be that Polly was that person. But that is exactly what the act says shall not be decided by parol evidence."

However, it is not necessary for us to decide whether, in the instant case, there was a valid contract under the statute of frauds. For if, as we shall assume, the writings do satisfy all the requirements of the statute, nevertheless, for reasons presently to be given, defendant is not entitled to withhold possession from plaintiff.

Shortly after the oral agreement to sell, plaintiff caused the key to the premises to be delivered to defendant, who thereupon entered into possession. Defendant testified that during the oral negotiations he asked plaintiff for immediate possession and that plaintiff agreed thereto. Plaintiff's version of what was said during the negotiations leaves it doubtful whether the delivery of possession to defendant prior to payment of the purchase price was regarded by either as any part of the consideration moving from plaintiff to defendant for the agreed purchase money. But, be that as it may, we think that, for reasons to be stated, plaintiff was entitled to recover the property even if the contract did give defendant the right of possession prior to the time when the deed was to be delivered to him upon payment of the purchase price.

According to the testimony adduced by plaintiff, defendant promised unconditionally to pay the $17,250 within 20 days from June 4, 1919, and nothing was said about the source whence defendant should obtain the money. Defendant, on the other hand, testified that he told plaintiff that he had, or expected to have, some money in escrow with the Title Insurance & Trust Company, and that from that source he would get the purchase money for the lot and furniture and thus pay plaintiff. He testified that he told the escrow holder's agent, a Mr. Geller, in plaintiff's presence, that "I am paying a certain amount of money, $17,250, which was to be paid out of funds coming under my control in this escrow"—referring to an escrow to which plaintiff was not a party. It thus will appear that, according to defendant's theory of the case, his only obligation was to pay the purchase price out of a particular fund, namely, the money that he expected would come under his control in a certain escrow, and which thus would be available for the payment of the purchase money. According to the uncontradicted evidence of Geller, no fund was ever in escrow available for the payment of the purchase money. Geller, who handled the escrow as an employee of the Title Insurance & Trust Company, testified:

"There were never any moneys deposited with the Title Insurance & Trust Company in connection with this escrow which were paid over to Mr. Flint or to his account, nor were there any funds available in this escrow for that purpose."

Plaintiff has never received from defendant a sou marqué, or any consideration of any kind whatever.

On September 2, 1919, which was two weeks prior to the commencement of the action, plaintiff served on defendant a written notice and demand, whereby he notified defendant that, by reason of the latter's failure to comply with the conditions of the contract, plaintiff had withdrawn the instructions from escrow; that defendant's opportunity to acquire title to the property by compliance with the conditions of the escrow instructions had long since been forfeited; and that, by the withdrawal of the escrow instructions, plaintiff had terminated whatever rights defendant might have had to pay the purchase price of the property and acquire title thereto. By this same instrument, plaintiff demanded that defendant quit and deliver up the possession of the property, and notified defendant that if he failed to do so within three days action would be commenced to recover possession.

Appellant, though he has paid no part of the agreed purchase price, and doubtless never will be able to pay it from the source which he claims was to be the sole source whence he was to acquire the money, nevertheless claims the right to remain in possession of respondent's property. His position really is that, under his view of the contract, he may indefinitely keep possession of the property while refusing to make payment of the purchase money. It would be a woeful injustice if he could do this, and we do not think the law sanctions such a result. Appellant's theory seems to be substantially this: The contract gives him the right of possession pending the time when the purchase money should be paid and the deed delivered; time was not made of the essence of the contract; therefore a mere failure to pay the purchase price when due does not entitle his vendor to a recovery of possession. The authorities are not agreed as to whether a mere failure to pay, without notice to quit or demand of possession, will sustain the action. See Browning v. Estes, 3 Tex. 462, 49 Am. Dec. 760. It is, however, thoroughly established in the jurisdictions where a notice to quit is necessary that a failure to pay within a reasonable time after such notice entitles the vendor to sue for the recovery of possession. In Fears v. Merrill, 9 Ark. 559, 50 Am. Dec. 226, the court said that—

"A vendor, who executes a bond for title to his vendee, upon the payment of the purchase money at a future day, and puts him into possession, may, if the money is not paid when due, by first giving to the vendee reasonable notice to quit, avoid his contract, and maintain an action of ejectment for the land."

[1] But it is not necessary to decide the case upon the theory that there has been a mere failure to pay the purchase money, and appellant errs when he assumes that he has done no more than merely fail to pay the purchase money as and when it fell due. If, as testified by respondent, as found by the court, and as indicated by respondent's written escrow instructions, appellant's contract was an unconditional agreement to pay the full amount of $17,250 within 20 days from June 4, 1919, or within the subsequently granted extension of time to July 17, 1919, then, instead of merely failing to pay, appellant has refused to pay. For the evidence shows that, though importuned to pay the purchase price after the expiration of the time granted by respondent in his escrow instructions, appellant refused to do so save out of a phantom fund that never has assumed form or shape and which he must have known ever will be a thing of unsubstantiality. In short, appellant, as shown by his answer, as well as by the evidence in the case, has utterly repudiated the oral agreement which respondent testified was the contract that was entered into and which the court found was the contract actually made by the parties.

"A vendee in possession of land cannot repudiate his contract of purchase and at the same time hold the possession under and by virtue of it. A repudiated contract is no protection to an intending vendee in possession against the legal title." Hicks v. Lovell, 64 Cal. 18, 27 Pac. 942, 943 (49 Am. Rep. 679).

See, also, Gaven v. Hagen, 15 Cal. 208; Stratton v. California Land, etc., Co., 86 Cal. 364, 24 Pac. 1065; Gates v. McLean, 70 Cal. 49, 11 Pac. 489; Crane v. Ferrier, etc., Co., 164 Cal. 678, 130 Pac. 429; Gervaise v. Brookins, 156 Cal. 106, 107, 103 Pac. 329; Burnett v. Caldwell, 9 Wall. 290, 19 L. Ed. 712.

If the contract were as testified to by appellant, the result would be the same; for it is apparent from the testimony given by the witness Geller that there is no likelihood that any money will ever be in escrow available for payment of the purchase price of respondent's property. If Geller's testimony be believed (and in support of the judgment we must assume that the trial court accepted it as true), then there has been a total failure of consideration, and respondent therefore was entitled to rescind his contract to sell. This he did when he served the written demand and notice on appellant two weeks before commencing the action.

[2] When the plaintiff in an action of ejectment is the owner of the legal title to the property, and the defendant relies upon an equitable defense, he must, in order to prevent a recovery, make out a complete equitable title and the right of possession thereunder. Wallace v. Maples, 79 Cal. 433, 21 Pac. 860. Appellant has not alleged compliance with the terms of the contract which the court found was the one made by the parties, nor even a willingness to perform the stipulations of that contract. If, contrary to the assumption that we are indulging for the purposes of this decision, the contract be void under the statute of frauds, it is possible, nevertheless, that, having been put in possession of the land, equity would have granted appellant a specific performance had he filed a suitable cross-complaint. But he has neither averred a tender of the purchase money nor offered to pay it. The legal title is in respondent, and appellant's defense is an alleged equity arising out of a contract to purchase. In no event can he be heard to assert this defense until he shall have offered to perform. In Hicks v. Lovell, supra, the court says:

"One who appeals to a court of equity to defend him against the legal title to land of which he is in possession must do equity by paying the price which he agreed to pay."

Not only has appellant not offered to perform, but he even affects to rely upon circumstances which, he claims, have relieved him from any obligation to perform, unless it be at the end of some indefinite duration of time and upon the happening of an uncertain and improbable event which, according to the terms of the contract as found by the court, was never within the contemplation of the parties, or, at any rate, was never contemplated by respondent. Thus does appellant hope to place himself in the grossly inequitable position of claiming both the land and the price. Courts will not countenance a position at once so gross and so at variance with fair dealing.

[3] There is no merit in appellant's contention that the finding that respondent is the owner of the property is not supported by the evidence. Having entered into possession, claiming under respondent and in subordination to his title, appellant is estopped from questioning respondent's ownership. In Hoen v. Simmons, 1 Cal. 119, 52 Am. Dec. 291, an action by the vendor of land against the vendee for possession, the court says:

"The defendants, having entered into possession, claiming under the plaintiff and in subordination to his title, are estopped from questioning it."

See Gervaise v. Brookins, supra.

[4] It is claimed that the complaint improperly joins a cause of action for the recovery of real property with one for the recovery of personalty. It is too late to urge that objection. An objection that several causes of action have been improperly united, or are not separately stated, is ground for demurrer (Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subd. 5); and if the complaint appears to be demurrable upon this ground, and no objection be taken by demurrer, the objection is waived (section 434).

[5] It is urged that the lower court improperly denied appellant's motion to recall the writ of execution. The order complained of, a special order made after judgment, was an appealable order. Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2. No appeal has been taken from that order. This court therefore is without jurisdiction to consider the objection.

Judgment affirmed.

CARLSON v. LEONARD. (Civ. 3733.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 23, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐1008(1)—Finding as to whether negligence exists not disturbed.

The conclusion of the trial judge as to whether a given state of facts does or does not amount to negligence as a matter of law will not be disturbed on appeal, in absence of a clear showing of abuse of discretion.

2. Highways ⇐174—Facts held not to show applicability of doctrine of last clear chance.

Where boy, on seeing automobile approaching him, changed his mind twice as to which side of the road he would attempt to go, the last time there not being time for the driver to avoid striking the boy, but there being no danger of collision before that time, the doctrine of last clear chance is not applicable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by Harry Carlson, a minor, by H. A. Carlson, guardian ad litem, against H. B. Leonard. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Harry M. McKee, of Fresno, and Vincent Surr, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George Graham, J. R. Fitch, and Everts & Ewing, all of Fresno, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiff, a boy between 13 and 14 years of age, brings this action through his guardian ad litem to recover damages for injuries sustained by him through being struck by an automobile driven by the defendant; the complaint charging the defendant with negligence and carelessness in the conduct of his machine. The answer denied such negligence and alleged that the plaintiff himself through his own negligence was the cause of the collision. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. It made findings of fact against the contention of the plaintiff and in favor of that of the defendant, and rendered judgment accordingly.

The circumstances of the collision were testified to with very little variation between the witnesses, and may be fairly stated to be as follows: The plaintiff and several companions about his own age were walking in an easterly direction from Fresno to the golf links in the vicinity of that city when they were overtaken by a wagon. With the permission of its driver they climbed upon it, but had not proceeded far when they perceived an automobile truck approaching from the rear, and decided that, as the truck was moving faster than the wagon, they would, if possible, complete their journey upon it. Harry Carlson, the plaintiff, was the first to alight, and proceeded to cross over to the north side of the road. At this moment the defendant, driving his automobile at a speed of from 20 to 25 miles an hour, was approaching from the east, being about 80 or 90 feet distant. The plaintiff did not look in its direction, and may have been unaware of its approach, but two of his companions shouted a warning to him. The defendant, upon perceiving the boy, slowed his machine; but upon the boy reaching the north edge of that part of the road traveled by vehicles, thus leaving space enough for the defendant to pass between him and the wagon, he released his brakes and directed his course accordingly, when Carlson abruptly commenced to retrace his steps. The defendant immediately reapplied his brakes and veered his machine to the right, and would have safely passed the boy had not the latter again suddenly turned and attempted to gain the north side of the road. The defendant again applied his brakes and turned to the left to avoid striking him, but failed in this effort. The machine came to a stop within 5 or 6 feet of the point of collision, having passed partly over the plaintiff, who was taken from a point between the front and rear wheels of the automobile.

[1] Upon this state of facts it is the contention of the appellant that it was the duty of the defendant to bring his automobile to a stop when he first perceived the appellant crossing the road ahead of him, and that, not having done so, he was guilty of negligence, and that, if the defendant was driving too fast to be able to stop before reaching the plaintiff, this also constituted negligence; and the plaintiff accordingly argues that the defendant was thus guilty of negligence as a matter of law entitling the plaintiff to recover. If it can be said that the question of negligence as a matter of law arises under the facts of this case, it is well settled by recent decisions of the Supreme Court and of this court that the conclusion of the trial judge as to whether a given state of facts does or does not amount to negligence as a matter of law will not be disturbed upon appeal, in the absence of a clear showing of abuse of discretion. Mayne v. San Diego E. R. Co., 179 Cal. 173, 175 Pac. 690; Diamond v. Weyerhauser, 178 Cal. 540, 174 Pac. 38; Charves v. S. F. O. T. Rys., 186 Pac. 154; Genta v. Illingworth, 192 Pac. 1041; Spring v. Tawa, 192 Pac. 1051.

[2] It is also suggested by the appellant that the judgment should be reversed for the reason that the defendant, having a last clear chance to avoid injuring the plaintiff, neglected to take advantage of it. We do not think, however, that the facts above narrated make a case to which the principle of law referred to has application. There was no time up to the moment before the injury when the plaintiff was in an obvious position of peril from which he could not extricate himself. It is apparent that had he not changed his mind twice as to the side of the road he would find refuge from the oncoming automobile he would have been out of danger, and his final decision to cross from the south to the north side of the highway was taken too late to give to the defendant a clear chance to avoid striking him.

We think it follows that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

SPRING v. McCABE. (Civ. 3632.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 27, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 25, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 994(3) — Whether plaintiff was impeached held a matter for determination of trial court.

Whether plaintiff, who testified to speed of the auto at the time of the accident, was impeached by the testimony of others that after the accident she stated that she was asleep at the time, and did not know how fast the machine was going, was a matter for determination of the trial court.

2. Negligence $\S$ 22½ — Automobile driver owes guest reasonable care.

An automobile driver is required to use reasonable and ordinary care not to increase the danger to one riding with him by invitation by fast and reckless driving, and if injury to the guest was directly or proximately caused by the driver's negligence, he is liable, in the absence of contributory negligence.

3. Negligence $\S$ 22½ — Exceeding statutory speed limit, negligence as to guest in automobile.

Operating an automobile on a state highway at a speed in excess of the 35 miles per hour expressly limited by Motor Vehicle Act is negligence as to one riding with the driver at his invitation.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 931(4)—Finding of violation of statute presumed in support of judgment.

In support of the judgment for plaintiff for injury in auto accident, it will be presumed, in view of conflict of evidence on the question, that it was found that defendant was driving in excess of the speed limited by statute.

5. Negligence ☞ 22½ — Speed of automobile may be negligent, though not exceeding statutory limit.

The driver of an automobile may not escape liability for injury to one riding with him at his invitation through overturning of the car, merely because not exceeding the limit of speed fixed by statute, it being enough that he was operating without such control as to speed under the circumstances as a careful and prudent man in the exercise of due care and caution would have had.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by Dorothy F. Spring against R. E. McCabe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Everts & Ewing, of Fresno, for appellant.
J. P. Bernhard, of Fresno, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. This action was brought by plaintiff to recover damages for injuries, alleged to have been occasioned by reason of the careless and negligent operation of an automobile driven by the defendant, in which plaintiff was riding by invitation, and as a result of which she was severely injured. Defendant denied that he was driving at a reckless rate of speed, or operating his car in a careless manner. The case was tried before the court without a jury. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for $1,000, from which defendant appeals.

The accident occurred on the morning of December 25th, on the state highway between Madera and Merced. The automobile, driven by the defendant, skidded off the roadway and turned over, crushing the plaintiff under the steering wheel, breaking her collar bone, and inflicting other injuries. The record presents an irreconcilable conflict as to the manner and the rate of speed at which the defendant was operating his car. The plaintiff's testimony was amply sufficient, if believed, to warrant the trial court in finding that the defendant was guilty of negligence in operating his automobile at a rate of speed far in excess of the statutory limitation, and without the control as to speed, under the particular circumstances, required of a careful and prudent man. The plaintiff testified that the defendant was drinking whisky; that he drove his automobile at the rate of 45 miles an hour, once running off the highway; that she was nervous and alarmed, and asked him not to drive so fast; that while it was going at 45 miles an hour the machine turned over. The defendant testified that he was not driving in excess of 25 miles an hour at any time, and denied that the plaintiff at any time during the morning requested him to drive more slowly. He declared that it was a foggy morning; that the highway was slippery at the point of the accident, and that his automobile skidded without any apparent excuse.

Joseph Foster, a witness for the plaintiff, who arrived at the scene of the accident almost immediately, and while plaintiff was still under the overturned car, testified that the roadway was moist, but not wet, and that the highway at the point where the accident occurred was in good condition. Several witnesses who were familiar with the road at that point testified that it was a dangerous bit of highway, and that a car going at a speed of 20 or 25 miles was as liable to skid as one going at a greater rate of speed. They were also permitted to testify to other accidents of similar nature occurring under similar weather conditions as those described by the defendant as existing at the time of this accident. The defendant, who was an experienced automobile driver, had been over this particular strip of highway many times before, denied that he had any knowledge that it was a slippery or dangerous place.

[1] Appellant sought to impeach the plaintiff's testimony, as to the rate of speed at which the defendant was operating his car at the time of the accident, by the testimony of several other witnesses who testified that, in conversations with them after the accident, she stated that she was asleep at the time, and did not know how fast the defendant was driving. It is also the contention of the appellant that there is evidence tending to show that the action to recover damages was instituted by plaintiff as the result of a family feud, and an intense dislike of the defendant. Whether or not she was impeached by the testimony referred to was a matter for the determination of the trial court. By its judgment it has determined that she was not.

[2-5] In driving his automobile the defendant was required to use a reasonable and ordinary degree of care not to increase the danger to plaintiff by fast and reckless driving. Blackmore on Automobiles, § 1219; Huddy on Automobiles (1919 Ed.) § 87. If the accident was directly or proximately caused by his negligence, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, for it was not contended that she was guilty of any contributory negligence. Nichols v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 178 Cal. 630, 633, 174 Pac. 319. By the express provision of the Motor Vehicle Act the defendant was limited to a speed of 35 miles per hour in the operation of his automobile. If he operated his machine in violation of such express provision of the law, he was guilty of negligence in so doing. Mathes v. Aggeler & Musser Seed Co., 179 Cal. 697, 701, 702, 178 Pac. 713. In view of the conflict in the evidence in this behalf, we must assume in favor of the judgment that the court found that at the time of the accident the statute was being violated. Again:

"The operator of a vehicle may not escape liability for a collision by simply saying that he was not exceeding the speed limit established by statute or ordinance when it happened. It may appear (the other party being without fault) that though a defendant was not exceeding the limit of speed prescribed by the ordinance, yet that he was operating his vehicle without such control as to speed under the particular circumstances as a careful and prudent man in the exercise of due care and caution would have had." Opitz v. Schenck, 178 Cal. 636, 639, 640, 174 Pac. 40, 41.

In either event plaintiff would be entitled to recover.

The judgment is affirmed.

BERTHIAUME v. GROOM et al. (Civ. 3855.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 20, 1921.)

1. Receivers ⇨183—Complaint, in action to recover funds, held not to state cause of action.

A complaint, alleging that defendant was a receiver in a suit against plaintiff, and that as receiver he made a report of certain proceeds, which he was directed to pay to the clerk of court, and that defendant still retains this money paid to him as receiver does not state a cause of action, where there has been no final decision as to the ownership of the funds in the suit in which defendant was appointed receiver, though it also alleges that defendant as receiver received property belonging to plaintiff amounting to the sum sued for.

2. Receivers ⇨146—Party not entitled to recover funds from receiver before determination of ownership.

Though a receiver appointed in a suit against plaintiff made a settlement of his accounts and was directed to pay a specified amount to the clerk, but failed to do so, plaintiff cannot sue him and his sureties therefor, where there has been no final decision as to the ownership of the funds in the suit in which the receiver was appointed.

Action by Henry N. Berthiaume against J. J. Groom and others. From a judgment for defendant on demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Manning, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Frank J. Murphy, Edward A. Cunha, Chas. N. Douglas, John T. Ryan, and E. F. Conlin, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered after demurrer sustained to plaintiff's second amended complaint without leave to amend. The action is against Groom as principal, and defendants Levy and Flinn, as sureties, on a bond of Groom as receiver, given in August, 1907, in an action between partners, then pending in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, wherein Thomas Bonner was plaintiff and Henry Berthiaume, this plaintiff, was defendant. After the bond was given by the receiver the superior court made an order, directing Groom, as receiver, to take possession of the assets of the parties and to sell and dispose of all the effects belonging to the partnership.

[1, 2] It further appears from the allegations of the second amended complaint that in 1916, some nine years after his appointment, Groom rendered a report which, after objections made and considered, the court settled. It charged Groom with $5,000, the reasonable value of the personal property which came into his possession, credited him with $2,392.50 as proper disbursements as receiver, and without in any way adjudicating the rights of the parties to the action, the court directed that he forthwith pay to the clerk of the court the balance, $2,607.50, to await the further order of the court. This order was never complied with, and it is very manifest from a reading of the entire second amended complaint, that this action, sought to be maintained under a general order of the court for that purpose, is brought for the sole purpose of securing a judgment against the receiver and his bondsmen for the exact amount with which he was charged in the settlement of his accounts. The allegations in the complaint to the effect that Groom, as receiver, collected and received goods, moneys, and properties belonging to this plaintiff, amounting in value to the sum of $2,607.50, and has failed to account therefor to the court or to plaintiff, does not have the effect of stating a cause of action in the face of the other facts alleged. The plaintiff has not shown a right in himself to the sole fund remaining in the hands of the receiver upon the settling of the account. Final disposition of the funds of the receivership does not appear to have been made. No adjudication of the rights of the respective parties in Bonner v. Berthiaume has been made. Until some such disposition of the receivership matter has been had, we are unable to comprehend by what right the plaintiff seeks to be subrogated to the entire fund, through the medium of an action against the receiver and his bondsmen.

The judgment is affirmed.

DRACOVICH v. DRACOVICH. (Civ. 3541.)

1. Divorce — 150(2)—Finding allegations of complaint are true sufficient.

In an action for divorce, the finding that all the allegations contained in the complaint are true is sufficient finding upon each and every issue arising out of the complaint and the denials in the answer.

2. Divorce — 150(2)—Finding that all allegations of answer false a finding on each issue tendered.

In an action for divorce, the finding that all the allegations contained in defendant husband's answer and cross-complaint, except those alleged in the complaint, are false, is a direct finding on each and every issue tendered by the affirmative allegations in defendant's answer, as well as each and every issue produced by plaintiff's answer to defendant's cross-complaint.

3. Divorce — 152—Judgment not ineffective because incorporated in same document with findings.

Judgment of divorce is not rendered ineffective merely because it and the findings are incorporated in the same document.

4. Divorce — 184(1)—If evidence sufficient to support finding of desertion, it is immaterial that findings of cruelty are unsupported.

In a wife's action for divorce, if there is sufficient evidence to support the trial court's finding of defendant husband's willful desertion of plaintiff wife, it is of no consequence to the propriety of judgment for plaintiff wife that there may not be sufficient evidence to justify the finding of defendant husband's extreme cruelty and willful neglect.

5. Appeal and error — 994(3), 1010(1)—Trial court exclusive judge of credibility of witness or weight of evidence.

The trial court is the exclusive judge of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence, and its determination of questions of fact is conclusive on the appellate court, if there is any evidence tending to support its decision.

6. Divorce — 184(6)—Appellate court cannot disturb ruling below on motion to retax costs where affidavits contradicted.

The affidavits that were filed in support of the motion of defendant husband sued for divorce to retax certain items of cost, etc., being contradicted, it is beyond the power of the appellate court to disturb the ruling of the court below.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action for divorce by Gussie Dracovich against Vincent Dracovich. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. H. Heath, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Frederick Beutel, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action for divorce brought by the wife against the husband upon the grounds of willful desertion, willful neglect, and extreme cruelty. The court entered an interlocutory decree in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant appeals.

In his answer, defendant denies the material averments of the complaint respecting the several alleged grounds for divorce, and in a cross-complaint charging plaintiff with willful desertion, he prays that he be granted the divorce. The court adjudged that plaintiff is entitled to the divorce, and that on the expiration of a year from the entry of the interlocutory decree a final judgment be entered dissolving the bonds of matrimony. The court further adjudged that plaintiff have the custody of the minor children; that defendant pay plaintiff for the support and maintenance of the children $10 per week; and that he pay her $75 as attorney's fees, and likewise her costs.

The judgment makes no disposition of the community property, nor does it require the husband to pay any alimony. He, therefore, has no ground for complaint respecting either of those matters. His cross-complaint does not pray for a division of the community property, all of which is in his possession, and therefore he is not injured even if the decree does ignore his wife's prayer for such relief.

The findings, which are incorporated in the same document with the interlocutory decree, are as follows:

"The court finds that all of the allegations contained in the complaint are true, and that a divorce ought to be granted as prayed for in said complaint, and that all of the allegations contained in the defendant's answer and cross-complaint, except those alleged in the complaint, are false."

Appellant contends: (1) That the court has not found upon all of the issues raised by the pleadings; (2) that the finding that "all of the allegations contained in the complaint are true" is not justified by the evidence, in that (a) there was no evidence offered in support of the charge of extreme cruelty, (b) defendant had a sufficient excuse for leaving plaintiff, (c) he did not neglect, for a whole year, to provide his wife with the common necessities of life; and (3) that the judgment for attorney's fees and costs was procured by fraud.

[1] The findings are sufficient in form and dispose of every issue in the case. The finding that "all the allegations contained in the complaint are true" is a sufficient finding upon each and every issue arising out of the complaint and the denials in the answer. Such a finding has repeatedly been upheld by our Supreme Court. See Gale v. Bradbury, 116 Cal. 39, 47 Pac. 778, and McKelvey v. Waggy, 157 Cal. 406, 108 Pac. 268.

[2] The finding that "all the allegations contained in defendant's answer and cross-complaint, except those alleged in the complaint, are false" is a direct finding upon each and every issue tendered by the affirmative allegations in defendant's answer, as well as each and every issue produced by plaintiff's answer to defendant's cross-complaint. True, this finding is cast in a somewhat awkward form, but its meaning is clear and unequivocal. The language is equivalent to a finding that all the affirmative averments of the answer and cross-complaint are false, except such averments therein as are likewise found in the complaint. The finding leaves no uncertainty as to what affirmative averments in defendant's answer and cross-complaint the court intended to decide and find to be false. It is not like the findings in those cases where the court found that the allegations of the answer are true "except in so far as they are inconsistent with the allegations of the complaint," or "except in so far as they do not accord with the allegations of the complaint."

Such findings leave uncertain what allegations of the answer the trial court regarded as being "inconsistent" with or not in "accord" with the allegations of the complaint. But there is no such uncertainty here. The finding in the instant case, as we read it, is, in substance, a finding that all the allegations of the answer and all the allegations of the cross-complaint are false, save only such as are identical with corresponding allegations appearing in the complaint, as, for instance, the allegation that the parties are husband and wife, the allegations stating the time and place when and where the marriage was entered into, and the names and ages of the children. A finding that all the affirmative averments in defendant's pleadings are false, excepting such averments as are identical with corresponding allegations in plaintiff's complaint, leaves no uncertainty as to what the court intended to decide, and fully disposes of every issue raised by defendant's affirmative averments.

[3] The judgment is not rendered ineffective merely because it and the findings are incorporated in the same document. Hopkins v. Warner, 109 Cal. 139, 41 Pac. 868.

[4] If there is sufficient evidence to support the finding of defendant's willful desertion of plaintiff, it is of no consequence that there may not be sufficient evidence to justify the findings of defendant's extreme cruelty and willful neglect. For in that case the judgment can rest upon the finding of willful desertion. If, therefore, the finding of willful desertion is justified by the evidence, the interlocutory decree must be affirmed. Reid v. Reid, 112 Cal. 274, 44 Pac. 564.

[5] The evidence sufficiently establishes plaintiff's charge of desertion. Plaintiff's testimony shows the following: Defendant left his family and the home in which they were residing more than a year before the commencement of the action. When leaving, he said that he was going away, that he and his wife could not get along together, and that it was of no use trying living together. For three months thereafter plaintiff remained in the family residence. During that time the neighbors supplied her with food and wood; she sold, from time to time, parts of the furniture, thereby helping to eke out a bare existence on the proceeds. At the end of the three months she was compelled to go to her mother's home, where she and the children received shelter and some support. Defendant never sent for his wife nor did he ever offer to return and live with her. There was evidence of other witnesses in corroboration of these facts. Defendant sought to show that he did not leave with the intent to desert his wife, and that his conduct was justified. But upon these matters there was a sharp conflict in the testimony, and we therefore cannot say that the evidence is not sufficient to support the charge of willful desertion. The trial court is the exclusive judge of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence, and its determination upon questions of fact is conclusive upon this court if there is any evidence tending to support its decision.

Four days after the entry of the interlocutory decree, defendant served and filed a written notice that he would move the court to retax certain items of cost, and also to strike from the decree the provision directing him to pay $75 to plaintiff as attorney's fees. This motion, supported by the affidavits of defendant, his counsel, and others, was made upon the ground that, shortly prior to the trial, plaintiff and defendant had entered into an oral agreement whereby the latter agreed that he would not oppose the granting of a divorce to his wife on her complaint, and she, in consideration of such promise, agreed to pay her own costs and attorney's fees, and to permit her husband to have the custody and society of the minor children during their school vacations. In an affidavit made and filed by plaintiff's attorney, these charges of fraud and collusion are vigorously and categorically denied. The motion, according to the briefs of both parties on this appeal, was denied by the trial court, although the record before us is wholly silent as to what action was pursued by the court. However, since the parties have argued the point in their briefs upon the hypothesis that defendant's motion was denied, we shall assume that such was the action taken by the trial court.

[6] In denying defendant's motion, the court thereby gave credence to the affidavit of plaintiff's counsel. And well it might; for the shameless effrontery of the affiants who, in aid of defendant's motion, confessed their participation in an alleged fraudulent scheme to impose upon the court and permit the procurement of a divorce by collusion and chicanery, was alone sufficient to discredit their sworn statements, however solemnly made. The affidavits that were filed in support of the motion being contradicted, it is beyond our power to disturb the ruling of the court below.

"In the consideration of an appeal from an order made upon affidavits, involving the decision of a question of fact, this court is bound by the same rule that controls it where oral testimony is presented for review. If there is any conflict in the affidavits, those in favor of the prevailing party must be taken as true, and the facts stated therein must be considered as established." Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 19, 791 Pac. 1001.

Moreover, not only does the record before us fail to show what, if any, action was had on defendant's motion, but there is no appeal from any order denying the motion. Since the motion was made after the entry of the interlocutory decree, there is a question whether an order denying such a motion—a special order made after the entry of judgment—can be reviewed on an appeal from the interlocutory decree. If an interlocutory decree in a divorce action is to be deemed a "final judgment," within the meaning of the provision of subdivision 2 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, declaring that an appeal may be taken "from any special order made after final judgment," then it would seem that an order denying defendant's motion would be reviewable only on a direct appeal therefrom, and not on an appeal from the interlocutory decree. See Dooly v. Norton, 41 Cal. 439; Empire Co. v. Bonanza Co., 67 Cal. 410, 7 Pac. 810; Yorba v. Dobner, 90 Cal. 337, 27 Pac. 185. However, it is not necessary to decide this question of jurisdiction, and we refrain from doing so.

Finding no prejudicial error in the record, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

BOWEN v. HICKEY. (Civ. 3610.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 17, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 15, 1921.)

1. Public lands §106(1), 108—Decisions by Land Department officials and Secretary of the Interior as to residence conclusive where sustained by evidence.

The court has no power to revise decisions of the officials of the Land Department and the Secretary of the Interior as to an entryman's nonestablishment of a residence on the land as required by Rev. St. U. S. § 2297 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4552), prior to amendment of 1912, and abandonment thereof, where such decisions are sustained by any evidence.

2. Public lands §108—When Secretary of Interior's finding is conclusive.

The finding of the Secretary of the Interior on appeal in any controversy over conflicting claims to the public land is conclusive as to all questions of fact in the absence of fraud or gross mistake, and is otherwise conclusive unless there has been a clear misapplication of the law.

3. Public lands §35(3) — Substantial residence and good faith by entryman under Reclamation Act necessary.

An entryman under Reclamation Act June 17, 1902 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4700-4708), does not acquire or maintain a residence by occasional visits or by going upon the land for the purpose of merely formal compliance with the law, substantial residence and good faith being necessary.

4. Public lands §41—Evidence held to show failure of entryman to establish residence upon land.

Determination of officials of the Land Department that entryman under Reclamation Act June 17, 1902 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4700-4708), failed to establish a residence upon the land held justified by the evidence.

5. Public lands §103(1)—Contest of entryman's right need not be decided within the five-year period commencing on date of entry.

Contest of entryman's right to land under Rev. St. U. S. § 2297 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4552), requiring such contest to be initiated before the expiration of five years from the date of entry, need not be decided within such five-year period.

6. Public lands §35(1)—Withdrawal orders held not to relieve entryman from compliance with law as to residence, cultivation, and reclamation.

Order withdrawing land from entry under Reclamation Act, § 3 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4702), did not relieve entryman from the duty of claiming land under section 5 (section 4704), and complying with Homestead Law as to residence and cultivation under Rev. St. U. S. §§ 2289-2291, 2297 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4530-4532, 4552), prior to amendment of 1912, where the land officials made a public announcement that the withdrawals of lands were not permanent, but were for the purpose of enabling preliminary investigations to be made as the feasibility of irrigation project.

7. Public lands §103(1)—Regulation of Land Department as to contest not applicable to contest initiated before the regulations took effect.

Regulations of the Land Department as to dismissal of contests did not apply to a contest initiated before the regulations took effect.

8. Public lands §103(1)—Land Department not authorized to suspend right of contest given by statute.

Officials of United States Land Department have no power to prohibit contests of land provided for by statute in the absence of a provision of a statute providing for the suspension of the right of contest.

9. Public lands §125—Plaintiff suing to have patentee declared holder of legal title in trust for plaintiff must recover on strength of own title.

In action to have patentee declared holder of legal title in trust for plaintiff on the ground that plaintiff was vested with the right to have patent issued to him, but was wrongfully prevented from the enjoyment of such right by erroneous decisions made by Land Department officials, the plaintiff must recover, if at all, on the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of that of the defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Hugh H. Craig, Judge.

Action by Theodore Bowen against Seth Hickey. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry M. Willis, Frank C. Prescott, and Prescott & Prescott, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

F. E. Dunlap and H. F. Bridges, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal from a judgment entered in favor of the defendant.

Plaintiff brought this action in equity to secure a decree determining that the respondent, a patentee invested with legal title to certain lands described in the complaint, held such lands and the title thereto in trust for appellant. The cause of action had for its basis the asserted claim that appellant, having first become vested with the right to have patent issued to him covering the lands in controversy, was wrongfully prevented from the enjoyment of that right through erroneous decisions made by officials of the federal Land Department and the confirmatory decision of the Secretary of the Interior. On April 15, 1903, appellant filed with the district land office his application and affidavit setting forth facts required to be shown in order to perfect a homestead entry. The application was made subject to the provisions of an Act of Congress of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat. 388; Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 511 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4700-4708]), relating to reclamation of arid and semiarid lands. On March 20, 1908, respondent herein filed with the register of the land office within the district an affidavit of contest conforming to the provisions of section 2297, Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. St. § 4552), in which affidavit he charged that appellant had failed to establish a residence upon the land, and had abandoned the land for more than six months.

Notice was given and due hearing had in the matter of the contest, and on April 15, 1910, the register and receiver rendered their decision holding that the contest should be sustained and the entry of appellant canceled.

An appeal was taken by appellant, first to the commissioner of the Land Office, and next to the Secretary of the Interior, and the decision of each of these officers was adverse to appellant. In the decision rendered by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior it was stated:

"The General Land Office found that the claimant failed to establish and maintain residence on the land or to make any cultivation of the same, as required by law. That finding is fully sustained by the testimony, and an examination of the records discloses no error in the decision of the General Land Office, and no tenable ground appears upon which a contrary decision could be sustained. The decision appealed from is therefore affirmed."

Under the provisions of the homestead law an entryman, in order to become entitled to patent, is required to make compliance with the conditions as they are expressed in sections 2289-2291, Revised Statutes (Ann. St. [2d Ed.] vol. 8, pp. 543-557 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4530-4532]), and in addition thereto reclaim at least one-half of the total irrigable area of his entry for agricultural purposes. One of the requirements of the homestead statutes is that the claimant shall establish a residence upon the land, and that he shall not abandon the land "for more than six months at any time" during the five-year period; otherwise the land shall revert to the government. Section 2297, R. S., prior to amendment of 1912.

[1] In reviewing the question as to the nonestablishment of a residence upon the land and as to the abandonment of the same by appellant, which were considered and determined by officials of the Land Department and by the Secretary of the Interior, the court has no power to revise such decisions where there is found any evidence upon which the determinations therein reached can be sustained.

[2] The finding of the Secretary of the Interior on appeal in any controversy over conflicting claims to the public land is conclusive as to all questions of fact in the absence of fraud or gross mistake, and is otherwise conclusive unless there has been a clear misapplication of the law. In such exceptional cases only may the courts inquire into the matter, and, in equity, where patent has issued, adjudge the title to be in the person having the right thereto. Le Marchal v. Tegarden, 175 Fed. 682, 99 C. C. A. 236; Catholic Bishop v. Gibbon, 158 U. S. 155, 15 Sup. Ct. 779, 39 L. Ed. 931; Edwards v. Bodkin, 249 Fed. 562, 161 C. C. A. 488; Gage v.

Gunther, 136 Cal. 338, 68 Pac. 710, 89 Am. St. Rep. 141; McLaren v. Fleischer, 181 Cal. 607, 185 Pac. 967.

Considering the case irrespective of certain withdrawal orders which were made under terms of the Reclamation Act, and which give foundation for questions argued herein as to a suspension of the homestead requirements, and also as to the suspension of the right to contest an entry, the evidence showed that appellant went on the land on October 15, 1903, and stayed but one night; that in 1904 he did not go on the land at all; that in 1905 he started to take some material to erect a building on the property, but high water made it difficult for him to get his team there, and that he merely crossed the land, but did not stop. His next visit was in February, 1906, when he spent about three months on the land putting up a shack, 12 by 16 feet in dimensions, made of half-inch board, having two doors, but no floors nor windows. At that time he dug a shallow well, but did no clearing or cultivating. His next visit was for two days in the latter part of November, 1907, and then one night in December, 1907. He was not on the land again until after he had received verbal notice that the contest of respondent had been initiated, whereupon he declared to the contestant that he intended to hold the land, and thereupon went upon it. As was said by the commissioner in his decision:

"Until he (appellant) learned of pending contest proceedings, he did nothing towards establishing genuine residence on the land, but merely attempted to keep up a form of compliance with the letter of the law. While he took great trouble to go to the land, he lost no time in taking equal trouble to go away from it, and his occasional visits were evidently made with no thought of remaining."

[3] And the commissioner very pertinently added:

"It is well settled that residence cannot be acquired or maintained by occasional visits, or by going upon the land for the purpose of merely formal compliance with the law. Substantial residence and good faith are required."

[4] Appellant himself testified that he was a prospector, and had lived at various places, received his mail sometimes in Yuma or Phoenix, Ariz., sometimes in Tucson, and sometimes at Neighbors, the latter being the post office most convenient to the land claimed by him. As the question of residence is a question of fact, in the establishment of which the acts done by claimant, and his intention in connection therewith, are all to be considered, it appears that the decisions of the land officials made adversely to the claim of appellant here were wholly justified by the evidence. This case in its facts is not dissimilar to that of U. S. v. Mills et al., 190 Fed. 513, 111 C. C. A. 345, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 752, where the decree annulled a patent for fraud. The holding there was that a residence in good faith was not established under the evidence. The court, referring to the acts of the patentee, said:

"His only acts tending to show an actual personal residence * * * were that he would, about every four or five or six months take some bedclothes with him and go to the homestead and spend the night, sleeping either on the porch or in the house, and the next day would take his bedclothes and go home. * * * The evidence clearly shows that Mills never intended to live on the place during the five years succeeding his entry, and that he did not live on it; that he slept there one night in every four, five or six months so as to 'fulfill the law,' as he expressed it. * * * If this constitutes residence * * * he could have obtained in like manner a residence on a dozen other quarter sections at the same time. * * * It was not intended that a patent should be granted where the entryman never lived on the land—when he could have lived on it if he had wished to do so, and when, during the entire five years succeeding the filing of his claim, he had a home and residence elsewhere."

Additional cases may be cited: Stewart v. McHarry, 159 U. S. 643, 16 Sup. Ct. 117, 40 L. Ed. 290; Carr v. Fife et al., 156 U. S. 495, 15 Sup. Ct. 427, 39 L. Ed. 508; Small v. Rakestraw, 196 U. S. 403, 25 Sup. Ct. 285, 49 L. Ed. 527, the latter holding that a voting residence in another county was inconsistent with actual residence on homestead land.

[5] The point is urged by appellant that the contest allowed under the provisions of section 2297, Revised Statutes, must be initiated and decided within five years from the date of the homestead entry. The contest was initiated before the expiration of five years from the date of plaintiff's entry by the filing of the necessary affidavit. The formal notice of the contest was served on June 5, 1908, and hearing had before the local land officials at a subsequent date, decision being rendered on April 15, 1910. The provisions of section 2297 do not contemplate that a contest must be both commenced and disposed of all within the five-year term. As respondent well argues, if such was the law, then an abandonment of residence, where the six-months period expired on the last day of the five-year term, would be beyond the reach of a contest, although the statute plainly makes such abandonment ground for cancellation of the entry. Respondent suggests that this point was not raised before the Land Office officials; therefore, cannot be taken advantage of here for the first time. There seems to be merit in that position (Carr v. Fife et al., supra), although we have already indicated an adverse view on the proposition, assuming that it was entitled to be considered. The default of appellant in the matter of residence had not been cured prior to the initiation of the contest, as was the situation considered in some of the cases cited.

[6] There were two withdrawal orders made under authority of the Reclamation Act. Section 3 of that act (U. S. Comp. St. § 4702) authorizes orders to be made withdrawing land from entry, the terms of the statute being as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Interior shall, before giving the public notice provided for in section four of this act, withdraw from public entry the lands required for any irrigation works contemplated under the provisions of this act, and shall restore to public entry any of the lands so withdrawn when, in his judgment, such lands are not required for the purposes of this act; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, at or immediately prior to the time of beginning the surveys for any contemplated irrigation works, to withdraw from entry, except under the homestead laws, any public lands believed to be susceptible of irrigation from said works: Provided, that all lands entered and entries made under the homestead laws within areas so withdrawn during such withdrawal shall be subject to all the provisions, limitations, charges, terms, and conditions of this act." Comp. St. 1901, Supp. p. 513.

These withdrawal orders are commonly referred to for convenience as being "first form" or "second form," according to sequence as the authority appears to be given in the statute. The first form withdrawal was ordered on September 12, 1903. It is not contended that the second form order was effective to relieve appellant from the duty to comply with the homestead law as to residence or cultivation, but it is his claim that after the first form withdrawal order was made all requirements as to residence, cultivation, or irrigation were suspended until the land was restored to entry. Section 5 of the Reclamation Act (U. S. Comp. St. § 4704) provides that the entryman, "in addition to compliance with the homestead law," shall reclaim at least one-half of the total irrigable area, etc., from which provision it is made clear that in any event full compliance with the homestead law is exacted.

Whether the claimant may be excused from subjecting the land to irrigation does not seem to be necessarily involved in the case, in view of the findings of the Land Department officials. It has been held by our Supreme Court that—

"The construction placed upon an act of Congress by the Land Department, with respect to the disposition of public lands, and its practical application thereof, is always given great weight by the courts in construing the law and is followed if it is at all reasonable." McLaren v. Fleischer, supra.

It is not indicated in the provisions of the Reclamation Act that an entryman, pending a withdrawal which is not permanent in form, but is for preliminary purposes, may disregard the requirement of residence, and be protected in his entry after the withdrawal order has been abrogated. Under date of June 17, 1902, the Secretary of the Interior issued a circular of information respecting the withdrawals of land made under the Reclamation Act, in which it was stated that the principal purpose of such withdrawals was to enable surveys and investigations to be made to determine the feasibility of the particular irrigation project. The circular contained this language:

"Even if the project is feasible, only a portion of the lands withdrawn will be irrigated. The mere fact that surveys are in progress is no indication whatever that the works will be built."

On May 17, 1904, the Secretary, evidently for the purpose of advising entrymen of the construction which the Land Department was giving to the reclamation statute, directed that a circular letter be prepared instructing the local land officers to—

"notify all persons who apply to make entry of lands within the irrigable area of any project commenced or contemplated under the Reclamation Act, that they will be required to comply fully with the homestead law as to residence, cultivation, and improvement of the land, and that the failure to supply water from such works in time for use upon the land entered will not justify a failure to comply with the law and to make proof thereof within the time required by the statute."

The latter instruction, of course, did not expressly cover cases where withdrawal orders under the first form might be made, but it indicates the view of the department that the residence and other requirements of the statute were not to be relaxed, even though the project of obtaining water failed of success. The land officials gave public announcement that the withdrawals of lands as made under the orders here considered were not permanent, that no promise was held out that water would be obtained, but that they were for the purpose of enabling preliminary investigations to be made which would determine whether the projects proposed to be carried out were feasible. When the time arrived that it was found that such projects were feasible, a permanent order would have no doubt followed.

[7, 8] Certain regulations of the Land Commissioner, referred to as those of June 6, 1905, as amended January 19, 1909, the amendment prohibiting contests of land included within a first form withdrawal, are urged as applicable in curing any claimed default of appellant. These regulations were considered by the Assistant Commissioner of the Land Office in the concluding portion of his opinion, wherein he said:

missed by reason of the provisions of the regulations approved June 6, 1905, as amended January 19, 1909 (37 L. D. 365), relating to contests affecting lands included within withdrawals under the Reclamation Act. The amendment was not in force when the contest was initiated, and said contest was properly allowed under the regulations then controlling."

If the reclamation statute did not provide for a suspension of the right of contest authorized under section 2297, Revised Statutes, then the amended regulations of January 19, 1909, were void and of no effect, for it has been held that the power of the Interior Department, or Commissioner of the Land Office, is to enforce, and not change, the effect of statutes, to which end only they may adopt regulations. Leonard v. Lennox, 181 Fed. 760, 104 C. C. A. 296. The case of Edwards v. Bodkin, 249 Fed. 562, 161 C. C. A. 488, is not in point, because under the facts there considered it appeared that the entryman had resided upon the land continuously, and had not abandoned his residence, and the court particularly noticed that fact. Assuming that the Act of Congress of April 30, 1912, which was designed to excuse entrymen under the Reclamation Act from the duty to maintain residence or make improvements prior to the time water might become available for irrigation, may be said to apply to a case like that of appellant's, where the forfeiture period had expired and contest initiated before the passage of the act (and we do not agree that it does), there is one particular condition of that act which makes it inapplicable; namely, that it applies only to persons who have theretofore "established residence in good faith upon the lands entered." Under the facts as they were determined to be in this case, there was not good faith shown in the establishment of the residence of appellant on the lands in question.

[9] We are of the opinion that there was no irregularity in accepting and allowing the homestead application of respondent. However, that question is not important to be decided after it has been determined that the entry of appellant was properly canceled because of his abandonment of residence on the property. He must recover here, if at all, on the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of his adversary's. Such is the rule repeatedly announced in controversies of this kind. Small v. Rakestraw, 28 Mont. 413, 72 Pac. 746, 104 Am. St. Rep. 691; Id., 196 U. S. 403, 25 Sup. Ct. 285, 49 L. Ed. 527; Sparks v. Pierce, 115 U. S. 408, 6 Sup. Ct. 102, 29 L. Ed. 428.

We find no error requiring that the decree be set aside.

The judgment is affirmed.

JONES v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 3530.)

1. Master and servant ☞417(7)—Findings on evidence in compensation case final.

An award of the Industrial Accident Commission will be annulled only where there is no evidence to support it.

2. Master and servant ☞405(2) — Evidence held to show compensation claimant's employment was not casual.

Evidence held sufficient to support the finding of the Industrial Accident Commission that compensation claimant's employment as carpenter in repairing a roof, from which he fell, was not casual, but one reasonably requiring work extending over the statutory period of ten days.

Certiorari by S. Jones against the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California and others to review an award under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831). Affirmed.

D. Z. Gardner, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

JAMES, J. [1, 2] Certiorari to review proceedings had and award made in the matter of the claim of one Rush heard by the Industrial Accident Commission. Award for compensation in the sum of several hundred dollars was made in favor of Rush against the petitioner here, and the latter contends that the findings and award are not supported by the evidence. It is particularly insisted that under the evidence the Commission erroneously found that the employment of Rush was not casual. The second contention, which refers again to the evidence, is that the principal injuries for which compensation was awarded were not shown to have been sustained by the claimant while in the employ of petitioner, and that the claim as to such injuries was fraudulent. The authority of this court in making a review of the evidence heard before the Accident Commission upon which an adjustment of a claim is made is limited to determining whether there is any evidence to be found in the record which will support the findings as made; in other words, that an award will be annulled only where there is no evidence to support it. The transcript of the evidence shows, in that part setting forth the testimony given by the claimant Rush, that he was employed by Jones to do certain repair work; the witness' narrative of the conversation occurring at the time of his employment being as follows:

"We went upstairs, and there were two rooms there he showed me. He said, 'I want the paper taken off, and both these rooms sealed on the side, and the ends.' Well, then I came downstairs, and he said, 'I want you to inclose the sink and put a sink board over it, and take these windows and fix them so they will move, and put in these two big lights, and fix these doors that scrape on the floor, fix these door locks and the jambs to the doors; and then I want you to fix outside the railing on that porch, and put the baseboard around these rooms, and I want you to fix that toilet—while there is nothing wrong with it, I want you to put a new board in, or do something with it.' And I looked over the whole thing, and I said, 'Mr. Jones, you have a lot of work here;' and he said, 'I know it.' He said, 'I want you to take hold of it, at eight hours a day, and follow it through until it is done; I don't know how long it will take you.' That was the explanation to me.

"Q. What about the roof? A. Well, the room was to be ceiled under the roof; the roof was to be covered—I had forgotten that; he said, 'I want you to go over that roof and fix it the first thing because I am afraid it will rain. We will get that done, and then you can do the inside work if it rains.' So I went to work first on the roof. * * *

"Q. Did you make any estimate of the time it would take you to do the work he said he wanted to have done if you agreed to the schedule you have given? A. It would take me at least three or four weeks to finish what he told me, and I don't believe I could do it in three weeks, I think it would take me a month."

Under the provisions of the act relating to industrial compensation, if the work contemplated to be done would require more than 10 days for its execution then the employment would not be termed "casual," and would be one under which compensation could be claimed in the event of injury. We note immediately that there was a conflict in the evidence as to the length of time which the work Rush was engaged to do might require. There was a conflict first between Rush's statement as to what he was engaged to do and the statement of Jones relating to the same matter. Petitioner Jones testified that he had employed Rush "by the day and told him I didn't know just how much we would have to do about the place; that I would determine that later as he went along; that the roof was the first thing I wanted him to fix. And he completed the roof, and fell off the house." Mrs. Jones, the wife of petitioner, testified that the work "Mr. Jones intended to have done by Mr. Rush himself took another carpenter a day and a half to do." By the testimony of Mrs. Jones it would appear that very much less work was contemplated to be done by Rush than was included in his statement. Rush, according to his own testimony, had only partially completed the roof work, which was the first of the work commenced, when he fell and suffered the injuries complained of. Rush testified further that he had been a carpenter and builder all of his life and had held the position of an architect. This we think qualified him to estimate as he did, and, as appears in the testimony first quoted, the length of time which would be required for him to complete all the work which he was employed by Jones to do.

From what has been now stated it appears very clearly that there was evidence sufficient to support the finding of the Commission that the employment of the claimant by Jones was not a casual one, but was one which reasonably required work extending over a period of more than ten days. The claim that the injuries, alleged by the claimant to have been suffered as the result of the fall from the roof of petitioner's house, were in fact due to a prior accident not connected with his employment under petitioner, must be considered in the same way. The claimant admitted that at a prior time he had slipped upon a floor and had fallen, but he insisted that he had recovered from any injuries which might have been produced by that fall. The Commission had before it evidence as to all of these matters, and also evidence of physicians who had attended the injured man after he fell from the roof of petitioner's house, and the question as to what injuries were then suffered became one of the things to be determined upon that evidence, and we cannot say that the finding reached on that branch of the inquiry was unwarranted.

The proceedings and award are affirmed.

Ex parte CARLTON. (Cr. 578.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 17, 1921.)

1. Criminal law $\S$ 991(3)—Under indeterminate sentence law the court need not fix minimum or maximum penalty for felony.

Under the indeterminate sentence law in a felony case the judgment of sentence should merely be that the defendant be confined in one of the state prisons without fixing either the minimum or maximum penalty.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 1208(9)—Board of prison directors shall determine the maximum penalty only under indeterminate sentence law.

Under the indeterminate sentence law the board of prison directors shall determine only what maximum penalty the prisoner is to suffer, and neither the board nor prisoner is concerned with the minimum penalty.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 1208(9) — Statute fixes maximum penalty for second degree burglary, but implies minimum.

Although Pen. Code, $\S$ 461, provides only a maximum penalty for second degree burglary, there is nevertheless an implied minimum penalty, and under the indeterminate sentence law the prison board is vested with a discretion as to fixing a maximum within that fixed by statute.

4. Habeas corpus — 30(3)—Prisoner not entitled to release for irregularity of judgment of sentence.

If a prison board on conviction of a felony was without authority to fix the length of time during which the prisoner should suffer imprisonment, then the power to do so remained in the superior court, and the failure of the judgment of sentence to fix the time would be only an irregularity subject to correction by the court, and in no event would the prisoner be entitled to discharge from custody upon habeas corpus.

Application of Carl Carlton for writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the warden of the state prison at Represa to secure petitioner's release on the ground that the board of prison directors exceeded their authority in fixing punishment. Writ denied.

Carl Carlton, in pro. per.

HART, J. To the writer, as a justice of this court, the petitioner, who is confined in the state prison at Represa, state of California, under a sentence of five years for burglary of the second degree, addresses this petition, claiming that his restraint by the warden of said prison is unlawful for the reason that the state board of prison directors, in fixing his punishment under the indeterminate sentence law, exceeded its jurisdiction for reasons to be hereinafter stated.

The petitioner presents this application in propria persona or without being represented by an attorney, and, as I find, upon examination of the same, that it is plainly my duty to deny the application, it is believed to be only just to him that the reason for so doing should be briefly stated.

Section 461 of the Penal Code provides that "burglary of the second degree is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not more than five years." Thus it will be observed that no minimum penalty is specifically prescribed for said crime. It is alleged in the petition, however, that the petitioner was given an indeterminate sentence of "from nothing to five years," and it is contended by the petitioner: First, that the prison board is without legal authority to fix the term of the prisoner in those cases where there is no minimum penalty specifically prescribed by the law; second, that if said board is in such cases authorized to fix or determine the time during which the prisoner shall remain in prison, and the court sentencing the prisoner has not, in its judgment of sentence, fixed or specified the minimum penalty, then, in its order determining what length of time the prisoner shall serve, said board must also fix or specify the minimum term, and that omission to do so renders the determination or order void. In support of the proposition first stated the case of Ex parte Heath, 194 Pac. 68, is cited.

Referring now to the point first stated, I first observe that, in the absence of a better showing than is here made of the nature of the sentence pronounced by the court against the petitioner, I will not assume or believe that any such sentence was pronounced, as it would involve a palpable absurdity, assuming that the fixing of a minimum and a maximum or any penalty in the judgment of sentence by the court is necessary under the law, or that it adds any legal force to the judgment of sentence.

[1] But I do not think that the specification of any penalty is required to be made in a judgment of sentence. Under the indeterminate sentence law (St. 1917, p. 665) the court, in a felony case, where a conviction has been had, can do no more, in the matter of passing sentence, than to pronounce judgment of sentence, which merely involves an adjudication by implication from the verdict of conviction, of the prisoner's guilt and his punishment by confinement in one of the prisons of the state, designated in the judgment. In the case of People v. Lee, 36 Cal. App. 323, 334, 172 Pac. 158, 162, it was suggested, but not decided, that—"It would seem from the language of the section [1168, Penal Code; see Stats. 1917, p. 665] that it was contemplated that judgment of sentence should merely be that the defendant be confined in one of the state prisons, without fixing or naming either the minimum or maximum penalty for the offense of which he was convicted."

I think that that expression involves a correct construction of the law, or, in other words, discovers the intention of the Legislature in that particular.

[2] As to the nature of the order of the prison board determining the term during which the prisoner shall serve, the statute itself seems to be very clear. It provides that said board shall, after the expiration of the minimum term of imprisonment of any prisoner, determine what length of time such prisoner shall be confined. This means, of course, that the board shall determine only what the maximum penalty the prisoner is to suffer shall be. Obviously neither the board nor the prisoner is concerned with the minimum penalty when the time at which the board may determine what the maximum penalty shall be has been reached.

The point last above stated is also without legal force. The petitioner misapprehends the purport of the decision in Ex parte Heath, supra. There the petitioner had been convicted of the crime of robbery, together with a prior conviction of burglary. In such a case the punishment provided is imprisonment in the state prison for the term of the prisoner's natural life. Sections 213 and 667, Pen. Code. In other words, there is in such a case, under the law, no minimum penalty either expressly provided for or implied from the language fixing the penalty. Neither the court nor the prison board is, in such case, vested with any discretion in the matter of determining what length of time the prisoner shall serve. The law itself has determined and fixed that time and fixed it at straight life imprisonment. What with obvious propriety is held in the Heath Case and intended by this court to be held therein is that where, as in that case, the law provides a straight, definite term during which the prisoner shall serve in prison, and so leaves in the court or prison board no power or discretion to fix any other or different penalty, then, there being no minimum penalty which can be fixed, the indeterminate sentence law does not and cannot apply.

[3] In the case of second degree burglary, as is also true as to some other crimes which could be named, while there is no minimum penalty specifically prescribed by the statute, there is, nevertheless, an implied minimum penalty. As seen, the punishment for daylight burglary, as fixed by the statute, is any term not exceeding five years, which manifestly constitutes the maximum penalty. The minimum may be for one day or for one hour or even less, as the prison board may determine, and thus, as stated, there is a minimum penalty for the offense, even though, so far as the statute itself is concerned, it is indefinite or not specifically fixed. In such case the prison board is vested with a discretion in the matter of determining "what length of time" the prisoner shall be confined in prison, whether the limit of the maximum term prescribed or anything less to the smallest fraction of time, and, within the fair and reasonable import of the statute, may in such a case, at any time after the prisoner has been committed to the custody of the prison and the authorities thereof, determine what shall be the length of the prisoner's term up to the maximum time for which he can be punished.

[4] But, it may be added, if the prison board was in such a case without authority to fix the length of time during which the prisoner shall suffer imprisonment, the power to do so still remains in the superior court, and since the judgment of sentence would, for failure to fix the time therein, amount only to an irregularity, or, in other words, not render the judgment absolutely void, the court would have the right to correct its judgment in that particular (In re Silva, 38 Cal. App. 99, 175 Pac. 481), and therefore, in any event, the prisoner would not be entitled to his discharge from custody.

The application for the writ herein prayed for is denied.

Ex parte DENECKE. (Cr. 579.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 17, 1921.)

Application of Art Denecke for writ of habeas corpus directed to warden of state prison at Represa to secure petitioner's release. Writ denied.

Art Denecke, in pro. per.

HART, J. The petitioner has addressed his application to me, as a justice of this court, for a writ of habeas corpus. Said petitioner is confined in the state prison at Represa under a sentence of imprisonment for the crime of burglary of the second degree. The prison board fixed the term of his imprisonment at three years. He now claims that he is under illegal restraint of his liberty, his claim being that the said prison board exceeded its authority or jurisdiction in determining what his term of imprisonment should be. The specific grounds upon which the petitioner claims that he is entitled to be released are the same as those relied upon by the petitioner in the case of Ex parte Carlton (Crim. No. 578) 200 Pac. 51, in which on this day an opinion was filed holding that the grounds upon which the said petitioner claimed to be entitled to his release from custody are without legal force, and thereupon denying the petition for the issuance of the writ of habeas corpus. It follows, of course, that the petition herein for a writ of habeas corpus must be denied, and, upon the authority of the said case of Ex parte Carlton, such is the order.

PRICE v. SMITH MFG. CO. et al.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 24, 1921.)

1. Patents $\S$ 218(2)—Royalty due on sale of machine in absence of stipulation as to time of performance.

Under a contract entitling an inventor to a royalty on each invented machine manufactured and delivered, the agreed royalty became due to inventor immediately upon the sale of each of the machines manufactured under Civ. Code, $\S$ 1657, in the absence of a stipulation in the contract as to time of performance.

2. Frauds, statute of $\S$ 138(1)—Royalties on machines manufactured during first year recoverable, though contract was one for a period exceeding one year.

An inventor, entitled under a contract to a royalty on every machine manufactured and sold, could recover royalties due on the machines manufactured during the first year, though the contract was for a definite period of time exceeding one year, and was not in writing, as required by the statute of frauds, since where a series of things is to be done occupying in the whole more than 1 year, but each item as it is performed drawing with it a separate liability therefor, the statute of frauds does not prevent an action upon such items as are performed within the year to recover the stipulated compensation.

3. Frauds, statute of §119(1)—One will be estopped from invoking statute where it is inequitable to so do after receiving the benefit of part performance.

Where it is clearly and unequivocally made to appear that there has been a performance of an oral agreement required by the statute to be in writing under such circumstances as to make it inequitable to allow the party receiving the benefit thereof to invoke the statute, he is estopped from doing so.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasley, Judge.

Action by E. L. Price against the Smith Manufacturing Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Owen D. Richardson, of San Jose, for appellants.

Louis Oneal, of San Jose, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendants 10 per cent. of the selling price of certain can-filling machines, manufactured and sold by the defendants under a license. The defendants interposed a counterclaim for $200, which the court allowed, and gave judgment for the plaintiff from which the defendants appeal.

The plaintiff, claiming to be the inventor of a certain can-filling machine, applied to the government for a patent in September, 1917. About that time he entered into an oral agreement with the defendants by which it was agreed that if plaintiff would permit the defendants to manufacture his machine, they would undertake to do so, and would pay the plaintiff 10 per cent. of the selling price, which was to be fixed by the defendants. Plaintiff entered the employ of the defendants, and perfected his drawings and details, the defendants engaging in the manufacture of the machines. This arrangement continued until March 1, 1919, when the plaintiff revoked the license. The defendants had, in the meantime, manufactured and sold 48 machines for the aggregate sum of $26,087.40. The court found that the defendants did agree to pay plaintiffs 10 per cent. of the selling price of the machines as a royalty for their manufacture, and also found 10 per cent. of the selling price to be the reasonable value of the license and of the right to manufacture and sell the machines, and to use plaintiff's design and invention, and gave judgment in plaintiff's favor in the sum of $2,608.74, less $200, the counterclaim allowed. These findings are amply supported by the evidence.

[1-3] It is the contention of the appellants that the oral agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants was invalid under the statute of frauds, because, by its terms, it was not to be performed within a period of 1 year, but was to extend over the life of the patent, or a period of 17 years. The trial court found, however, that the license was to continue until revoked by plaintiff, and we think this finding is amply supported by the testimony. Furthermore, plaintiff did not receive his patent from the government until January 7, 1919, and 42 of the machines were manufactured and delivered by the defendants before that time. There was no term fixed for the performance of the contract, and it seems to have been entered into with an understanding that it was subject to revocation by either party at any time. No time for performance being specified, and the act consisting of the payment of money, the agreed royalty became due from the defendants to plaintiff immediately upon the sale of each of the machines manufactured. Civil Code, § 1657. Even assuming that the contract was one for a definite period of time exceeding 1 year, the defendants may not invoke the statute of frauds in defense of plaintiff's claim for royalties on the machines already manufactured. In certain kinds of contract, as where a series of things is to be done, occupying in the whole more than 1 year, but each item as it is performed drawing with it a separate liability therefor, the statute of frauds does not prevent an action upon such items as are performed within the year to recover the stipulated compensation. Brown on Statute of Frauds (4th Ed.) § 285. Where it is clearly and unequivocally made to appear that there has been a performance of an oral agreement required by the statute to be in writing, under such circumstances as to make it inequitable to allow the party receiving the benefit thereof to invoke the statute, he is estopped from doing so. HOUSTON v. WILLIAMS. (Civ. 2284.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 17, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 15, 1921.)

1. Brokers ⇨42—Commission recoverable where broker licensed at time of procuring customer, though not when employed.

Under St. 1919, p. 1252, declaring it unlawful to act as real estate broker without first obtaining a license, and that one cannot maintain action for broker's commissions, unless he was licensed when the cause of action arose, it is enough that he had a license when he procured a customer, though not when he was employed.

2. Appeal and error ⇨171(3), 193(5)—Objection to lack of allegation in complaint held not available for first time on appeal.

Any objection that complaint, alleging the making of a contract between the parties on a certain day, should have alleged that plaintiff then had a broker's license, is unavailable for the first time on appeal; the complaint having been treated, throughout the trial, as sufficient in that respect.

3. Brokers ⇨86(5)—Evidence held sufficient to show financial ability of customer produced.

Evidence in broker's action for commissions held sufficient to show that customer produced was financially able to meet the required terms.

4. Brokers ⇨46—Procuring customer in stipulated time held entitled to commissions, though owner had previously procured customer.

Under contract whereby owner appoints a broker his agent to sell his property, agrees to sell it to any purchaser obtained, and provides that the authority shall continue for 90 days, the broker, producing a customer within that time, is entitled to a commission, though the owner himself had already procured a customer, subsequently, however, to notification that the broker was negotiating with a prospective buyer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by G. F. Houston against C. A. Williams. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fee & Ring, of Madera, for appellant.

Conley & Conley, of Madera, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for a broker's commission for the sale of real estate and the plaintiff had judgment, from which the appeal is taken.

The cause of action is set forth in identical phraseology in two counts, except for the provisions of paragraph 3 in each count. Said paragraph in the first count is as follows:

"That thereafter, and prior to the time limited for the expiration of said contract, plaintiff by his own efforts procured one G. A. Lombardi as a purchaser of said real property, at the price and upon the terms and conditions fixed by said contract (Exhibit A); that on or about the 10th day of January, 1920, plaintiff produced the said G. A. Lombardi before defendant herein, at and upon the said real property of defendant; that the said G. A. Lombardi, in the presence of plaintiff, did then and there offer to said defendant to purchase said real property at the price and upon the terms and conditions fixed by said contract (Exhibit A); that at the time of making said offer the said G. A. Lombardi was ready, able, and willing to purchase said real property at the price and upon the terms and conditions fixed by said contract (Exhibit A)."

The corresponding paragraph in the second count is substantially the same, with the addition of the following allegation:

"That the defendant then and there refused, and has ever since refused, to sell the said property to the said G. A. Lombardi, upon the terms and conditions and at the price fixed by said contract (Exhibit A), or otherwise, or at all."

The first count rests upon the theory that the broker obtained a purchaser for the property and was therefore entitled to his commission. The second count was designed, so respondent claims, to meet the requirement of the rule that—

"When the broker in good faith finds a purchaser within the period allowed by the terms of the written contract of employment, and prior to the revocation of his authority, places the matter in such a position that success is practically certain and immediate, or has in good faith expended money and effort in seeking a purchaser, the revocation by the vendor of the broker's authority (by sale to another or otherwise), and the termination of his agency before the completion of the sale, against the express provisions of the contract of employment does not deprive the broker of his right to his commission, but the principal is liable therefor, if the purchaser is ready, able, and willing to pay the purchase money before the expiration of the period named in the agency contract."

The first count is probably broad enough to cover either theory of plaintiff, but the second count could obviously do no harm.

The trial judge found that all the allegations of the amended complaint were true and also:

"That the said real property was sold by defendant to W. S. Ricketts of Fowler, Cal., but that said sale took place after plaintiff had produced before defendant one G. F. Lombardi as a purchaser ready, able, and willing to purchase, and who offered to purchase, said real property in accordance with the terms and conditions and at the price named in said contract."

The contract of agency was as follows:

"The undersigned, G. F. Houston, hereby agrees, during the life of this agreement, to endeavor to sell or exchange the property described on the reverse side of this card.

"In consideration thereof, I hereby appoint G. F. Houston my exclusive agent to sell or exchange for me said property, and to receive deposit on the same.

"I agree to sell said property to any purchaser able and willing to purchase the same for the price and upon the terms stated on the reverse side of this card, or for any less price or different terms hereafter authorized by me.

"I agree to furnish an abstract or certificate showing merchantable title in me to date of sale, and to convey title by good and sufficient deed of grant or contract of sale. Purchaser pays for all lumber for our house; also all other materials for this price.

"Should G. F. Houston, either personally or through his agents, be instrumental in obtaining a purchaser to whom the owner of this property shall sell or contract to sell said property during life of this agreement, or within six months after the expiration thereof, I agree to pay G. F. Houston 5 per cent. of the selling price as commission for selling the same.

"Any deposit retained by me for failure of a purchaser to make a further payment shall be equally divided between my said agent and myself.

"This authorization is to continue for the period of 90 days."

On the back of said contract the terms of the sale appear as follows:

"40 acres, $9,500. Name, C. A. Williams. Located 5 miles of Madera on State Highway Ave. Road, Sec. 4. Purchaser pays for all lumber and material for same on new house. * * * Terms: $9,500. How payable—$1,000 pr. annum. And assign contract with Frank Hope and wife for $5,000 at 7 per cent."

[1] 1. Appellant contends that the commission contract is void by reason of the fact that plaintiff at the time said contract was executed had no license to act as a real estate broker as required by the statute for the regulation of such brokers, approved May 27, 1919. Stats. 1919, p. 1252. Section 1 of said act provides:

"It shall be unlawful for any person, copartnership or corporation to engage in the business, or act in the capacity of a real estate broker, or a real estate salesman within this state without first obtaining a license therefor."

Section 2 of said act defines a real estate broker and it is not disputed that plaintiff was such broker. Section 17 of said act makes the failure to take out a license by one engaged in the business punishable—

"by a fine of not to exceed two thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail or state prison for a term not to exceed two years, or both such fine and imprisonment."

In Wood v. Krepps, 168 Cal. 382, 143 Pac. 691, L. R. A. 1915B, 851, the rule in such cases is stated as follows:

"When the object of the statute or ordinance in requiring a license for the privilege of carrying on a certain business is to prevent improper persons from engaging in that particular business, or is for the purpose of regulating it for the protection of the public or in the interest of public morals, health, or police, the imposition of the penalty amounts to a prohibition against doing the business without a license, and a contract made by an unlicensed person in violation of the statute or ordinance is void."

However, it was held in that case that the ordinance in question was solely for the purpose of yielding a public revenue, and therefore contracts made in the course of the business by one who had not obtained a license were valid. The purpose of the act in question herein was decided by our Supreme Court in Riley v. Chambers, 181 Cal. 589, 183 Pac. 855, 8 A. L. R. 418, to be primarily to require that real estate brokers and salesmen be "honest, truthful and of good reputation." It was designed, in other words, to protect the public against unscrupulous operators, and not principally to secure revenue. It would seem to follow that a contract having in view the performance of any of the acts recited in said statute, if said contract was executed by one to whom no license has been issued, would be invalid, unless there is something in the act itself which operates to limit or modify said rule. We think such limitation is found in section 20 of the act, providing that—

"No person, copartnership or corporation engaged in the business or acting in the capacity of a real estate broker or a real estate salesman within this state shall bring or maintain any action in the courts of the state for the collection of compensation for the performance of any of the acts mentioned in section 2 thereof without alleging and proving that such person, copartnership or corporation was a duly licensed real estate broker or real estate salesman at the time the alleged cause of action arose."

Manifestly the Legislature herein undertook to prescribe an essential condition of recovery, but limited its operation to the time when the cause of action arose. By implication any earlier period was excluded. It is a reasonable construction of the act to hold that it is unlawful for any one to engage in the business of a real estate broker without having secured a license, but he is not precluded from recovering compensation for his services if he had such license at the time his cause of action arose, although his contract may have been executed prior to that time when he had no license. Herein, manifestly, the cause of action arose when plaintiff obtained a purchaser for the property, and it is not disputed that then he had the proper license, and it was so alleged in the complaint.

[2] At any rate there is nothing in the statute to require the pleader to allege specifically that he had the license at the time he entered into said contract, and from the aver-ment "that on the 23d day of October, 1919, plaintiff and defendant entered into a certain contract in writing, a copy of which is attached to and made a part of this complaint," the inference would follow that plaintiff had the capacity and the lawful authority to enter into such an undertaking, and it would be incumbent upon defendant to challenge it by denial if he desired to present such issue. Especially should this position be taken in view of the failure of defendant to make any such point in the court below. His contention as to the sufficiency of the complaint was stated as follows:

"The contract in question, which is attached to the complaint and made an exhibit thereto gives to the plaintiff in this action an exclusive agency to sell the property of the defendant for a certain time. The contract in question, however, does not give to Mr. Houston the exclusive right to sell that property and in the absence of such condition in the contract the owner himself, of course, may sell the property through his own efforts, and if he does so without the aid of Mr. Houston, Mr. Houston is not entitled to a commission. This complaint is for the sale of the property or for finding a buyer ready, able and willing to buy. I believe under such condition the complaint should allege that at the time Mr. Houston procured a buyer ready, able and willing to sell that the owner himself had not sold through his own individual efforts."

When asked by the court if that was the feature that appellant desired to present by the demurrer, he replied, "That was the main feature." The same attitude was maintained throughout the trial, and no suggestion was made that the complaint should have contained said allegation in reference to the license. Under such circumstances any doubt as to the sufficiency of the complaint in the respect indicated should, of course, be resolved against the appellant. Cushing v. Pires, 124 Cal. 663, 57 Pac. 572.

[3] 2. It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to show that the purchaser produced by plaintiff was financially able to pay for the property as required. The parties agreed to add $500 to the price to cover lumber on the premises, which had been furnished by appellant, and Mr. Lombardi, the proposed purchaser, seems to have understood that he was required to pay the entire sum of $10,000 in cash when the deed was executed. Upon the theory that the contract so provided, the court was justified in concluding that he was able to meet the demand. He had $1,813.15 in cash in bank, $600 in bonds, $6,000 on a one-day note of the California Associated Raisin Company, and a $6,000 interest in a land contract. The sufficiency of this last asset only is questioned by appellant. But, as pointed out by respondent, the Bank of Italy had offered to lend Lombardi the sum of $5,000 on this security, and we think it is an entirely reasonable inference that Lombardi was in a position to pay the whole amount if appellant had not declined to sell to him. The facts of Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514, 39 Pac. 200, 45 Am. St. Rep. 87, and Merzoian v. Kludjian, 191 Pac. 673, made an entirely different showing.

Moreover, the contract required the payment of only $1,000 immediately and the balance in annual payments of $1,000. This the terms of the contract leave in no doubt whatever; and though Lombardi was willing to make the entire payment at once, and the parties may have discussed the question as though the contract so provided, it cannot be controverted that it was sufficient for the purchaser to be able to meet the terms upon which the owner and the agent had agreed.

[4] 3. The third point rests upon the claim that the owner reserved the right to make the sale himself without being liable for a commission. Herein a question of fact may first be considered. It is not disputed that a sale to another party was made by appellant, but the controversy is as to whether it was prior or subsequent to the procurement by the agent of a purchaser. That said sale was not fully consummated until after plaintiff had produced Lombardi cannot be seriously questioned. Appellant, however, claims that it was only necessary for him to secure another purchaser who was ready, able, and willing to purchase in order to relieve him of liability; in other words, that the right and privilege he reserved was similar to that conferred upon the agent and that he actually secured such purchaser before Lombardi was produced. As to the fact, the defendant testified:

"On the day that Mr. Houston came there, on the 10th day of January, I had already sold the property to a man by the name of Ricketts, or, at least, Mr. Ricketts was on the property at that time and had told me prior to the time Mr. Houston arrived that he would take the place."

It was not disputed by plaintiff that, when he with Lombardi arrived at the place, Ricketts was there, and it must be accepted as a fact that said sale was agreed upon, though no deposit had been made nor had any instrument in writing been executed. But there can scarcely be any doubt that, if the power to sell without liability was reserved by the owner, it included the right to secure a purchaser ready to buy and thereby avoid the payment of any commission.

As to the principle of law involved, appellant cites Dreyfus v. Richardson, 20 Cal. App. 800, 130 Pac. 161; Snook v. Page, 29 Cal. App. 246, 155 Pac. 107; Roth v. Thompson, 40 Cal. App. 208, 180 Pac. 656; California Land Security Co. v. Ritchie, 40 Cal. App. 246, 180 Pac. 625; Faith v. Meisetschlager, 187 Pac. 61. In the first of these it is said:

"We attach little importance to the fact that defendant, without other consideration than the mutual covenants implied in the contract, made plaintiff her sole agent for an indefinite period. She not only had the right to revoke such agency at any time before he had secured a purchaser, since the agreement did not purport to give plaintiff an exclusive right of sale (Golden Gate Packing Co. v. Farmers' Union, 55 Cal. 606), and conceding that during the existence of the contract she was prohibited thereby from placing the property in the hands of another agent with authority to sell the same (Dole v. Sherwood, 41 Minn. 535, 16 Am. St. Rep. 731, 5 L. R. A. 720, 43 N. W. 569), she as owner, however, could without revoking the contract negotiate the sale thereof or accept an offer to purchase the same."

The Snook Case was to the same effect, the court saying that—

"If it had been the intention to deprive the owner of the right to sell, or in case of such sale to create a liability for commissions, it could, and no doubt would, have been easily and clearly expressed."

In the Roth Case it was held that the evidence was sufficient to support the finding of the lower court that the broker did not produce a purchaser ready, able and willing to buy the property, and in reference to the brokerage agreement it was said that—

"It cannot be construed as vesting in the plaintiff the exclusive right to sell the property. Indeed, it does not even go so far as to make him the exclusive agent for that purpose, nor does it specify any time during which his authority to sell should exist. Conceding it to be sufficient to have authorized him to sell the property, it is so phrased that the Thomsons were at liberty to terminate it at any time before he procured a purchaser able, willing, and ready to purchase on the terms stated therein. But, however this may be, it is clear, as stated, that the Thomsons had the right to sell the ranch without the assistance or intervention of the plaintiff."

In the California Land Security Company Case there was a similar brokerage agreement, and the same doctrine announced as to the right of the owner to sell before the broker had secured a purchaser, without being liable for a commission.

The Faith Case goes further in upholding the right of the owner to sell without being liable for a commission than any of the other decisions. Therein the brokerage contract provided:

"I hereby appoint the Action Realty Company of Fresno my agent, with the exclusive right to sell the property," etc.

However, the court held that, considered as a whole, the contract did not deprive the owner of the right to make a sale without any liability; the agent having failed to secure a purchaser.

Respondent claims that in the foregoing cases the broker never performed his contract, but sought to recover a commission by reason of the sale made by the owner; whereas herein "Houston does not seek to recover a commission because of Williams' sale to Ricketts, but because Houston performed fully, within the time limited, by producing Lombardi as a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy the real property under the terms and conditions and at the price fixed in the agency contract," and that the case falls within the rule announced in Blumenthal v. Goodall, 89 Cal. 251, 26 Pac. 906; Ropes v. John Rosenfeld's Sons, 145 Cal. 671, 79 Pac. 354; Sill v. Ceschi, 167 Cal. 639, 140 Pac. 949; Roth v. Moeller (Sup.) 197 Pac. 62. In the first of these it was held:

"Where a broker, employed to sell land, in good faith finds a purchaser within the period allowed by the terms of the written contract of employment, and prior to the revocation of his authority places the matter in such a position that success is practically certain and immediate, the revocation by the vendor of the broker's authority and the termination of his agency before the completion of the sale, against the express provisions of the contract of employment, does not deprive the broker of his right to his commissions, but the principal is liable therefor, if the purchaser is ready and willing to pay the purchase money before the expiration of the contract period."

In that case the contract of agency was as follows:

"I hereby authorize Mr. L. Oesterreicher to sell blocks 899, 900, 901, 903, outside lands, for the sum of $1,500 each; will allow him $100 as commissions for his services on each block. This contract to be in force for 10 days from date hereof."

The decision was based upon the theory that the owner had impliedly bound himself not to prevent the agent from earning his commission within the 10 days; in other words, if the agent secured a purchaser within that period, he was entitled to his commission, regardless of what might be done by the owner to prevent such sale. It is significant that the court cites with approval the case of Lane v. Albright, 49 Ind. 279, "where the owner of the real estate sold it pending the negotiations of the agent in making a sale, and prior to the expiration of the time given by the owners to the agent, and where the agent within the time given did find a purchaser," and quotes from said decision the following:

"The appellant performed all that he was required by the contract to do, and was prevented by the appellee from selling the land. The appellee disabled himself from carrying out the contract of sale made by the appellant. The fact that the appellee had authorized appellant to sell his land did not deprive himself of the power of selling it, but he could not thereby avoid his liability to appellant."

It is to be observed, also, that the Supreme Court distinguished the earlier case of Brown v. Pforr, 38 Cal. 550, by stating that—

"The contract in that case does not expressly stipulate that it shall remain in force 30 days, and the opinion of Justice Sanderson clearly intimates that, if there had been a provision in the contract that it should remain in force for such length of time, the defendant would not have been permitted to prevent performance and escape without making compensation to the agent."

Herein it may be said that it is expressly provided that the agency "is to continue for the period of 90 days," and the only difference between this case and Blumenthal v. Goodall is in the manner of the revocation of the agency; it being herein by a sale to another purchaser, and therein by an express notice that the owner revoked the authority of the agent and declined to proceed further in the consummation of the sale through him.

The Ropes Case approves the Blumenthal decision, but holds that the agent had not found a purchaser within the time limit and therefore had not earned his commission. These decisions are cited with approval in Sill v. Ceschi, supra, and it was said:

"Since the authorization was for 30 days, a revocation within that period would not have been effectual, if plaintiff, prior to the attempted cancellation, had expended money and effort in seeking to find a purchaser."

In Roth v. Moeller, supra, it was held that the agent, having carried out his agreement within the period prescribed to obtain the acceptance of a proposition to exchange properties, could not be deprived of his commission by the withdrawal of the offer on the part of his principal. However, a hearing was granted by the Supreme Court and a decision therein rendered by that tribunal on March 29 last. Roth v. Moeller, 197 Pac. 62. Therein as to revocation it was said:

"A principal may, however, curtail his right of revocation by contracting not to revoke the authority for a definite time. If the principal does so contract, he still retains the power to terminate the agency, and the termination cannot be prevented by the agent; but a revocation of authority within the designated period renders the principal liable for damages for the violation of a legal right of the agent, just as in the case of any other breach of contract"—citing cases.

But it was held that the contract of agency therein contained no provision that the authority of the agent should remain irrevocable for any period, and that the case falls within the principle of Brown v. Pforr, supra, and not of that line of decisions of which Blumenthal v. Goodall, supra, is an example. The court concluded that either party was at liberty at any time to terminate the relation of agency and that—

"Since plaintiff proved no services prior to the revocation entitling him to reimbursement, defendant was not liable for compensation under the contract, or for the value of services rendered."

It is manifest, from a consideration of the foregoing cases, that the Supreme Court makes a vital distinction between the provision in a contract of agency wherein the owner promises to pay the agent a commission "if within a certain period" he obtains a purchaser, and a provision expressly authorizing him for a definite period to sell the property, and agreeing that the agency shall continue for that period. In the former instance the provision is construed as a limitation upon the authority of the agent, and in the latter upon the right of revocation by the owner.

Herein, not only does the contract expressly limit the right of revocation by the owner, and the agent had obtained a purchaser within the prescribed period, but the case possesses an added feature, since evidence appears that, before the owner had any thought of selling to Ricketts, plaintiff had entered into negotiations with Lombardi for its purchase and had informed Williams that he had a proposed buyer. It is, indeed, a fair inference that the agent was in the midst of negotiations, "which were evidently and plainly approaching to success," and hence it would be just to apply the principle "that there was an implied contract on the part of the owner to allow a reasonable time for performance," and, as full performance was prevented by the act of the owner, the agent had earned his commission. Blumenthal v. Goodall, supra.

Moreover, the owner expressly agreed to sell to a purchaser that might be obtained by the agent. Of course, he could not sell the property to such purchaser, if he sold it to another. By selling to another within the prescribed period he necessarily violated this provision of the contract, and was liable for the commission since the agent performed his agreement. This provision is utterly inconsistent with the theory that the owner reserved the right to sell without being liable for compensation, notwithstanding the agent may have obtained a purchaser.

We are satisfied the decision is right, and the judgment is affirmed.

WAGNER et al. v. CITY OF INGLEWOOD et al. (Civ. 3588.)

1. Municipal corporations —33(2)—Description sufficient for private grant good enough in annexation proceedings.

If description of property contained in resolution for annexation of property to city is sufficiently definite to answer for a private grant or conveyance, it is sufficient for annexation purposes.

2. Evidence —23(2), 48—Judicial notice taken of government surveys and official acts.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, courts will take judicial notice of government surveys of public lands as public and official acts of the executive departments of the United States.

3. Municipal corporations —33(2)—Description of land in annexation proceedings may be aided by government maps.

A resolution for annexation of a tract of land to a city which described the lines of the tract as section lines is sufficient if, when aided by official map of the United States, of which the court may take notice, it is made certain.

4. Evidence —23(2)—Judicial notice taken of government map which showed projecting lines of confirmed Mexican grant.

Where the United States, on acquiring the territory of California from Mexico, confirmed private grants by that state in such territory, which grants overlapped the township section lines, and officially surveyed the land and mapped it, showing the projection of lines of the grant over the section lines, the map is one of which the court, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, may take judicial notice to aid description of territory annexed to city, including part of a private grant thus overlapping section lines, the lines of description being described as section lines, as against contention that, by reason of the fractional nature of sections, that map was of private nature as to the overlapping lines of private grant.

5. Municipal corporations —33(2)—Call in description in annexation proceedings held sufficiently definite.

Where resolution for annexation of territory to city in describing the land gave the commencement of a call and the terminus of the call, the contention that the line could not be followed because of curves at intersecting streets was untenable, the line being described as a straight line.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Suit by John Wagner and others against the City of Inglewood and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Clyde Woodworth, John Schlegel, and F. A. Stephenson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES J. Plaintiffs, alleging themselves to be property owners within certain territory proposed to be annexed by the municipality of Inglewood, brought this action to secure judgment declaring proceedings theretofore taken on the part of the municipality in the direction of effecting such annexation void, and to secure a decree enjoining said city from holding an election to decide the question of annexation. Demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and answer was filed. The cause went to trial, judgment being rendered against the plaintiffs. From that judgment this appeal has been taken.

It is contended that the evidence does not sustain the findings of the court as to the issue made by the pleadings respecting the boundaries of the district proposed to be annexed. It is because of alleged uncertainty in the boundaries described in the resolution of the board of trustees that the plaintiffs make their principal contention against the validity of the proceedings. It is first contended that the lines stated in that description as being lines of sections 22, 27, and 34, township 2 south, range 14 west, S. B. M., did not constitute such a description as would enable persons interested to determine the boundaries fixed by those lines, because there was no map on file as a public record showing that official surveys had been made of which the court might take judicial notice.

[3, 4] It is admitted by the appellants that if at the time of the making of the resolution there was of record any map made under the official direction of the United States land surveyors, which map showed all of the lines referred to in the description contained in the resolution, such description would then be sufficient—this with the qualification that a map as so made and existing must have been a map of the public lands of the United States. The qualification presents the contention that, even though through governmental agencies official surveys are made, platted, and recorded, judicial notice will only be taken of such portions of the map as delineate the public lands, and not portions showing lines projected upon lands owned in private.

In order to better understand the contentions of appellants it is necessary to make a further statement of facts:

Upon the acquisition of the territory of California from the government of Mexico, certain grants of land were held by individuals under authority of the latter government, which grants were later confirmed by the United States. In 1873 there was patented to one Abila by our government a large tract of land in and about the present municipal limits of the city of Inglewood under the name of Rancho Sausal Redondo. A patent and a map defining the boundaries of the grant were filed in the office of the United States Surveyor General at San Francisco, and a copy was recorded in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county at about the same time. The boundaries of that rancho at the north and east were irregular, in that they were not coincident with the south boundary line of section 22, or the west boundary line of sections 27 and 34 of the township mentioned, but were so laid that the rancho included portions of the southerly part of section 22 and the westerly part of sections 27 and 34. With this condition in mind, appellants use it as a basis for the argument that the sections of the public land, portions of which were included within the grant of the rancho, became fractional sections, and that therefore there could be no public survey which would show officially the southerly line of section 22 or the complete westerly lines of sections 27 and 34.

We cannot admit that the latter contention is a valid one, in view of the documentary evidence which the record discloses, and which was before the court at the trial. If the court had been limited to the patent issued to Abila and its attendant plat in determining whether the resolution contained a sufficient description as to the lines referred to, such evidence would be insufficient. However, defendants introduced before the court a map which purported to show complete township No. 2 south, with section lines indicated for the four sides of each of sections 22, 27, and 34, quarter section lines indicated on section 22, and on the east half of section 27. This map bore the following indorsement:

"The above map of township No. 2 south, range 14 west, San Bernardino Meridian, is strictly conformable to field notes of the survey thereof on file in this office which has been examined and approved. The Surveyor General's Office, San Francisco, Cal., March 31, 1868. L. Upson, Sur. Gen. Cal."

This map, it seems, was filed also in the United States Land Office at Los Angeles in 1871. As to its official character no question is made. The further indorsements on the map referred to designated various surveys which had been made use of in the preparation of the plat. There was first mentioned a survey of the north boundary of the township as having been made by Henry Washington, October 4, 1852, and this legend appears following: "Rest of township lines. Henry Hancock, July 5, 1853." Following these indorsements were legends referring to various rancho surveys, including this:

"Boundaries of Ro. Sausal Redondo, located by George Hanson under instructions from Surv. Gen. 1868. Section lines George Hanson, February 7, 1868."

The plat attached to the official patent of the Rancho Redondo bears the indorsement that the land represented thereon had been—"segregated from the adjoining public lands under direction from the U. S. Surveyor General by George Hansen, Dep. Sur. 1868."

This is not a case where upon the existence only of a patent map the court has assumed to take judicial notice of the existence of section lines. The plat relied upon by defendants is a general plat of the township, and in so far as it exhibited section lines or quarter section lines, even though such lines extended into or across lands granted by the government to a private owner, they nevertheless lost none of their official character; neither, in our opinion, does the map become, as to that part of it, a map merely of private lands, and hence not one of the records recognized under the provisions of section 1875, Code of Civil Procedure. Moreover, in a strict sense, at the time the section lines were surveyed and delineated by Hansen (according to the indorsement on the map) in 1868, the lands embraced within the boundaries of Rancho Redondo were still a part of the public domain; this for the reason that, while they may have been by that same survey segregated from the general body of the land of the United States, title was not confirmed in the grantee by patent issued until February, 1873. It has been held that persons entitled to land under grants of the Mexican government were considered not to have a vested interest in any particular land after the territory was acquired by the United States, but that they possessed a vested interest in a specific quantity of land which it was necessary to have allotted and measured off by the officers of our government before the right was confirmed. Waterman v. Smith, 13 Cal. 373. We think that the court was justified in looking to that map, and in taking judicial notice of all the boundaries officially expressed thereon.

ed fatal inaccuracy in the description used in the annexation proceedings. The particular call in the description as to which question is made reads as follows:

"Thence easterly in a straight line along the westerly prolongation of the southerly line of said Lindley Drive, the southerly line of said Lindley Drive and easterly prolongation of the said southerly line of Lindley Drive to the quarter section line which divides the east and west halves of section 26, township 2 south, range 14 west."

The whole difficulty claimed rests upon the fact that, at the intersection of a street which crossed Lindley Drive at right angles between the starting point and terminus, the corners of the street so intersecting the southerly line of Lindley Drive were turned in the form of arcs of a circle in order to allow room for a small public park located at the center of that intersection. Appellants' argument is that with the curved corners the line could not be followed as indicated in the description contained in the resolution. We find no difficulty in following that description, for, as counsel for respondents well say, the point of commencement of the last call in the description is plainly indicated; the terminus of the line is indicated as being in the section line at the east of the starting point; the line is stated to be a straight line; hence the curves at the intersecting street corners would be disregarded without creating any ambiguity or uncertainty as to what was intended to be indicated by the call.

The findings of the court appear to fairly determine the facts and to sustain the judgment as entered.

53 Cal. App. 93

GRISWOLD v. MORRISON et al.
(Civ. 3312.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 7, 1921.)

1. Fraud ☞42—Intent must be alleged.

Fraud has its foundation in intention, and that intention is a fact which ought to be alleged.

2. Contracts ☞328(1)—Partial failure of consideration may be pleaded in reduction of damages.

Where, as the result of fraud, there is a partial failure of the consideration of a contract, and the amount of damages is definite and can be ascertained by calculation, the fraud may be pleaded in reduction of damages as a defense pro tanto.

3. Sales ☞354(1)—Illegality and failure of consideration held insufficiently alleged in defense in action on note.

In an action on a note given for hogs, an affirmative defense alleging that defendants purchased the hogs for the purpose of fattening them for the market, which fact was communicated to plaintiff, that they were not sound, but were suffering from cholera, that the plaintiff knew the condition of the hogs at the time of the sale, but defendants did not, and by reason of diseased condition of the hogs the sale was illegal and contrary to public policy, was insufficient where it did not allege that plaintiff misrepresented the condition of the hogs or withheld from defendants knowledge of their condition for the purpose or with the intent to deceive or defraud, nor was a second defense good which in addition alleged that plaintiff represented that the hogs were sound and free from disease, and that by reason thereof there was a failure of consideration for the note in a certain amount.

4. Sales ☞251—"Fraudulent representation" and "warranty" distinguished.

A fraudulent representation is an antecedent statement made as an inducement to the contract, but is not a part or arrangement of the contract; while to constitute an express warranty the statement must be a part of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Fraudulent Representation; Warranty.]

5. Sales ☞261(2)—No particular forms of words essential to warranty, which depends on intention.

Although to constitute an express warranty no particular form of words is essential, and it is not necessary that the word "warranty" should be used, it must at least appear that the buyer understood that the seller's affirmation was a warranty; that is, that it was intended to be a part of the contract.

6. Set-off and counterclaim ☞44(1)—One or all joint tort-feasors may be sued.

As one may sue one or all of joint tort-feasors, and if he elects to sue but one is entitled to a judgment against that one, so a defendant may allege fraud of plaintiff and another who is not a party and set it up as a counterclaim under Code Civ. Proc. § 438.

7. Sales ☞364(1)—Instruction in action on note where fraud was defense held error.

In an action on a note given for hogs, where defendants set up as affirmative defenses that they purchased the hogs for the purpose of fattening them for the market, which fact they communicated to the plaintiff, that they were not sound, but were suffering from cholera, that the plaintiff knew the condition of the hogs at the time of the sale, but defendants did not, and by reason of diseased condition of the hogs the sale was illegal and contrary to public policy, and there was a failure of consideration in a certain amount, an instruction in substance that, if jury believed from a fair preponderance of the evidence that plaintiff represented to defendants that the hogs were sound and free from disease, that defendants believed such representation and relied thereon, and that the hogs when sold were not sound, then that they should find that plaintiff had been guilty of fraud and deception and had received the note under misrepresentation, was erroneous as permitting a finding of fraud in favor of defendants without requiring the jury to find a scienter, as the instruction should have required the jury to find not only that the representation was false, but that plaintiff had knowledge of its falsity, or what in law is equivalent to the proof of the scienter.

8. Fraud ☞13(2)—Representation must be knowingly made.

To constitute deceit the false representation must have been made with knowledge of its falsity or what in law is equivalent thereto and with intent to deceive.

9. Fraud ☞13(3)—Statement believed to be true when actual fraud.

A positive assertion in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true, does not constitute actual fraud unless it is made with intent to deceive the other party to the contract or to induce him to enter into it under Civ. Code, § 1572.

10. Bills and notes ☞358—One taking note as collateral for pre-existing debt holder for value.

An indorsee of a note merely as collateral security for a pre-existing debt owing to him by his indorser is a holder for value and in the usual course of business, and the note in the hands of such indorsee, if at the date of the indorsement it is taken without notice of any infirmity in the instrument, is not subject to existing equities between the original parties, under Civ. Code, §§ 3105-3110.

11. Bills and notes ☞357—Indorsee to indemnify against future loss holder for value.

The indorsee of a note, indorsed, not to secure a pre-existing indebtedness due to him from his indorser, but to indemnify him against future loss on account of an existing liability to a third person, is a transferee for value and in due course under Civ. Code, §§ 3105-3110, 3135.

12. Bills and notes ☞357—Indorsee for indemnity has lien on note.

A person to whom a promissory note has been indorsed as collateral to indemnify him against possible future loss arising out of an existing liability incurred for and on behalf of his indorser, under Civ. Code, § 3108, has a lien on the note to the extent of any loss that he may sustain by reason of such liability.

13. Bills and notes ☞334—Transferee of note as collateral for indemnity for liability assumed by him for transferer not affected by notice of infirmity in note not received until after assuming such liability.

Civ. Code, § 3135, providing that a transferee of a note receiving notice of infirmity therein before completing payment therefor is a holder in due course only to the extent of the amounts then paid by him, applies only where the obligation incurred by the holder of the note is such that, on such discovery of infirmity, he is relieved from all further legal obligation to make further payment, as, for example, where the note has been transferred in consideration of his future payments to the transferer, and hence was inapplicable to a case where note was transferred as collateral to indemnify the holder against possible future loss arising out of an existing liability to a bank incurred by the holder for and on behalf of the transferer, the liability of the holder to the bank being fixed and unconditional at the time of the transfer, so that he must have had notice of infirmity before transfer, to be affected thereby.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by H. H. Griswold against S. T. Morrison and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Ault & Anderson, of Calexico, for appellant.

Kenton A. Miller, of Los Angeles, and Utley & Smith, of Calexico, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action on a promissory note for $1,000, dated May 29, 1919, and executed by defendants to one Akers as payment for certain hogs bought by defendants from Akers. The latter, before the maturity of the note, indorsed and delivered it to plaintiff, who, claiming to be an innocent indorsee in due course of business, for value, and without notice of any infirmity in the instrument, sues defendants as the makers. The case was tried before a jury, the verdict was in favor of defendants, and from a judgment that he take nothing by the action, plaintiff appeals.

In their answer defendants set up two affirmative defenses and four counterclaims. In their first affirmative defense (designated in the answer as the second defense, the first defense consisting of denials) defendants allege, in substance and effect, that plaintiff and Akers owned the hogs, or plaintiff had some interest therein; that defendants purchased the hogs for the purpose of fattening them for the market, which fact was communicated to plaintiff and Akers; that the hogs were not sound, but were suffering from cholera; that plaintiff and Akers knew the condition of the hogs at the time of the sale, but defendants did not; and that, by reason of the diseased condition of the hogs, their sale to defendants was illegal and contrary to public policy. There is no allegation that plaintiff or Akers misrepresented the condition of the hogs or that either withheld from defendants knowledge of their condition for the purpose or with the intent to deceive or defraud. In short, nowhere in defendants' first affirmative defense is there any allegation of scienter or of fraudulent intent.

The second affirmative defense (designated in the answer as the third defense), after repeating the allegations of the first affirmative defense, alleges that plaintiff and Akers represented to defendants that the hogs were sound and free from disease; that, shortly after their purchase by defendants, some of the hogs, the aggregate value whereof was $764, died from cholera; and that by reason thereof there has been a failure of consideration for the note to the amount of $764.

In their counterclaims defendants allege that they purchased the hogs from plaintiff and Akers; that plaintiff and Akers falsely represented that the hogs were sound and free from all contagious or infectious diseases; that defendants relied upon such representations; that such representations, when made, were known by plaintiff and Akers to be false, and were made with the intent to defraud defendants; that upon discovering the falsity of the representations and that the hogs were suffering from cholera, defendants tendered them back to plaintiff and Akers and demanded a rescission of the contract of sale and the return of the promissory note, which, it is alleged, plaintiff and Akers refused to do; that, by reason of the cholera with which the hogs were affected, defendants were damaged in various sums, namely, $60 for veterinary services and medicines furnished the hogs, $150 for wages paid a man to care for the hogs while they were suffering from cholera, $1,000 damages to defendants' ranch by reason of the presence of the diseased hogs thereon and the dissemination of the cholera germs, and $1,000 damages resulting from loss of profits that would have been made had the hogs been sound and had they been sold by defendants after they had been fattened for the market.

To each affirmative defense and counterclaim plaintiff interposed a general demurrer, which he claims should have been sustained.

[1-3] The first affirmative defense is fatally defective in that it fails to allege that either plaintiff or Akers made any false representation fraudulently, or that either of them concealed the condition of the hogs with intent to deceive. Where, as the result of fraud, there is a partial failure of consideration, and the amount of damages is definite and can be ascertained by calculation, the fraud may be pleaded in reduction of damages as a defense pro tanto (Russ, etc., Co. v. Muscupiabe, etc., Co., 120 Cal. 529, 52 Pac. 995, 65 Am. St. Rep. 186; Harrington v. Stratton, 22 Pick. [Mass.] 510; Burnett v. Smith, 4 Gray [Mass.] 50); but, to avail himself of such defense, the defendant must show affirmatively a right of action in his favor arising out of the fraud (Reese v. Gordon, 19 Cal. 147). It has been held that if, with the intent to deceive his vendee, the vendor of such food animals as hogs or cattle, knowing that they are diseased and that the vendee intends them for the market, nevertheless sells them at a sound price, and the vendee is ignorant of their true condition, the vendor is guilty of a fraudulent concealment, and the rule of caveat emptor does not apply. Grigsby v. Stapleton, 94 Mo. 423, 7 S. W. 421; Puls v. Hornbeck, 24 Okl. 288, 103 Pac. 665, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 202, 138 Am. St. Rep. 883. But in such cases it is necessary to allege that the concealment was with intent to deceive. Hanson v. Edgerly, 29 N. H. 343; Clark v. Bamer, 2 Lans. (N. Y.) 67; Jordan & Sons v. Pickett, 78 Ala. 331. Fraud has its foundation in intention, and that intention is a fact which ought to be alleged. It is one of the facts constituting the fraud. Woodroof v. Howes, 88 Cal. 190, 26 Pac. 111; Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 528, 21 Pac. 984, 4 L. R. A. 826, 12 Am. St. Rep. 162; Sheldon v. Davidson, 85 Wis. 133, 55 N. W. 161; Spead v. Tomlinson, 73 N. H. 46, 59 Atl. 376, 68 L. R. A. 433; Zabriskie v. Smith, 13 N. Y. 322, 64 Am. Dec. 551. Though it has been said that the intent to deceive must be charged in positive terms, and not left to inference (Bartholomew v. Bentley, 15 Ohio, 659, 45 Am. Dec. 596; McKibbin v. Ellingson, 58 Minn. 205, 59 N. W. 1003, 49 Am. St. Rep. 499), we think that, if the terms employed by the pleader, taken in their ordinary signification, necessarily include the idea of fraudulent intent, that is enough. Thus, for example, it is a sufficient allegation of fraudulent intent to aver that the false representation or the concealment was fraudulently made. Sallies v. Johnson, 85 Conn. 77, 81 Atl. 974, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 386. Unfortunately for respondents, they are not in a position to avail themselves of this liberal rule; for nowhere in their first affirmative defense is any fact alleged from which an intent to deceive may be inferred. It is not even alleged that plaintiff or Akers knew, or had reason to believe, that defendants were ignorant of the diseased condition of the hogs. True, it is alleged that defendants did not know and that plaintiff and Akers did know that the hogs were sick and diseased; but there is no allegation that plaintiff or Akers was aware of defendants' ignorance respecting the true condition of the hogs. There is, therefore, a failure to allege facts showing a fraudulent intent, and for that reason the demurrer to the first affirmative defense should have been sustained.

Respondents, as their sole reply to appellant's objection to the sufficiency of the first affirmative defense, contend that the defense is based, not on fraud, but on the illegality of the contract. There is no merit in this contention. Because the Penal Code makes it a crime to suffer infected animals "to be driven on the public highway" (Pen. Code, § 402d), respondents argue that the contract of sale was contrary to public policy and void. But there is no allegation that the contract of sale contemplated that the hogs should be "driven" on the public highway. For aught that appears from the allegations of the first affirmative defense, it is quite possible that the hogs were to be conveyed to respondents' ranch without being "driven" thereto, or without being driven thereto on any "public highway."

[4, 5] What we have said of the first affirmative defense applies with equal force to the second, unless, as respondents claim, the second affirmative defense shows the breach of an express warranty. The sole basis for the claim that there was an express warranty is the allegation that at the time of the sale plaintiff and Akers "represented to the defendants that said hogs so purchased were in good health and sound physical condition and free from cholera or other infectious or contagious diseases and were merchantable hogs." There is a definite distinction between a fraudulent representation and a warranty. A fraudulent representation is an antecedent statement made as an inducement to the contract, but is not a part or element of the contract. On the other hand, to constitute an express warranty, the statement must be a part of the contract. 35 Cyc. pp. 368, 372. Although, to constitute an express warranty, no particular form of words is essential, and it is not necessary that the word "warranty" should be used, it must at least appear that the buyer understood that the seller's affirmation was a warranty; that is, that it was intended to be a part of the contract. 24 R. C. L. p. 167; 35 Cyc. 374. Here there is no allegation that plaintiff or Akers "warranted" the soundness of the hogs, nor is there any equivalent averment, as, for example, an averment that the buyer understood that the alleged representation was to be a part of the contract of sale. For these reasons we think that the demurrer to the second affirmative defense should have been sustained.

[6] Each counterclaim alleges that plaintiff and Akers falsely and fraudulently represented that the hogs were sound and free from disease. Akers is not a party to the action. A counterclaim must be one in favor of a defendant against a plaintiff "between whom a several judgment might be had in the action." Code Civ. Proc. § 438. Appellant claims that if, as alleged by respondents in their counterclaims, he and Akers together fraudulently misrepresented the condition of the hogs, there could be no several judgment against him in favor of respondents, but only a joint judgment against himself and Akers, and that therefore any damages which defendants may have suffered by reason of the alleged fraud cannot be set off as a counterclaim in this action. This, as we understand it, is the sole objection urged here by appellant against the sufficiency of the counterclaims. There is no merit in that objection.

The counterclaims are based on tort; i. e., the fraud alleged to have been perpetrated by appellant and Akers upon respondents. If, as the counterclaims allege, plaintiff and Akers were guilty of fraud, they were joint tort-feasors. But a plaintiff may sue one or all of joint tort-feasors (30 Cyc. 122); and if he elects to sue but one he is entitled to a judgment against that one (Chetwood v. California Nat. Bank, 113 Cal. 426, 45 Pac. 704; Dawson v. Schloss, 93 Cal. 194, 29 Pac. 31). This, therefore, is a case where, if the allegations of the counterclaims be true, defendants are entitled to a several judgment against plaintiff. See Walker v. Johnson, 28 Minn. 147, 9 N. W. 632.

Appellant complains of certain instructions given by the court. From so much of the testimony as is set forth in the briefs, we infer that there was no evidence that appellant was a part owner of the hogs or that he had any interest therein or any direct connection with their sale. The theory that respondents adopted at the trial seems to have been substantially this, that appellant was not an indorsee of the note for value and in due course of business, and that, therefore, he held the note subject to respondents' defense of fraud in the sale of the hogs.

[7-9] By instruction No. 11 the court, in substance, charged the jury that, if they believed from a fair preponderance of the evidence that Akers represented to defendants that the hogs were sound and free from disease, that defendants believed such representation and relied thereon, and that the hogs, when sold, were not sound, then that they should find that Akers had been guilty of fraud and deception and had received the note from defendants under misrepresentation. This instruction is assailed on the ground that it permits a finding of fraud in favor of defendants without requiring the jury to find a scienter. The criticism is that the instruction should have required the jury to find, not only that the representation was false, but that Akers had knowledge of its falsity, or what in law is equivalent to proof of the scienter. The criticism is just. We are aware of no authority which will sanction a defense grounded on deceit unless the false representation has been made with knowledge of its falsity, or what in law is equivalent thereto, and with intent to deceive. A misrepresentation knowingly made is sufficient to warrant an inference of fraudulent intent; but to hold that the knowledge or the intent of the person making the misrepresentation is immaterial would be against principle and authority. Trimble v. Reid, 97 Ky. 713, 31 S. W. 861; Stone v. Denny, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 151; Cowley v. Dobbins, 136 Mass. 401.

Respondents remind us that the positive assertion, in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it, of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true, is, in law, the equivalent of actual knowledge of the falsity. Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 2. But the vice of the instruction is that it did not require the jury to find either that Akers had actual knowledge of the falsity of the alleged misrepresentation or the legal equivalent of such actual knowledge. While it is true that there are cases where the author of a false assertion may be guilty of actionable deceit though he believes his representation to be true, yet the facts upon which this constructive knowledge is made to depend should be found by the jury under appropriate instructions. The instruction here complained of entirely ignores the element of scienter. Moreover, the positive assertion, in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it, of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true, does not constitute actual fraud unless it be made with intent to deceive the other party to the contract or to induce him to enter into it. Civ. Code, § 1572. The instruction entirely ignores the necessity of such intent. The giving of the instruction was prejudicial error, necessitating a reversal of the judgment and a new trial.

By instruction No. 12 the jury was told, in substance and effect, that if plaintiff purchased the note before maturity, for a valuable consideration, and in good faith, without knowledge of the alleged infirmity in the instrument, and honestly advanced money upon the faith of the note, then he "would be entitled to recover only such sum or sums as he honestly advanced upon the face of said note in good faith before he was notified or informed by the defendants that said hogs were suffering from cholera or other infectious or contagious diseases." Appellant claims that this instruction is misleading in that it assumes that, instead of purchasing the note outright, he made advancements thereon from time to time. Respondents, on the other hand, assert that appellant parted with nothing before he received notification of their rescission of the contract, and that therefore he stands in no better position than his indorser, Akers.

To understand the criticism aimed at this instruction, it is necessary to make a further statement of the facts. It seems that prior to and at the date of the sale of the hogs Akers was indebted to two banks in sums that aggregated $762. To each of these banks Akers had executed his promissory note for the amount of his indebtedness. Appellant, in some manner not disclosed by the record, but probably as an accommodation indorser, was liable for the payment of these notes. The record does not show when Akers' notes to the banks matured. We have no means of knowing whether either of them had matured prior to the transfer by Akers to appellant of the note that is in suit here. On the very day that respondents executed to Akers, as payee, their note for $1,000 in payment for the hogs, Akers indorsed and delivered it to appellant. At the same time appellant gave Akers $50, who at the time was further indebted to appellant in the sum of $36.20, the balance due appellant on a note previously executed to him by Akers. Some months after the transfer to appellant of the note in suit here—the note for $1,000 that respondents had given to Akers in payment for the hogs—appellant paid to the banks the amounts due upon the two notes upon which he was liable as a guarantor or surety for Akers. At the time when Akers indorsed and transferred to appellant the note in litigation here, they agreed that after appellant should succeed in collecting from respondents the principal and interest of the note, and after he had reimbursed himself for any sums that he might have to pay to the two banks on account of Akers' notes to those institutions, and after he had satisfied, from his collection on respondents' note, the other amounts owing him by Akers, namely, the sums of $50 and $36.20, respectively, the balance of his collection on the $1,000 note should be paid to Akers. From these facts it is apparent that the note in suit here was transferred by Akers to appellant as collateral security: (1) To secure an indebtedness of $86.20 then due to appellant from Akers, made up of the $50 that he then was loaning Akers (under the facts stated the $50 was received by Akers as a loan) and the $36.20 that was due to appellant as the balance of a note previously given him by Akers; and (2) to secure or indemnify appellant against any loss that he might sustain by reason of his liability on the two notes that Akers had executed to the banks—obligations for which, as between themselves, Akers was liable as the primary debtor and appellant as a guarantor or surety only. The day after Akers indorsed the note to appellant the latter was informed by respondents that they had rescinded the contract of sale on account of the alleged false representation, or fraudulent concealment, respecting the condition of the hogs.

[10] If appellant was without notice of the alleged fraud at the time when respondents' note was indorsed to him by Akers, then, without doubt, instruction No. 12 is not only erroneous, but prejudicial; for in that event appellant, regardless of any notice that he subsequently may have received respecting Akers' fraud in the sale of the hogs, would be entitled to recover from respondents the sum of $86.20 at least; i. e., the said sum of $50 that he loaned to Akers at the time when the note was indorsed to him, and Akers' pre-existing indebtedness of $36.20, the balance due on the note previously executed by Akers to appellant. A more difficult problem is presented by the question whether, as to the $762 for which appellant was liable to the banks as an accommodation indorser for Akers, the former took the note in litigation as a holder for value and in due course of business.

While there has been much conflict in the decisions, it is the established law in the federal courts and in most states, including our own, that an indorsee of a note merely as collateral security for a pre-existing debt owing to him by his indorser is a holder for value and in the usual course of business, and the note, in the hands of such indorsee, if at the date of the indorsement it is taken without notice of any infirmity in the instrument, is not subject to existing equities between the original parties. This is the majority rule, and is usually referred to as the federal rule; while the contrary rule, which until the adoption of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law, prevailed in New York and about a dozen other states, is frequently referred to as the New York rule. 8 Corp. Jur. 488. The federal rule is, as we have said, the one that obtains in this state. Sackett v. Johnson, 54 Cal. 107; Negotiable Instruments Law (Civ. Code, §§ 3105-3110); note to German Am. Bk. v. Wright, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 387.

[11] The difficult question with which we are confronted is this: Under the so-called federal rule, is the indorsee of a note, indorsed, not to secure a pre-existing indebtedness due to him from his indorser, but to indemnify him against future loss on account of an existing liability to a third person, a transferee for value and in due course?

Though he was liable to each bank for the amount that it had loaned Akers, still, until appellant paid the amounts due the banks, Akers, who was primarily liable therefor, did not become appellant's debtor. As to the amounts that appellant was obliged to pay to the banks to satisfy these obligations for which Akers was primarily liable, the note in suit here was not indorsed to appellant by Akers to secure an existing indebtedness then owing to him by Akers. Rather, as to those amounts, the note was indorsed to appellant as indemnity to indemnify or secure him harmless against future possible loss, namely, loss in the event that he should thereafter become obliged to pay the amounts that Akers had borrowed from the banks. Under these circumstances, is appellant protected by the so-called federal rule? We have found no case directly in point. Of the cases to which our attention has been called, those most nearly in point are two Alabama cases, Bank of Mobile v. Hall, 6 Ala. 639, 41 Am. Dec. 72; and Andrews v. McCoy, 8 Ala. 920, 42 Am. Dec. 669. Those cases would be in point but for the fact that the New York, and not the federal, rule obtains in Alabama. In these two Alabama cases the Supreme Court of that state held that a negotiable instrument received as indemnity against a possible future loss, even though that loss afterwards actually occur, is not taken in the usual course of trade, and therefore the note remains subject to existing equities between the original parties. But, as we have said, Alabama is one of those states where the so-called New York rule obtains, or, at any rate, did obtain at the date of those decisions. So that these Alabama cases may not be persuasive precedents in states where, as with us, the federal rule prevails.

So far as the question before us is concerned, we are unable to see any distinction between an antecedent debt in the form of an absolute obligation due to the transferee from his transferor and an existing, but previously created, liability upon which the transferee may suffer a future loss or damage, even though that loss may be contingent upon the failure of the transferor to pay the debt for which his transferee, for his accommodation, became liable as a guarantor or surety. It seems to us to be sufficient if the transferor of the collateral note is in such contract relation with his transferee as renders it advantageous to the latter to have additional security for the performance by his transferor of the antecedent obligation. This conclusion finds support in the reasoning pursued in the following cases: First Nat. Bank v. Busch, 102 Minn. 365, 113 N. W. 898; Brown v. James, 80 Neb. 475, 114 N. W. 591; State Bank v. Holland, 60 Tex. Civ. App. 515, 128 S. W. 435; Forstall v. Fussell, 50 La. Ann. 249, 23 South. 273; Lee v. Whitney, 149 Mass. 447, 21 N. E. 948.

We can see no force in the argument advanced by the Alabama court to the effect that, because the transferee of the note given as collateral security may never have to pay anything on account of the pre-existing liability assumed by him for the benefit of his transferor, he therefore should not be regarded as a holder in due course. In every case where collateral is put up to secure the performance of an obligation, as, for instance, the payment of a debt immediately owing to the transferee by his transferor, it is possible that the security may never have to be enforced. It is always possible that the debtor may pay his debt without making resort to the security necessary. And yet no court, in a jurisdiction where the federal rule obtains, would for a moment hold that the indorsee of a note transferred to secure an antecedent debt due to him from his indorser was not a transferee for value and in due course merely because the indorser might voluntarily pay the debt that he owes his indorsee without compelling the latter to have recourse to the note given as security.

The Alabama cases, it will be noticed, proceed upon the theory, not that value was given for the note, but that the transaction is not a dealing in the usual course of trade. Such a holding is not warranted by the Negotiable Instruments Law of this state. That law defines a holder in due course as one—"who has taken the instrument under the following conditions: (1) That it is complete and regular upon its face; (2) that he became the holder of it before it was overdue, and without notice that it had been previously dishonored, if such was the fact; (3) that he took it in good faith and for value; (4) that at the time it was negotiated to him he had no notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating it." Civ. Code, § 3133; Stats. 1917, p. 1540.

If appellant had no notice of the infirmity in the note at the time when it was indorsed to him, then he took it under all the conditions prescribed in this Code section as those necessary to constitute one a "holder in due course," unless it can be said that he did not take it for "value." Under the reasoning pursued by the courts in First National Bank v. Busch, supra, Brown v. James, supra, State Bank v. Holland, supra, Forstall v. Fussell, supra, and Lee v. Whitney, supra, appellant did take the note for value even though, with respect to his liability on Akers' notes to the banks, his danger of loss thereon was not absolute but contingent.

[12] Moreover, appellant is a "holder for value" under the Code definition obtaining in this state since the enactment of the Negotiable Instruments Law. Section 3108 of our Civil Code now reads:

"Where the holder has a lien on the instrument, arising either from contract or by implication of law, he is deemed a holder for value to the extent of his lien."

A person to whom a promissory note has been indorsed as collateral to indemnify him against possible future loss arising out of an existing liability incurred for and on behalf of his indorser has a lien on the note to the extent of any loss that he may sustain by reason of such liability. Plaintiff, therefore, became a holder of the note for value to the extent of the amounts for which he was liable to the banks as a guarantor or surety for Akers.

[13] We are not unmindful that it also is provided by the Negotiable Instruments Law (Civ. Code, § 3135, as amended in 1917) that—

"Where the transferee receives notice of any infirmity in the instrument * * * before he has paid the full amount agreed to be paid therefor, he will be deemed a holder in due course only to the extent of the amount theretofore paid by him."

In our opinion this provision is applicable only where the obligation incurred by the holder of the note is such that, on discovering the infirmity in the instrument, he is relieved from all further legal obligation to make any further payment, as, for example, where the note has been transferred to him in consideration of his promise to make future payments to his transferer. In that case, if it should turn out that, by reason of fraud on the part of the transferer, the maker of the note had a defense thereto, the transferee would be under no legal obligation to pay the balance of the amount that he had agreed to pay to his transferer as a consideration for the transfer. In the instant case, however, appellant's liability to the banks continued regardless of any discovery he may have made respecting the fraud alleged to have been perpetrated by his transfer on these respondents as the makers of the note. Appellant's antecedent liability to the banks was the consideration for the transfer of the note to him as collateral security. The extent of that liability never varied after the note was indorsed to him. His liability to the banks was fixed and unconditional, even though his loss or damage by reason of that liability were contingent upon the failure of Akers to pay to the banks the amounts due from him as the primary obligor. Appellant's liability to the banks being fixed, definite, and unconditional, it follows that, unless he had notice of the alleged fraud at the time when the note was transferred to him, he is in the position of an indorsee who does not receive notice of the infirmity until after the completion of his purchase of the note for value. And the rights of such a purchaser are not affected by such after-acquired notice. The meaning of section 3135 of the Civil Code is substantially this: If the transferee receives notice of the infirmity before he has paid all the consideration for the note, he is a bona fide holder for value only to the extent that he had paid the consideration that he agreed to give. But in the instant case the consideration for the indorsement of the note to appellant, in addition to the $50 and the $36.20, consisted of appellant's pre-existing and unconditional liability to pay certain fixed and definite debts for which, as between themselves, his indorser was primarily liable, namely, the amounts due or to become due to the banks. Appellant's liability to the banks, as a guarantor or surety for Akers, was, of itself, a sufficient consideration for the indorsement of the note to appellant. As having some bearing upon this phase of the question, see Miller v. Marks, 46 Utah, 257, 148 Pac. 412.

For the foregoing reasons we conclude that the instruction No. 12 was misleading and not applicable to the facts of this case.

CONDLEY v. CONSOLIDATED LUMBER CO. (Civ. 3467.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 26, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 25, 1921.)

The conclusion at which we have arrived respecting instructions 11 and 12 renders it unnecessary to consider any of appellant's remaining assignments of error. What we have said should suffice to guide court and counsel on the retrial of the case.

There is one other fact that, perhaps, ought to be mentioned. Prior to the sale to respondents Akers had given appellant a chattel mortgage on the hogs. Though the evidence upon this phase of the case is exceedingly fragmentary and unsatisfactory, we infer that this mortgage had been given to appellant to indemnify him against any loss that he might sustain by reason of his liability on Akers' notes to the banks. Appellant did not release the chattel mortgage on the hogs until July 9, 1919, or about six weeks after the indorsement to him of the note that had been given by respondents for the purchase price of the hogs. Because appellant had agreed to turn over to Akers any balance of the proceeds of respondents' note, after he had reimbursed himself for all amounts previously loaned by him to Akers and any sums that he might have to pay to the banks on account of Akers' indebtedness thereto, we have concluded that the indorsement of the note to appellant was for the purpose of security only. We have inferred that the note was indorsed to appellant either as additional security to the chattel mortgage or as a substitute security. It is possible, however, that, when all the facts are adduced on the retrial of the case, it may appear that it was agreed between Akers and appellant that the latter's surrender or release of the chattel mortgage should, of itself, constitute, in part at least, the consideration for Akers' indorsement of the note to appellant. If so, it may be that such agreement alone would constitute a sufficient consideration for the transfer, thus affording a different, but sufficient, ground for holding that appellant is a holder for value and in due course. However, as we have said, the evidence upon this phase of the case is hopelessly uncertain and indefinite, and for that reason we have preferred to reach our decision without considering what favorable effect, if any, this chattel mortgage and the release thereof may have upon appellant's claim to be a holder of the note for value and in due course.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to sustain appellant's demurrers to respondents' first and second affirmative defenses (designated in the answer as the second and third defenses, respectively), with leave to respondents to amend their answer should they be so advised.

1. Sales ⇨181(11)—Evidence held insufficient to support finding that buyer was ready, willing, and able to perform contract.

In buyer's action for failure to deliver, in which the seller claimed that buyer by failure to make payments according to the contract violated the contract, justifying the seller in repudiating it and in refusing to deliver the goods, evidence held insufficient to support finding that the buyer was at all times ready, willing, and able to perform the contract and to pay for the goods.

2. Sales ⇨181(11)—Evidence insufficient to prove waiver by seller of payment at time specified by contract.

In buyer's action for failure to deliver, following seller's repudiation of contract for buyer's failure to make payments according to the contract, evidence held insufficient to support finding that seller waived the making of payments at the times specified by the contract.

3. Sales ⇨174—Buyer's failure to make payment at time specified in contract justified seller in repudiating contract and refusing to deliver.

On buyer's failure to make payment at the time specified in the contract, the seller was not required to sue for the purchase price, but could repudiate the contract and refuse to deliver the goods.

4. Sales ⇨82(1)—Time held of essence of contract for sale of lumber.

In contract for sale and delivery of lumber, providing for payment of price at specified times, time was of the essence of the contract, though the contract did not expressly so state.

5. Sales ⇨195—Inability to request delivery did not excuse failure to make payment at time specified by contract.

Where contract for sale of lumber provided for payment of purchase price, a part 30 days from date, and the balance 30 days thereafter, and provided for delivery of the lumber when requested by buyer, the fact that the lumber was to be used for a bridge to be constructed by the municipality under proceedings authorized by the Vrooman Act, and that delay in the procedure prevented the buyer from requesting delivery, did not excuse buyer from making payments at times specified by the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Darrell Condley, doing business under the fictitious name and style of the Darrell Condley Company, against the Consolidated Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Turner & Grainger, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

G. C. De Garmo, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover damages for the alleged breach of a contract by defendant. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals.

The material facts are that on May 12, 1919, plaintiff, by a written order addressed to defendant, directed it to deliver certain lumber and building material to a designated place for the purpose of constructing a bridge, and in said order agreed "to pay for said lumber and building material the sum of $1,299 net as follows: One-half in 30 days from date; balance 30 days thereafter—which order was duly accepted in writing by defendant. While the order was silent upon the subject, the parties stipulated that delivery of the material was to be made "when and as requested by plaintiff."

Plaintiff made default in the payment of the amount, which under the order was due and payable 30 days from the date thereof, and about June 30, 1919 (prior to which time defendant had without success sought plaintiff's permission to deliver the material), and during negotiations between the parties for the purchase of another bill of lumber from defendant, which plaintiff declined to make at the price offered, the latter stated that he was going to hold defendant to the contract here involved. Thereupon the manager of defendant said, "I am ready to deliver the Sherman street job right now," and stated, "I am not going to hold onto that lumber unless you pay 5 per cent. on it," which payment plaintiff refused to make because, as he said, "I don't have to." Thereupon defendant's manager said, "We will cancel the contract," and further said that the company would not deliver the lumber in accordance therewith. And thus the matter stood until November 18, 1919, when plaintiff, through his attorney and without making payment of all or any part of the amount which he had agreed to pay within 30 and 60 days from the date of the order, demanded of defendant that it deliver the material in accordance therewith, and later, on December 1, 1919, he, subject to the condition that defendant should first deliver the material, offered to pay therefor. Defendant refused to make the delivery, and thereupon plaintiff purchased like material elsewhere at a price of $771 in excess of that for which defendant had agreed to deliver the same.

[1-3] In our opinion, the facts thus stated are insufficient to support the finding made by the court that plaintiff, subsequent to May 12, 1919, was at all times ready, willing, and able to perform all the terms and conditions of the contract on his part, and to accept and pay for said lumber, and likewise insufficient to support the finding that there was a waiver on the part of defendant of plaintiff's covenant to make payments as provided in the order. Indeed, there appears no evidence whatever tending to sustain this last finding. It clearly appears that defendant was at all times between May 12th and June 30th able, ready, willing, and anxious to deliver the lumber, which, however, plaintiff refused to accept. It also conclusively appears that plaintiff not only made default in the payment which he was required to make 30 days after May 12th, but when, on June 30th, demand was made upon him to pay a part of said sum, he refused to do so, notwithstanding which fact he insists that defendant should be compelled to hold the lumber upon an advancing market for a period of more than 6 months, and then, contrary to the terms of the contract, deliver it before receiving payment therefor. Assuming that plaintiff could thus delay delivery until such time, nevertheless the contract clearly obligated him to make the payments at the times stated therein. When, therefore, plaintiff not only suffered the default, but upon demand therefor refused to pay any part of the amount called for by the contract, defendant, while it might have brought an action on the contract for recovery of the sum due, was not bound to pursue such remedy, but with equal right might, as it did, repudiate the contract and refuse to deliver the lumber.

In California Sugar, etc., Agency v. Penoyar, 167 Cal. 274, 139 Pac. 671, the court, quoting from Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co. v. Amalgamated Oil Co., 156 Cal. 776, 106 Pac. 55, said:

"A refusal without sufficient cause by the seller to furnish, or by the buyer to take or pay for, any installment, justifies the repudiation of the contract by the party not in default."

Clearly at the time these payments became due and payable under the terms of the contract defendant was not in default. The case of Percival v. National Drama Corporation, 181 Cal. 631, 185 Pac. 972, is authority for the proposition that, while the mere failure of a master to pay wages to a servant does not amount to a discharge, the servant may, at his option, quit the employment and sue for the amount unpaid. The principle announced is applicable to the facts involved in the instant case, and is authority for the proposition that, when plaintiff made default in the payment of the installment due June 12th, defendant, at its option, could, on account of such default, declare the contract terminated. Jensen v. Goss, 39 Cal. App. 427, 179 Pac. 225, likewise sustains the proposition that where the buyer makes default in the payment of money agreed to be paid for the purchase of personal property, the seller is justified in repudiating the contract. To the same effect are Demateis v. Vezu, 193 Pac. 793, and United Canneries Co. v. Seelye, 192 Pac. 341.

[4] Defendant's rights were in no wise prejudiced by the fact that the contract contained no clause stating that time was made the essence thereof.

"In mercantile contracts, such as contracts for the * * * sale of goods and the like, it is generally held that the parties have intended time to be of the essence of the contract." 13 Corpus Juris, 688; Minaker v. California Canners Co., 138 Cal. 239, 71 Pac. 110; Jensen v. Goss, supra.

[5] A large part of the record is devoted to what appears to be the fact, that plaintiff desired the lumber and material for a bridge to be constructed for a municipality under proceedings authorized by the Vrooman Act, and conceding that delay in the procedure might have excused plaintiff from accepting the lumber, since, as he says, he had no place to put it, nevertheless we are unable to perceive how such fact could excuse him from making the payments which he agreed to make, and, in default thereof, insist upon defendant carrying the lumber for an indefinite period upon an advancing market, and assume the hazard of the continued default of plaintiff. The enforcement of such a rule would be grossly unjust and inequitable.

We hold there is no evidence in support of the finding that defendant waived plaintiff's covenant to make the payments as provided in the contract; that it clearly appears that plaintiff made default therein; that by reason of such fact, and in the absence of any sufficient excuse for such nonperformance of the obligation on his part, plaintiff is in no position to assert any right upon the contract in this action. Hence we deem it unnecessary to enter upon a discussion of other alleged errors upon which defendant predicates its claim for a reversal.

The judgment is reversed.

BRIDGES v. TEFFT et al. (Civ. 3316.)

1. Corporations ⇨253—Stockholder not liable on judgment against corporation.

A stockholder's liability is separate and independent from that of the corporation, and commences with and is dependent on the original indebtedness, and no new liability of the stockholder on the original obligation is created by a judgment against the corporation.

2. Corporations ⇨268(1)—Complaint against stockholder held to state a cause of action on original debt, though alleging recovery of judgment against corporation.

Though a complaint against a stockholder alleged the recovery of a judgment against the corporation, which was unpaid, averments therein that the corporation was indebted to plaintiff for a sum deposited by him as part payment on the purchase price of an automobile, which the corporation neglected to deliver within the time agreed on, whereupon plaintiff rescinded the contract and demanded the return of such payment, were sufficient to state a cause of action against such stockholder on the original indebtedness.

3. Sales ⇨117, 391(5)—On failure to deliver automobile as contracted for within time stipulated, purchaser may rescind and recover advance payment.

On the failure of a corporation to deliver an automobile as contracted for within the time agreed on, there accrues to the purchaser the right to rescind the contract, and to recover the money advanced by him on the purchase price.

4. Sales ⇨390—Purchaser of automobile, on rescission of contract for nondelivery within agreed time, may sue in assumpsit for money paid on purchase price.

On the rescission by the purchaser of an automobile of the contract of sale, on the failure of the seller to deliver such a car as was contracted for within the time agreed on, such contract ceases to exist, and the purchaser may sue in indebitatus assumpsit as for money had and received, for which he had received no consideration, and such complaint may be in the form of a common count in assumpsit.

5. Corporations ⇨264—Statute of limitations begins to run against stockholder's liability for corporate debts from inception of corporation's liability.

A stockholder's statutory liability for his proportionate share of the debts of the corporation accrues at the inception of the corporation's liability from which date the three-year statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 359) commences to run.

6. Corporations ⇨264—Statute of limitations does not run against stockholder's liability for repayment of sum advanced by purchaser of automobile from execution of contract, but only from rescission thereof on nondelivery.

On the rescission by the purchaser of an automobile of the contract of sale, on the failure of the seller to deliver within the time agreed on, such contract is extinguished, and the liability for the return of an advance payment made by such purchaser arises out of an entirely new obligation implied by law, so that, a stockholder's liability for such corporate indebtedness not having been created by the original contract, the statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 359) did not begin to run against such liability from the date of the execution of such contract, but only from the date of the rescission thereof.

7. Courts ⇨91(2)—Decision of District Court of Appeal as authoritative as that of Supreme Court, when petition to rehear denied by latter.

On denial by the Supreme Court of a petition to hear and determine a cause after judgment of the District Court of Appeal, such decision possesses all the authority of a pronouncement by the Supreme Court itself.

8. Corporations ⚡253—Creditor must prove facts giving rise to stockholder's liability independently of judgment against corporation.

No judgment against a corporation being required as a condition precedent to an action against a stockholder on his statutory liability, which is not secondary, but original and primary, the stockholder not being a surety of the corporation, but a principal debtor, and his liability being distinct and separate from that of the corporation, though it must have its origin in some act of the corporation, the creditor must prove the facts out of which such liability arises, independently of any judgment he may have recovered against the corporation.

9. Appeal and error ⚡1052(8)—Admission of judgment against corporation in action on stockholder's liability not prejudicial, where such liability, independently of judgment, established by evidence.

In an action against a stockholder of a corporation for her proportionate share of an advance payment on the purchase price of an automobile, which the corporation failed to deliver as contracted for and within the time agreed on, whereupon plaintiff rescinded the contract, the admission in evidence of a judgment against the corporation, if erroneous, was not prejudicial to defendant, where, independently of such judgment, the corporation's indebtedness and defendant's liability for her proportionate share thereof, accruing on plaintiff's rescission of the contract and his demand for a return of the advance payment, was fully established by uncontradicted evidence.

10. Trial ⚡33—Defendant's failure to offer evidence contradicting effect of judgment against corporation in action against stockholder held not excused.

Where, in an action against a stockholder of a corporation for her proportionate share of a corporate debt, defendant's counsel stated to the court that he had no testimony to offer, but wanted to be heard on the question of a judgment against the corporation, claimed to have been erroneously admitted in evidence, defendant could not on appeal excuse her failure to offer evidence in her behalf on the ground that certain remarks of the court, when ruling on the admissibility of the judgment and its effect, led her counsel to believe the court had ruled as a finality that no evidence would be received to contradict the judgment as evidence of the corporation's indebtedness; such counsel's language, when announcing that he had no testimony to offer, showing that he regarded the admissibility of the judgment as an open question on which he desired to be heard, so that it was incumbent on defendant to make a formal offer of proof and invite a ruling thereon.

11. Corporations ⚡273—Creditor may recover from stockholder proportionate share of costs awarded him in judgment against corporation.

In an action against a stockholder for her proportionate share of a corporate debt, plaintiff may recover such share of the costs taxed against the corporation in a judgment theretofore recovered by plaintiff against it, though the action against her was not based on such judgment, but on her original and primary obligation to pay her proportionate share of the original indebtedness; a new liability for costs, for which the corporation was not theretofore liable, accruing against the stockholders on recovery of such judgment against the corporation.

12. Corporations ⚡273 — Judgment against stockholder for interest recovered by plaintiff in action against corporation held erroneous.

In an action against a stockholder for her proportionate share of a corporate debt, a judgment against her was erroneous, in so far as it charged her with a portion of the interest recovered by plaintiff in a prior action against the corporation; defendant being liable only for simple interest on the amount of her proportionate share of such indebtedness from the time same accrued until the entry of the judgment against her, but not for compound interest from the time of the judgment against the corporation to the time of the judgment against her.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Action by A. S. Bridges against Louis M. Tefft and Ida J. Fisk. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Fisk appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Charles B. McCoy, of San Diego, for appellant.

Haines & Haines, of San Diego, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. In this action against certain stockholders upon their statutory liability, plaintiff seeks to recover from each his or her proportionate share of an alleged indebtedness contracted by the Tefft Motor Car Company, a California corporation. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendant Ida J. Fisk appeals.

The evidence discloses the following: On July 15, 1915, plaintiff and the corporation entered into a written contract—evidenced by the former's written offer and the latter's written acceptance—whereby plaintiff agreed to purchase of the corporation a certain automobile for $7,500. The contract provided that the automobile was to conform to certain written specifications indorsed thereon. Plaintiff, at the date of the contract, advanced $750 on account of the purchase price. The balance was to be paid when the car should be received by the corporation at its garage in San Diego. On March 11, 1916, the corporation delivered an automobile to plaintiff, which, after an inspection, he, on March 13, 1916, redelivered upon the ground that it did not comply with the agreed specifications. About two weeks thereafter, namely, on March 29, 1916, the corporation having failed to deliver to him a car conforming to the requirements of the contract, plaintiff demanded a return of the $750 that he had deposited as part payment on the purchase price. The corporation having refused to return his deposit to him, plaintiff brought an action against it in the superior court for San Diego county to recover said sum of $750. On September 20, 1918, he recovered judgment in that action for the amount sued for, together with interest thereon at the legal rate, and $28.75 as costs. Ever since January 7, 1915, appellant has been the owner of 985 shares of the corporation's capital stock. At that date, and at all times since, the total of the subscribed capital stock has been 1,000 shares.

Appellant contends that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The complaint, as amended, after alleging facts showing that, at all times since January 7, 1915, the total subscribed capital stock of the Tefft Motor Car Company has been 1,000 shares, and that appellant, during all of that time, has owned 985 shares, avers:

"That on the 29th day of March, 1916, the said corporation became indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $750 in consideration of said sum of money theretofore deposited by plaintiff with said corporation to apply on the purchase price of a certain Locomobile car which said corporation contracted with plaintiff to build for him and to deliver to him not later than March 13, 1916. That said corporation failed and neglected to deliver a car such as was called for by such contract by March 13, 1916, or at any time, and that on the 29th day of March, 1916, the plaintiff rescinded said contract of purchase and made demand upon said corporation for repayment of said sum of $750, but that neither said corporation nor any one has repaid any part of said sum to plaintiff, and that the same, with interest from March 20, 1916, remains entirely unpaid. That on the 20th day of September, 1918, the plaintiff recovered judgment against said corporation upon said cause of action * * * for the said sum of $750 and interest to the date of said judgment in the sum of $879.75 debt and $28.75 costs, total, $908.50, and that the same remains entirely unpaid."

[1] The gist of appellant's objection to the complaint is that it does not state a cause of action upon the original indebtedness, but that, instead, it attempts to state a cause of action upon the judgment against the corporation. If the averments of the complaint justified any such criticism, then unquestionably that pleading would fall short of a statement of a cause of action on appellant's statutory liability as a stockholder; for the stockholder's liability under our statute is a separate and independent one, commencing with and dependent upon the original indebtedness. No new liability on the part of the stockholder upon the original obligation is created by a judgment against the corporation. Hyman v. Coleman, 82 Cal. 653, 23 Pac. 62, 16 Am. St. Rep. 178.

[2-4] But we can see no justification for the claim that the complaint does not state a cause of action upon the original indebtedness. All reference to the judgment might be omitted, and still leave in the complaint averments sufficient to state a cause of action against the defendants as stockholders. That is to say, there would be left the averments that, on March 29, 1916, the corporation became indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $750; that said sum had been deposited by plaintiff with the corporation as part payment on the purchase price of the automobile; that the corporation failed and neglected to deliver the car within the time agreed upon; and that on March 29, 1916, plaintiff rescinded the contract of purchase and demanded the return of his advance payment. These averments suffice to show that on March 29, 1916, appellant, as a stockholder, became indebted to respondent for her proportionate share of the $750. For if, as alleged in the complaint, the corporation failed and neglected to deliver an automobile as contracted for, within the time agreed upon, there then accrued to respondent the right to rescind his agreement to purchase. Mettler v. Vance, 30 Cal. App. 499, 158 Pac. 1044; Hallidie v. Sutter St. R. R. Co., 63 Cal. 575; Condley v. Consolidated L. Co., 200 Pac. 69; 24 R. C. L. pp. 272, 273, § 551; subdivision 2, § 1689, Civ. Code. Upon such rescission, and not before, respondent was entitled to a return of the money advanced by him on the purchase price. 24 R. C. L. p. 65, § 331. The contract of sale, upon its rescission, ceased to exist, and thereupon respondent became entitled to bring an action of indebitatus assumpsit as for money had and received, namely, money paid to the corporation for which, in view of the terms of the contract, plaintiff as the purchaser had received no consideration. Lemle v. Barry, 181 Cal. 1, 183 Pac. 150; Hayt v. Bentel, 164 Cal. 685, 686, 130 Pac. 432; Glock v. Howard, etc., Co., 123 Cal. 10, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; San Diego Const. Co. v. Mannix, 175 Cal. 553, 554, 166 Pac. 325. And that part of the complaint against appellant which is designed to show that the corporation, upon the rescission of the contract, became indebted to respondent, could be cast in the form of a common count in assumpsit. Castagnino v. Balletta, 82 Cal. 250, 258, 23 Pac. 127; Minor v. Baldrige, 123 Cal. 187, 55 Pac. 783; Dubois v. Delaware, etc., Co., 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 285.

[5] It is contended that appellant's statutory liability as a stockholder attached as of the date of the execution of the contract of sale, July 15, 1915; and since this action was not commenced until January 3, 1919, or more than 3 years after the execution of the contract, it is claimed that any cause of action against appellant is barred by the statute of limitations—section 359 of the Code of Civil Procedure. If it were true that the liability here sought to be enforced accrued upon the execution of the contract of sale, then unquestionably respondent's cause of action would be barred. For it is the settled doctrine in this state that the stockholder's statutory liability accrues at the inception of the corporation's liability, and that it is from that date that the three-year period within which the stockholders must be sued commences to run. Hunt v. Ward, 99 Cal. 612, 34 Pac. 335, 37 Am. St. Rep. 87; Coulter Dry Goods Co. v. Wentworth, 171 Cal. 500, 153 Pac. 939; Chambers v. Farnham, 187 Pac. 732.

[8] Appellant assigns as error the action of the trial court in permitting respondent to put in evidence, over appellant's objection, the judgment roll in the action against the corporation. Unless that judgment, in so far as it adjudges that the plaintiff there, the respondent here, recover costs from the corporation, constitutes, as to such costs, an original, separate, and independent liability of the corporation, for which its stockholders are likewise primarily liable on their statutory liability—a question presently to be considered—there is grave doubt as to its admissibility to prove any liability on appellant's part as a stockholder. Under our statute no recovery of a judgment against the corporation is required as a condition precedent to an action against the stockholder on his statutory liability. The stockholder is not a surety of the corporation, but a principal debtor; his obligation is not secondary, but original and primary; and, though his liability must have its origin and inception in some act of the corporation, it is distinct and separate from that of the corporation. The stockholder's liability, with which, after its accrual, the corporation has nothing to do, is strictly a matter between the creditors of the corporation and the stockholders, not as corporators, but as individuals. For these reasons we doubt if, under a statute such as ours, the corporation has the right or power to represent its stockholders as to this individual, original and primary liability. Though the question was presented to our Supreme Court in Chambers v. Farnham, supra, it was not found necessary to determine whether the judgment against the corporation afforded proof against the stockholder in the action upon his statutory liability. The question was, however, directly passed upon in Ellsworth v. Bradford, 32 Cal. App. Dec. 50,¹ where it was held that under our statute, creating, as it does, a primary liability on the part of the stockholder, the creditor must prove the facts out of which the stockholder's liability arises, independently of any judgment that he may have recovered against the corporation. See, also, Trippe v. Huncheson, 82 Ind. 307, and 14 C. J. pp. 1064, 1065.

[10] Upon the conclusion of respondent's case in chief, appellant's counsel, addressing the court, said:

"I have no testimony to offer, but I want to be heard upon the question of the judgment."

Appellant now claims that the only reason why she offered no evidence was because certain remarks made by the court when ruling upon the admissibility of the judgment and its effect as evidence led her counsel to believe that the court had definitely ruled, as a finality, that no evidence would be received to contradict the judgment as evidence of the corporation's indebtedness to respondent. There is no merit in this claim. From the language of appellant's counsel, quoted supra, it is quite evident that the rulings of the court upon the admissibility of the judgment and its effect as evidence were not accepted by him as final. Counsel's language shows that, at the very time when formally announcing that he had no testimony to offer, he regarded the admissibility of the judgment as an open question upon which he desired to be heard. We think, therefore, that under these circumstances it was incumbent upon appellant to make a formal offer of proof in the court below and invite a ruling thereon, and that, having neglected to do so, she is not now in a position to excuse her failure to offer any evidence in her behalf. In fact, we have here, not a mere failure to offer evidence, but appellant's affirmative declaration, through her counsel, in open court, that "I have no testimony to offer."

[11] The judgment against the corporation, entered September 20, 1918, was for the total sum of \$980.25, made up of the following amounts: The \$750 sued for; interest on that amount to the date of that judgment, at the legal rate of interest, from March 29, 1916, the date of plaintiff's rescission of the contract; and \$28.35, the costs taxed against the defendant corporation. In the present action, the court gave judgment against appellant in the sum of \$695.30, besides respondent's costs. Appellant, it will be recalled, at all times since and prior to March 29, 1916, has been and is the owner of 985 out of a total subscription of 1,000 shares; and the \$965.30 adjudged against her is $\frac{985}{1000}$ of a sum made up of the amount of the judgment recovered by respondent against the corporation, namely, said sum of \$980.25, plus interest on that amount, at the legal rate of interest, from the date of the judgment against the corporation to the date of the judgment against appellant in this action. In other words, appellant has been charged with a part of the costs that were taxed against the corporation, and also with a part of the interest that entered into and made up the total amount of the judgment against the corporation. Appellant contends that she is not liable for any part of said costs, nor for any part of said interest.

We think that respondent is entitled to recover from appellant her proportionate share of the costs that were taxed against the corporation. It is true that, in so far as appellant's liability for her proportionate share of the original indebtedness of $750 is concerned, the action against her is not based upon the judgment against the corporation, but upon her original and primary obligation to pay her proportionate share of that original indebtedness. But, when respondent recovered his judgment against the corporation, a new liability for a wholly separate and distinct sum of money accrued against the then existing stockholders, namely, a liability for the costs for which the corporation, upon the recovery of the judgment against it, and not before, became liable as upon a new and original obligation. Fleeson v. Savage Silver Min. Co., 3 Nev. 157, 161-162. As said by the Supreme Court of Michigan in Grand Rapids Savings Bank v. Warren, 52 Mich. 557, 18 N. W. 356:

"The liability of the shareholders is commensurate with that of the corporation itself, and extends to the costs * * * on the judgment."

[12] We think, however, that the judgment against appellant is erroneous in so far as it charges her with any portion of the interest that was recovered by respondent in his action against the corporation. Beyond doubt, appellant is liable for simple interest on the \$750, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the date of respondent's rescission of the contract and demand for the return of his deposit to the entry of the judgment in the present action. Knowles v. Sandercock, 107 Cal. 629, 640, 641, 40 Pac. 1047; Wells Fargo & Co. v. Enright, 127 Cal. 669, 675, 60 Pac. 439, 49 L. R. A. 647. See 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428 et seq., note to Flynn v. American Banking & T. Co. But the net result of the course pursued by the court below is to charge appellant with compound interest. She is charged with a proportionate share of interest on the sum of \$750 from the date when she became liable for her part of that sum, March 29, 1916, to the date of the entry of the judgment against the corporation on September 20, 1918, and she likewise is charged with interest on $\frac{985}{1000}$ of that judgment from the date thereof to the date of the entry of judgment against her in this action. In other words, she is charged with interest on interest from the date of the judgment against the corporation. This, manifestly, is erroneous. For this reason it will be necessary to direct the trial court so to reduce the amount of the judgment that appellant will be charged with no more than her proportionate share of simple interest on the sum of \$750 from March 29, 1916, to the date of the entry of judgment in this action. This will effect such a comparatively slight change in the amount of the judgment against appellant that we do not think it should be taken into consideration in taxing the costs of this appeal.

What we already have said disposes of every legal principle involved in this appeal, and therefore no other assignment of error requires analysis or discussion. The trial court is directed to modify the judgment to conform to the views expressed herein; i. e., to so modify the judgment that appellant will not be charged with compound interest. As so amended the judgment is affirmed, with costs of this appeal taxed against appellant.

ALMQUIST v. GARNER et al. (Civ. 3827.)

1. Adoption ⇐7—Infants ⇐18—Consent of father to adoption proceedings not necessary where he had been deprived of custody.

The juvenile court having acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter of a minor and the parties when petition was filed asking that the child be declared a dependent child, reciting her father's place of residence was unknown, that he had deserted his family, and that the mother was then confined in the county hospital, such court had jurisdiction to make an order depriving the father of the custody of the child, because he had neglected to provide for her and had abandoned her, such order being made under the Juvenile Court Act, and, after such order, his consent was not necessary to adoption proceedings under Civ. Code, § 224.

2. Infants ⇐19—Order depriving father of custody not subject to collateral attack.

An order of the juvenile court depriving a father of the custody of his child for neglect and failure to provide is not subject to collateral attack.

3. Adoption ⇐16—Rights of adoptive parents proper for consideration in determining father's right to have custody order modified.

Where a father has been deprived by order of the juvenile court of the custody of his child for neglect and failure to provide, and subsequently moves against the adoptive parents of the child to secure the custody of the child, the court cannot consider what modification of its order of custody the juvenile court might make, that being the proper subject of motion in that court, and on which motion the rights of the adoptive parents or of others would be a proper matter for consideration in arriving at the equities of the situation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by Mary Almquist against Guy S. Garner and another. From judgment declaring void an order of adoption, defendants appeal. Reversed.

T. C. Gould, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

L. G. Shelton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment declaring null and void an order of adoption of the superior court for the county of Los Angeles, by which the defendants adopted as their child Margaret Almquist, who was at that time of the age of about four years. The plaintiff is the mother of the child.

The child was adopted by the defendants in November, 1912. Five years later, in November, 1917, the present action was commenced to annul the order of adoption, upon the grounds (1) that the father did not consent to the adoption, and no notice was given to him of the adoption proceedings, and (2) that fraud was practiced upon the mother to obtain her consent. The trial court found against the plaintiff on this latter allegation, but annulled the order upon its findings that the written consent of the father of the child had not been obtained, and that the child was not an abandoned child within the provisions of section 224, Civil Code, as it existed at the time of the adoption proceedings; and that the father was never judicially deprived of the custody of the child.

Appellant urges that the facts do not support the finding that the child was not an abandoned child, and, further, that it is only the father himself who can avoid the order because of the want of notice to him of the proceedings by which he was deprived of the custody of his child, which proceedings were relied upon in the adoption proceedings, to make his consent unnecessary. The father is not a party to this action, and appellant contends that, as the written consent of the mother was obtained, and the court has found it was obtained without fraud, she cannot raise the questions growing out of the want of consent of the father of the child.

In the present case, the mother testified that in 1912 she was getting $20 a month from the county for her children. She was sick, and it was necessary for her to go to a hospital. Her husband had deserted her and her three children, and she did not know where he was. It was at this time that she consented to the adoption of the child.

The record of the proceedings in the juvenile court relative to this child, prior to her attempted adoption by the defendants, was offered in evidence. From this it appears numerous orders were made from time to time declaring this child and her brother and sister dependent children, because their father had deserted them, and their mother was an invalid, and unable to support them, and providing for the payment by the county of certain sums for the support of these children. The Juvenile Court Act (St. 1915, p. 1225) as it read at the time of the proceedings herein, enumerated the conditions under which a child might be found to be a "dependent child" within the meaning of the act. A child under the age of 21 years, whose father had abandoned his family, was declared to be a dependent child. This act provided for the filing of a petition in the juvenile court to have the child declared dependent. A citation was then issued to be served upon the parents, if residing within the county and their places of residence were known. The juvenile court, after having thus acquired jurisdiction, could make such order as was "meet in the premises" for the welfare of the dependent child, but could not deprive any parent of the custody of his child unless it found the parent to be incapable, or to have failed or neglected to provide proper maintenance, training, and education for said child. At the same time, section 224 of the Civil Code provided that the consent of a parent to the adoption of his child was not necessary where he had been judicially deprived of its custody on account of cruelty or neglect.

The transcript shows that on September 28, 1911, a petition was filed in due form asking that Margaret Almquist be declared a dependent child, and reciting that her father's place of residence was unknown, that he had deserted his family, and that the mother was then confined in the county hospital. On October 4, 1911, the juvenile court found the child to be dependent, and secured monthly payments from the county for her support. From time to time thereafter, other orders were made for the support of the child, and on April, 6, 1912, a second petition was filed in the same proceeding, alleging that the child was then in the custody of the mother, and that the father had abandoned her, and his place of residence was unknown. On April 9, 1912, an order was made in the same proceeding reciting that, "due notice having been given the parents," and testimony having been taken, it was adjudged the child was dependent within the meaning of the Juvenile Court Act, and an award for her support by the county was made.

[1] On November 19, 1912, after the child had been a ward of the court for more than one year, during which time she was supported by the county under orders of the juvenile court, an order was made in the same proceeding depriving the father of the custody of the child because he had neglected to provide for her, and had abandoned her. The court having acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the parties when the petition was filed, it had jurisdiction to make this order under the Juvenile Court Act. The father having been deprived of the custody of the child by this order on account of his failure to provide for her—a matter which was within the knowledge of the court because of the various orders against the county covering a period of more than one year—his consent was not necessary to the adoption proceedings under section 224, Civil Code.

[2, 3] The order of the juvenile court depriving the father of the custody of his child, for neglect and failure to provide is not subject to collateral attack. Based upon this order, the adoption proceedings were regular without the consent of the father, and should not have been annulled.

What discretion the court might exercise in the matter of modifying its order depriving the father of the custody of his child, upon a proper showing made by the father as to his present ability and inclinations toward his child, is beyond the scope of the inquiry here. The intervention of the rights of the adoptive parents, or of others, at the time of the application for a modification or change in said order, would be a proper matter for consideration in arriving at the equities of the situation should such a motion be made on the part of the father. Matter of Guardianship of Michels, 170 Cal. 339, at page 344, 149 Pac. 587. At present, there is no showing whatsoever by any person, nor any application for a modification or change in this order depriving the father of the custody of his child. With such order in full force and effect, the consent of the father was unnecessary to the adoption.

The judgment is reversed.

WARDROBE v. MILLER et al. (Civ. 2251.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 30, 1921.)

1. Evidence §568(1)—Conclusion of witness stepfather had received minor into family is not binding.

In an action by a father against the second husband of his divorced wife to recover the reasonable value of the services of plaintiff's minor children, the statements of the witnesses, including the stepfather and the children, that they were received by the stepfather as members of his family, are merely conclusions, which are not binding upon the court.

2. Parent and child §14—Presumption stepfather receives children as parent does not arise from mere temporary relationship.

The presumption created by Civ. Code, § 209, that if a husband receives his wife's children by a former marriage into his family and supports them, he does so as a parent, does not arise where the evidence shows that it was expressly understood between the parties that the arrangement by which the stepsons were taken into the family was a merely temporary one.

3. Parent and child §5(5)—Father can repudiate sons' contract for wages and collect reasonable value of services.

Where an employer made a contract with a minor as to the amount of wages, the father may either adopt the contract and claim what is due under it or may repudiate it and claim the reasonable value of the services rendered.

4. Parent and child §5(1)—Right to wages reciprocal to duty to support.

The right of a father to receive the wages of his minor children is reciprocal to his duty to support them.

5. Pleading ⚡248(4)—Complaint on implied contract can be amended at trial to allege quantum meruit.

A complaint alleging an implied contract of employment and reasonable value of the services rendered can be amended at the trial to allege the performance of services at defendant's special instance and request and the reasonable value thereof, since an amendment changing the complaint from one upon an express contract to one upon quantum meruit does not substitute a new cause of action.

6. Appeal and error ⚡236(2)—Request to set aside submission prerequisite to complaint of amendment at trial.

Defendant cannot complain of an order permitting plaintiff to file an amended complaint after the evidence had closed to conform to the proofs, where he made no request that the submission of the cause be set aside or that he be permitted to offer further pleadings or proof.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by Ara Wardrobe against Charles A. Miller and others to recover the reasonable value of services of plaintiff's minor sons. Judgment for the plaintiff against the named defendant and that defendant appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. Appeal from the order dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

R. C. Minor and Miller & Channell, all of Stockton, for appellant.

B. M. Bainbridge, of Stockton, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff sued to recover the reasonable value of the services of his minor sons, Edward and Raymond, aged 19 and 17 years, respectively. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff against defendant Charles A. Miller, and the latter appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. Plaintiff was formerly the husband of defendant Mrs. Charles A. Miller. They were divorced about May 20, 1908. The care, custody, and control of Edward and Raymond and their sister, two years younger than Raymond, were awarded in the decree to the plaintiff herein. The father kept the three children in the Children's Home at Stockton for five years and thereafter until the 23d day of January, 1919, they lived with him and attended the public schools. The boys worked during vacation and at other times for their father and for strangers, the father collecting their wages and supporting them. On January 23, 1919, the plaintiff and his children engaged in a quarrel of such nature that the father and Edward came to blows, whereupon the children left, arriving at the home of defendants late at night, 10 or 12 miles from the plaintiff's residence. Edward testified:

"Father and I came to blows; he was going to hit me; he told me to get out and never come back. I think he said, 'If you go away, you can stay away; go away for good.' I left for good."

The father testified:

"I said, 'If you go, I shall collect your wages.' * * * Don't know what the boys did at the Miller's. I never went to see them nor made any inquiry about them while they were there, although I knew they were there. * * * Don't remember that I told them not to go. The oldest boy said, 'If you collect them (meaning wages), then I will go somewhere else.'"

On arrival of the boys and their sister at the home of the defendants, Mr. Miller testified:

"I told them that they could stay awhile, but that I did not want them there at all. If I would keep them there I would have trouble with their father. They said they would never go back to live with him. I allowed them to stay at the solicitation of my wife, and because they said that if we didn't let them stay there they would leave the country. * * * I never promised to pay them any wages. I told them if they wanted wages they better leave, as I would not pay them anything. I received them into my family and treated them as members of my family. They worked sometimes just as other boys in the neighborhood worked. Helped to haul grain, irrigate, and milk. The boys did not take the places of any laborers that I was bound to have. As to the milking, we would have done it if the boys hadn't been there. Three hired men were on the place when the boys came, two of them doing general work at $2.25 per day and board—they left after the boys came—and one at $3 per day and board."

Mr. Miller further testified:

That from March 25th to May 26th they both milked. "Raymond worked about sixteen days in haying, hauling, and irrigating. Edward, after I had taught him the use of the milking machine, which took about two or three days, did the milking from May 26th until he left in August, I assisting him now and then. We did not work hard; on hot days when hauling we would tie the team to the fence, and stay in the shade until we cooled off. I made no attempt to coerce the boys to stay. I never promised to pay them any wages; told them that I didn't want any trouble with their father. If I agreed to pay wages, their father would claim them, and I wanted it understood that if they stayed no wages would be paid."

Mrs. Miller testified:

"At my request Mr. Miller received all three of them into our family, and they were treated in all respects as our own children, and allowed them to stay. We bought their clothes, did their mending and washing, took them to dances, a school entertainment and a movie, Lillian going to school every morning with the oldest Miller child. I gave them money to attend the movies; took them to two or three school entertainments and dances."

Edward testified:

"Mrs. Miller said to me in October, 1918, in her yard, I could come there and get $2 a day and board. Mr. Miller was near by on the sidewalk. Mr. Miller has never said he would pay me any wages, but 'if your father tries I guess he can collect them.' * * * I got clothes, $1 in cash, which I saved, got a couple of hair cuts and went to a movie, never went any place, but stayed on the ranch all time; got three pairs of shoes ($3.50 and $5.50 per pair), two pairs overalls ($2.50 and $2.75 per pair), two suits of underwear, six pairs of socks (50 cents per pair), two work shirts ($1.50 each); that is all that I can recall."

Raymond testified:

"We spoke about wages one time to Mr. Miller; he said we couldn't collect wages; that our father could. This conversation was when we were making the second cutting around the alfalfa, some time in May, I think. We were sitting at the breakfast table, no hired man there. My brother started to talk. He said we ought to be getting wages. Mr. Miller said he wouldn't pay any wages because father would collect them."

The witness was asked:

"Didn't Mr. Miller receive you, your brother, and sister into his family and treat you just as his own children were?"

The witness replied "Yes."

Some time in August, 1919, Mr. Miller and Edward "had a wrangle," and the latter with his brother and sister returned to their father.

The court found that the stepfather, Charles A. Miller, did not receive the boys into his family and support them; that the food and clothes furnished them were in part consideration of their services; that the services performed by them were not "rendered upon an express or any other understanding" that they were to receive no compensation other than their board and lodging; and that the reasonable value of their services above that of their board and lodging, after deducting credits due Miller on account of clothing, etc., is the sum of $462, for which sum judgment was rendered.

[1] Appellant contends that the evidence conclusively shows that he received the boys into his family as members thereof, and that therefore recovery can be had only upon proof of an express contract to pay for their services, citing section 209 of the Civil Code. The court was not bound by the conclusion of the witnesses that Miller had received the boys into his family, but it devolved upon the court, from a consideration of all the facts in evidence to determine that question. The arrangement for the stay of the boys at the home of defendants was of a temporary character and apparently conditional. Miller testified:

"I told them they could stay awhile, but that I did not want them there at all. If I would keep them I would have trouble with their father."

[2] The provisions of section 209, Civil Code, to the effect that, if a husband receives his wife's children by a former marriage "into his family and supports them, it is presumed that he does so as a parent," does not reasonably contemplate a mere temporary relation to be assumed and disclaimed at will, but the arrangement must be of such character as to impose some obligation to support. The relation must be similar to that of a natural parent to his children. A pertinent inquiry would be, if one of the boys had become a helpless cripple while he was living with Miller without the latter's fault, whose would have been the obligation to support, the father's or the stepfather's? Under the circumstances disclosed, the answer would seem to be apparent. To enable a stepfather to invoke the provisions of section 209, the obligation to support need not necessarily be such as to continue during the whole of the child's minority, but it should be something more than merely temporary. It is at least doubtful whether section 209 has any application to the demand of a father entitled to the custody of his child for the reasonable value of the minor's services.

[3] "Where an employer made a contract with a minor as to the amount of wages, the father may either adopt the contract and claim whatever is due under it, or repudiate it and claim the reasonable value of the services rendered." 20 R. C. L. 607. It would seem to follow logically that if the minor agreed to render the services without compensation the father might collect the reasonable value thereof.

[4] "The right to a child's services and earnings is reciprocal to the duty to support." Id. 608.

In discussing the father's right to the child's earnings, it is said:

"It is certainly perfect while the period of the child's nurture continues. But if this is all, it can be of little consequence, because the child's labor and services are for that period of little value; nor could compensation be thus afforded for the many years when the child was entirely helpless." Schouler's Domestic Relations (5th Ed.) § 252.

"His right to their [his children's] services, like his right to their custody, rests upon the parental duty of maintenance, and it is said to furnish some compensation to him for his own services rendered to the child." McGarr v. National, etc., Worsted Mills, 24 R. I. 447, 53 Atl. 320, 60 L. R. A. 122, 96 Am. St. Rep. 749; Barrett v. Riley, 42 Ill. App. 258.

These principles have a direct application to the facts of this case as disclosed by the evidence.

"The plaintiff was not precluded from recovering the wages, either by the fact that the work was done by the son against his express dissent, or by the fact that the defendant had notified him to come and take his son away, and he had neglected to do so." Smith v. Smith, 30 Conn. 111.

In this case the plaintiff, Wardrobe, had not waived his right to the earnings of his sons. When they left home he expressly stated that he would collect the wages earned. Whether this statement was communicated to Miller or not does not appear, nor is it material, since the father had done nothing to cause Miller to believe that the former would waive his right, and Miller seems to have understood the contrary, by his own testimony.

[5] The first amended complaint alleged an implied contract of employment and the reasonable value of the services rendered. After the evidence was closed the court permitted the plaintiff to file a second amended complaint which alleged the performance of the services at Miller's "special instance and request" and the reasonable value thereof. This is assigned as error. The first amended complaint was probably sufficient, but whether that be true or not there was no error in permitting the amendment.

"Our courts have held frequently * * * that an amendment which changes the count from one upon an express contract to one upon quantum meruit does not substitute a new cause of action." Turner & Dahnken v. Bauer, 28 Cal. App. 312, 152 Pac. 308; Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164.

"An amendment to conform to the proof may always be made, provided the cause of action is not thereby changed." Koch v. Wilcoxon, 30 Cal. App. 520, 158 Pac. 1049; Hancock v. Board of Education, 140 Cal. 554, 74 Pac. 44.

[6] After an amendment to conform to the proofs, if the defendant makes no request that the submission of the cause be set aside or that he be permitted to offer further pleadings or proofs, he is in no position to complain. Gartlan v. C. A. Hooper & Co., 177 Cal. 422, 170 Pac. 1115.

Appellant urges that the court erred in overruling his demurrer to the second amended complaint and in overruling his objections to certain testimony, on the ground that no express contract was shown. What has already been said disposes of these objections.

The appeal from the order is dismissed, and the judgment affirmed.

BURNS v. JACKSON. (Civ. 2278.)

1. Trial $\S$ 140(1)—Irreconcilable conflict between direct and cross examination of witness insufficient to justify nonsuit.

Though the statement of a mere opinion or conclusion by a witness, in his direct examination, can have no weight as against facts stated by him in cross-examination, which are necessarily opposed to such opinion, an irreconcilable conflict between his direct and cross examination is not of itself sufficient to justify a nonsuit.

2. Trial $\S$ 165 — Evidence must be taken most strongly against defendant on motion for nonsuit.

On a motion for nonsuit, the evidence must be taken most strongly against defendant, and, if an inference could reasonably arise therefrom in favor of plaintiff's contention, the motion must be denied.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 1097(2), 1195(1)—Law of case stated by appellate court must be adhered to throughout subsequent proceedings.

Where the appellate court has stated a rule or principle of law necessary to a decision, that rule or principle must be adhered to and observed throughout the subsequent progress of the case, both in the lower court and on subsequent appeal, though it may be believed on further consideration that the former decision is erroneous.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 1213—Where evidence substantially same on second trial, holding of appellate court on former appeal that question was for jury prevents nonsuit.

Where the appellate court, on a prior appeal, held that the evidence was sufficient to submit to the jury the question of the negligence of decedent's employer, and substantially the same evidence was received at the second trial, the law of the case was properly invoked by plaintiff, and a motion for nonsuit should have been overruled.

5. Master and servant $\S$ 301(4) — Servant loaned to another for special service is servant of latter.

One who is the general servant of another may be loaned or hired by his master for some special service, so as to become as to that the servant of a third party, in which case, if he is subject wholly to the direction and control of such third party, the latter, and not the general employer, is the master, so far as that particular service is concerned, and is liable for injuries caused by the negligence of such servant while engaged in the duties pertaining thereto.

6. Pleading $\S$ 376—Defendant's admissions of and failure to deny allegations of complaint held to obviate necessity of proof.

In an action for the death of an employee while riding on a truck, struck by a train at a crossing owing to the chauffeur's negligence, admissions by defendant, to whom such truck and the service of the chauffeur had been loaned for a special service, for which the truck was being used at the time of the accident, that he was related to the owner of the truck, as alleged in the complaint, his failure to deny other allegations that they worked together and exchanged utilities with each other and were so co-operating at the time in the use of such truck, and his denial, in his answer, that such truck was being operated by the owner at the time of the accident, thus virtually admitting that he himself was in control of the same at such time, obviated the necessity for evidence of such facts; it being unnecessary to prove facts admitted by the pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by W. F. Burns against George H. Jackson. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Martin I. Welsh and W. H. Hatfield, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and A. H. Hewitt, of Yuba City, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from a judgment of nonsuit. The action was brought originally against five defendants, the Southern Pacific Company, George H. Jackson, Jackson M. Diggs, W. G. McRoberts, and F. G. Prinderville, but on the first trial a nonsuit was granted as to Diggs, Jackson, and McRoberts, the jury exonerated the Southern Pacific Company, and rendered a verdict against Prinderville for the sum of $2,000. An appeal was taken from said judgment of nonsuit, and it was affirmed by this court as to Diggs and McRoberts, but was reversed as to the defendant George H. Jackson. Burns v. Southern Pacific Co., et al., 185 Pac. 875. In that decision it was said:

"Without setting forth the evidence in detail, it is only necessary to say there was sufficient evidence to take the case to the jury as to the defendant Prinderville being an employee of the defendant Jackson, and also as to the negligence of the defendant Prinderville in his operation and management of the auto truck at the time of the collision."

The motion for nonsuit at the second trial was based upon the contention of an entire lack of evidence that Prinderville was in the employment of Jackson at the time of the accident, which resulted in the death of plaintiff's son. The view of the trial court was that a difference existed in that respect between the first and the second trial, Prinderville having testified at the former that "he was working for Dr. Jackson, was operating the truck under his control," while, the court proceeded to state, "The testimony is to-day he was working for Diggs and under his control." The court continued:

"It wasn't brought out on cross-examination that he was under the pay and employ and control of Diggs; here you have two witnesses, Prinderville states it, and so does McRoberts."

In reply to the suggestion of appellant that "all the intendments are in favor of the plaintiff's side of the case in a motion for nonsuit," the court said:

"When a man says in his testimony 'I was working for Dr. Jackson,' and on cross-examination the facts come out he was working for Tom Smith, you can't take his testimony on direct examination as an inference or as a presumption or as amounting to anything."

[1, 2] No doubt the learned trial judge was right in the last-quoted assertion, if he meant that the statement of a mere opinion or conclusion by a witness in his direct examination could have no weight as against facts stated by him in his cross-examination which are necessarily opposed to such opinion. However, an irreconcilable conflict between the direct and the cross examination of a witness is not of itself sufficient to justify a nonsuit. The rule upon the subject has been well settled, and is fully discussed by this court in the Estate of Daly, 15 Cal. App. 329, 114 Pac. 787. It is sufficient to say that on such motion the evidence must be taken most strongly against the defendant, and if an inference could reasonably arise therefrom in favor of plaintiff's contention, the motion must be denied. But a consideration of the question of fact involved in said proposition may be deferred until after an inquiry as to the contention of appellant that the trial court, by virtue of the "law of the case," was under legal compulsion to deny the motion for nonsuit.

[3, 4] The doctrine is well understood, and the parties herein are in accord that where the appellate court has in its opinion stated a rule or principle of law necessary to a decision, that rule or principle must be adhered to and observed throughout the subsequent progress of the case, both in the lower court and upon subsequent appeal, although it may be believed upon further consideration that the former decision in that particular is erroneous. Westerfield v. New York L. Ins. Co., 157 Cal. 339, 107 Pac. 699. By the former decision herein it was held that the evidence against respondent was sufficient to be submitted to the jury. If substantially the same evidence appears in this record, said decision, of course, is controlling. It would make no difference if additional evidence was received that might be favorable to respondent. The test is, Was substantially the same evidence favorable to appellant received at the second as at the first trial? As to this, it may be said that respondent has not pointed out any difference, and we would be justified in concluding from his omission that no difference exists. It is true that he quotes quite freely from the testimony at each trial, but he does not specify the variance upon which he relies. However, we have examined the testimony of the two witnesses, Prinderville and McRoberts, claimed by appellant to be sufficient to show prima facie that the former at the time of the accident was under the exclusive control and direction of Dr. Jackson, and we find no such divergence as to make inapplicable the "law of the case." At the first trial Prinderville testified:

"On the 27th day of June, 1917, I was employed by Jackson as a driver of his truck. We were hauling empty lug boxes at the time of the accident. We were engaged in hauling fruit from Dr. Jackson's ranch to Oswald Station, and hauling empties back. I was acting under the direction of Dr. George H. Jackson that day. Defendant McRoberts was superintending the hauling of the fruit. * * * I received pay for my work performed for that week from Jackson Diggs. He paid me for all of the week. I did not receive any money from Mr. McRoberts or Dr. Jackson."

On the second trial his testimony upon this point appeared as follows:

"Q. What business were you engaged in on the 27th day of June, 1917? A. Driving a truck. Q. For whom were you driving the truck? A. Jackson Diggs. * * * Q. What did you do in the afternoon? A. Went out to the orchard, got a load of apricots, took them to Oswald, and put them in a car. Q. Who sent you to get the fruit in the orchard? A. Mr. McRoberts. Q. In what orchard was it you got the fruit? A. You mean who owned it? Q. Yes, sir. A. Dr. Jackson, I believe. Q. What did Mr. McRoberts direct you to do? A. Go to the orchard and get a load of the fruit that were there boxed. Q. Whom were you working for that afternoon? A. I presume I was working under Dr. Jackson. Q. You were subject to his orders that afternoon? A. Yes, sir. * * * Q. You were paid for this work by Jackson Diggs, of course. A. Yes, sir. Q. And not paid anything at all by Dr. Jackson? A. No, sir."

At the former hearing McRoberts testified:

"I am a fruit grower and superintendent for defendant Dr. Jackson. That was my business on the 27th day of June, 1917. I was acquainted with Emmans Franklin Burns in his lifetime. He was working for Dr. Jackson, and I was superintending the work."

At this trial he testified to the same thing, but added that Mr. Prinderville hauled some fruit for Dr. Jackson that day, and that he probably told Mr. Prinderville that "we had a load of fruit to take down to Oswald." He also related what occurred after they left the Jackson place, but this is of no consequence. It is true that in the cross-examination he testified that Mr. Prinderville was in the "employ of Jackson Diggs," and that he had full control of the truck, "right to stop it, or go ahead or back up as he pleased," but, as we understand, it was never contended by appellant that Prinderville was not in the general employ of Diggs, or that the chauffeur was not permitted to use his own judgment as to the manipulation and operation of the machine.

As we read the record, there was substantial evidence at the former trial in support of the theory that, while Prinderville was in the general employ of Diggs, yet at the time of the accident he was in the service of respondent for a special purpose, and subject to the exclusive control and direction of the latter in the accomplishment of that purpose; that it was so held in the former decision; that substantially the same evidence tending to prove that condition was received at this trial; and we conclude that the "law of the case" was properly invoked by appellant.

[5] What we have said sufficiently expresses our view, also that regardless of the former decision, it would be a fair inference from the showing made at the last trial that the relation of employer and employee as to this particular service existed between Prinderville and Dr. Jackson. It is indeed a very reasonable conclusion that Mr. Diggs, a son-in-law of Dr. Jackson, loaned or hired to the latter the truck, and also its driver for this particular work, and thereby made Prinderville subject to the control and direction of respondent. That a person may be in the general employment of one and in the special employment of another so as to make the latter responsible for the negligence of the employee is a proposition that cannot be disputed. In 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 178 (2d Ed.) it is said:

"The doctrine respondeat superior applies only when the relation of master and servant is shown to exist between the wrongdoer and the person sought to be charged with the result of some neglect or wrong, at the time of and in respect to the very transaction out of which the injury arose; hence the fact that the party to whose wrongful or negligent act the injury may be traced was at the time in the general employment and pay of another person does not necessarily make the latter the master so far as that particular act is concerned, and responsible therefor. It is accordingly well settled that one who is the general servant of another may be loaned or hired by the master for some special service so as to become as to that service the servant of such third party; and, where a general servant is so loaned or hired to another, and as regards the particular service for which he is so loaned or hired is subject wholly to the direction and control of that other, the latter, and not the general employer, is the master so far as the particular service is concerned and liable for injuries caused by the negligence and wrongful act of the servant while engaged in the duties pertaining to such service."

Indeed this view as to the special service of Prinderville seems quite recently to have been entertained by the learned counsel for respondent. In their reply on behalf of Diggs and McRoberts to a petition of plaintiff in the Supreme Court for a hearing after said decision in this court, they declared:

"The fact is, however, that Diggs and Jackson were operating neighboring ranches, and they did what farmers very frequently do, that is, they swapped work occasionally, one would send over and get the teams and wagons and outfit of the other, and when he finished using them would send them back, the owner of the outfit having nothing to do with, nor in fact knowing anything at all about, where his outfit was during the time it was away."

Of course, it is not surprising that counsel in representing Diggs should seek to shift to Jackson the responsibility for the accident, nor are they to be censured for changing their view of the situation when they represent the latter, but it is quite fair to assume that they would not have taken their original position without reasonable ground for it, or at least believing such ground existed.

[6] Moreover, when a fact is admitted by the pleadings, it is, of course, not necessary to prove it. Plaintiff in his verified complaint alleged:

"That defendant Jackson is the grandfather of the defendant Jackson M. Diggs, and they work together and exchange utilities with each other, and were so co-operating at said date in the use of said auto truck."

The defendant Jackson expressly admitted that he was the grandfather of Diggs, and did not deny the other part of the allegation. Therein was set forth the basic fact of the liability of respondent for the negligence of Prinderville, and it obviated the necessity of evidence to that extent.

Again, respondent in his answer declares as follows:

"Defendant admits that on the 27th day of June, 1917, certain fruit, to wit, apricots, was being hauled from the farm of this defendant to Oswald Station, on the line of the defendant Southern Pacific Company, in said Sutter county, and that such fruit was being transported by this defendant from his said farm to said station along and over a public highway of said Sutter county, but he denies that said auto truck was on said date operated by the defendant Jackson M. Diggs."

The foregoing is virtually an admission that he, and not Mr. Diggs, was in control of the auto truck on that day. At any rate, it is plain from the evidence that it was operated either by him or by Diggs, and his denial that it was operated by the latter, together with his averment that "such fruit was being transported by this defendant," should have some weight in the determination of the question whether there was a case for the jury on this vital point.

We feel satisfied that the court was in error in granting the motion, and the judgment is reversed.

ALBERT v. MCKAY & CO. (Civ. 3816.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 27, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 26, 1921.)

1. Evidence ⇨587—Rule as to sufficiency of circumstantial evidence stated.

Where plaintiff's case rests on circumstantial evidence, the circumstances must not only be consistent with his theory, but, when weighed with the opposing evidence, must have more convincing force substantiating the theory contended for, from which theory it results that the greater probability is in favor of the party upon whom the burden rests.

2. Master and servant ⇨278(17)—Negligence in starting machinery held not shown by circumstances.

In an action for the death of an employee, the fact that his watch was broken in the accident causing his death did not tend to show that machinery was put in motion after he was in a dangerous situation, as claimed by plaintiff.

3. Master and servant ⇨243(1)—Injury to servant violating orders not actionable.

Where an employee, killed while changing the location of shafts, had no duty to repair the shafts, and had been expressly ordered not to make changes in them, the master is not responsible.

4. Master and servant ⇨89(1)—Injury to servant away from place of duty not actionable.

Where a saw filer, killed by machinery, was employed on a floor other than the one where he was injured, and had no business to be in a place where he was injured, the master is not responsible.

5. Master and servant ⇨265(5)—Presumption of negligence not raised by accident.

There being no statute creating such a presumption, there was no presumption that an employer was negligent because of the dropping of a tightener and the starting of a shaft, whereby an employee was injured.

6. Trial ⇨194(19)—Instruction as to inferring negligence held to usurp jury's function.

An instruction, in action for injuries to servant, that from certain circumstances, if proved, and in the absence of explanation by defendant, the law presumes defendant was negligent, was erroneous, as usurping the jury's function, if the word "presumed" meant "infer," since the inference of negligence is a matter for the jury.

7. Appeal and error 1064(2)—Instruction stating there was a presumption of negligence held prejudicial.

In an action for the death of an employee, where there was no eyewitness to the accident, an instruction erroneously stating that under certain circumstances the law presumed defendant was negligent, and the burden was cast on him to show that the starting of a shaft was not due to his negligence, was prejudicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; George D. Murray, Judge.

Action by Ella W. Albert, as administratrix of the estate of Frank H. Albert, deceased, against McKay & Co. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Cooley, Crowley & Lachmund and Clarence Coonan, all of San Francisco, and Pierce H. Ryan, of Eureka, for appellant.

Puter & Quinn, of Eureka, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is the second appeal in the above-entitled action. The first appeal was heard and determined in the Supreme Court. 174 Cal. 451, 163 Pac. 666. The facts of the case are set forth in that decision. The first count in the complaint was dismissed, a nonsuit was granted as to the third count, and the judgment, from which this appeal was taken, rests on the second count referred to in that opinion.

The theory on which the second count was framed was that the deceased, Frank H. Albert, had commenced his work when the machinery was not in operation, and that when he had placed himself in a position of danger that the machinery was started in motion, and that a set screw (from which decedent had removed the guard) caught in his clothes and revolved his body against the wooden beams, and thus caused his death. No one witnessed the accident. To prove her theory of the case the plaintiff caused to be constructed in the courtroom a model built to scale, showing the exact dimensions of the space in which the body of the deceased was afterwards found. She also introduced expert testimony showing what would be the effect produced if, when the machinery was idle, the human form of a man of the size of the deceased should be inserted between the timbers and the idle shaft, and that thereafter the machinery should be set in motion. She also introduced in evidence the broken watch, which it was claimed was running and in good order the night before the accident, and was so broken that the hands could not move at all when it was taken from the body of the decedent after the accident, and which showed that it was broken at 26 minutes past 7. Having introduced this testimony, the respondent contends that it would have been suicidal for the deceased, while the machinery was in operation, to inject his body in the space where his body was afterwards found. She also argues that the broken watch shows that the deceased met his death at 26 minutes after 7, and she also argues that there are other circumstances which show that her theory, as stated in her pleading, is sustained by the evidence—that is, by indirect evidence.

The appellant takes the position that the plaintiff was not entitled to recovery because (1) the machinery was in full operation before and at the time the decedent commenced his work; (2) that the decedent had been expressly forbidden to do the work which he was proceeding to do at the time of the accident; and (3) that the trial court committed error in giving to the jury certain improper instructions. We think that the appellant is supported by the record as to each one of these contentions, and we shall address ourselves to each of these contentions in the order stated.

[1, 2] 1. It may be conceded, as the plaintiff argues, that the evidence in the case may be claimed to show that the decedent could have been killed in the manner in which the plaintiff contends for. However, this contention rests on circumstantial evidence, if at all. Resting on circumstantial evidence, the plaintiff's case is not sufficient merely because the circumstances proved are consistent with the plaintiff's theory; but the circumstances must show, when weighed with the evidence opposed to them, that the circumstances relied on have more convincing force, substantiating the theory contended for, and from which theory it results that the greater probability is in favor of the party upon whom the burden rests. Wilbur v. Emergency Hospital Assn., 27 Cal. App. 751, 759, 151 Pac. 155; Puckhaber v. Southern Pacific Co., 132 Cal. 363, 366, 64 Pac. 480; Union Investment Co. v. S. F. Gas, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 58, 62, 141 Pac. 807. But the evidence does not measure up to such requirements. The fact, if it be a fact, that the watch was broken in the accident, does not at all tend to show when the machinery was put in motion. Conceding that it would have been a very dangerous act for the decedent to have inserted his body in the space where he was killed, there is nothing to show that he did so; but, on the other hand, he may have been working near the shaft, his clothes may have caught on the set-screw, and his body may have been drawn into the space where the body was later found.

[3] 2. The uncontradicted testimony of Mr. Cotter, the superintendent, was to the effect that he did not know until after the accident that the decedent was doing the work which consisted of making certain changes in the location of some of the shafts, and, furthermore, that he had expressly forbidden the decedent to make the changes. There is other testimony in the record tending to corroborate Mr. Cotter in the foregoing testimony. There is no evidence whatever in the record tending to contradict him. In the case of Andrews, etc., v. Valley Ice Co., 167 Cal. 11, at page 21, 138 Pac. 699, 703, the Supreme Court quoted with approval Thompson on Negligence, § 5396, as follows:

"The rule is the same in the case where a servant brings an injury upon himself in consequence of violating special or particular orders which he has received in a given juncture; he cannot make his own fault in violating such orders the ground of recovering damages for the injury which he thus brings upon himself."

[4] Closely allied to this same point, but not necessarily a part thereof, the uncontradicted testimony is that the decedent was employed as a saw filer, and that his duties were to be performed on the floor immediately above where the accident occurred. It is also to the effect that he had no duties whatever to perform on the floor where the accident occurred. In the case of Jacobson v. Northwestern Pacific R. R. Co., 175 Cal. 468, 472, 166 Pac. 3, 5, the court said:

"In the case at bar, no facts appear which tend to show any obligation of defendant to deceased which it failed to discharge. Indeed, the testimony of the contractor's foreman to the effect that in the course of the work of installing the runway they had no occasion to go upon or use the platform, and that Jacobson's act in going upon it was not due to any order expressly given, nor to anything connected with the work in which he was engaged in doing, is not controverted. Having, as stated, for his own convenience and without invitation on the part of the defendant, intruded upon a place of danger, in which position as to defendant he was, if not a trespasser, at least a licensee, as to whom defendant owed no duty for the violation of which it is liable, the injury suffered must be deemed to have resulted solely from his own negligence."

There was not, therefore, any evidence tending to support the allegation of plaintiff's complaint, which is as follows:

"* * * That on the said 10th day of March, 1913, the said Frank H. Albert approached said shaft while in the performance of his said duties. * * *"

But that allegation was the gravamen of plaintiff's cause of action.

[5-7] 3. The plaintiff, on the trial of the case, requested, and the judge gave, an instruction attempting to apply to the facts of this case the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. The appellant contends that that doctrine has no application to the facts of this case. The instruction complained of is No. 8. It is very long and contains several paragraphs. After assembling certain facts the instruction proceeds:

"* * * And from such circumstances, if they have been proved, and in the absence of any explanation from the defendant the law presumes that the defendant was negligent, and the burden is then cast upon the defendant to show that the dropping of the tightener and starting the shaft to revolve, was not due to any negligence of the defendant."

In such paragraphs the trial court used the word "presumption" nine times. Of course, there is no such presumption. If there is any such presumption, one can turn to the particular statute and read it; but every one must concede that such presumption has never been written into our statutes. If by the word "presume" the court meant "infer," then the court was usurping the function of the jury and was instructing on a question of fact, for it rested with the jury to infer negligence or not to infer negligence. These propositions have been adverted to by the Supreme Court in a long line of cases. See People v. Walden, 51 Cal. 588, and the long discussion on the subject contained in Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 176-177, 116 Pac. 530. The instruction was erroneous, and, as there was no eyewitness to the accident which caused the death of the decedent, the instruction complained of must have been highly prejudicial.

The judgment is reversed.

DELL v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SAN DIEGO COUNTY et al. (Civ. 3656.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 7, 1921.)

1. Divorce $\S$ 165(4). — Valid interlocutory judgment cannot be set aside on motion, unless made within time fixed by statute.

A court has no power to set aside or vacate on motion an interlocutory judgment for divorce not void on its face, unless the motion is made within the time fixed by Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

2. Divorce $\S$ 165(4). — No jurisdiction to vacate interlocutory judgment after lapsed year because of subsequent resumption of marital relations.

While the court in a divorce action has the inherent power to refuse to enter a final decree, where, on a condonation of the offense on which an interlocutory judgment was based, the parties resumed marital relations, it does not follow that the court, after the lapse of a year, has jurisdiction to vacate the interlocutory judgment, the integrity of which, in so far as it determines the facts properly involved therein, is unaffected by subsequent relations of the parties.

3. Prohibition $\S$ 3(5). — Writ of prohibition will issue where petitioner would be subjected to other than usual expense of trial and appeal therefrom.

While a writ of prohibition will not ordinarily issue where there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law, and an order setting aside an interlocutory judgment for divorce, since made after judgment, would be the subject of an appeal, such writ will issue where petitioner, though entitled to a reversal of the order on appeal, could be compelled to supply his wife with the necessary means to enable her to resist the appeal and to pay her suit money and costs asked for in a futile prosecution of a second action instituted by her for divorce, as to all of which the law makes no provision for reimbursement, so that the appeal would not afford him an adequate remedy.

Petition for writ of prohibition by George L. Dell against the Superior Court of the County of San Diego, State of California, and Hon. C. N. Andrews, Judge presiding therein. Alternative writ made permanent.

Charles B. DeLong, of San Diego, for petitioner.

W. J. Mossholder, of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Upon filing the petition herein an alternative writ of prohibition was issued, in response to which the respondent has made return, from which and the petition it appears that on June 9, 1919, Eva D. Dell obtained an interlocutory judgment for divorce against George L. Dell, petitioner herein, as to the validity of which judgment no question is made. Thereafter the parties effected a reconciliation, and in December, 1919, resumed their marital relations which, except for temporary interruptions, continued to April 28, 1921, when they again separated and Eva D. Dell instituted another action for divorce against her husband, wherein she asked for an order requiring him, as defendant therein, to pay certain moneys as attorney's fees, alimony, and costs. About the same time, by a motion made in the first action based upon the ground that subsequent to the rendition of the interlocutory judgment therein the parties had resumed their relations as husband and wife, she applied to the court, asking it to annul and vacate the interlocutory judgment, which motion the court threatens to and will, unless restrained, grant.

[1] As stated, the regularity and validity of the judgment is not questioned, and the application to so annul it was not made until nearly two years after its rendition. The law seems to be well settled that a court has no power to set aside or vacate on motion a judgment not void upon its face, unless the motion is made within the time fixed by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 673, 77 Pac. 651; People v. Temple, 103 Cal. 447, 37 Pac. 414. The judgment entered on June 9, 1919, constituted a valid interlocutory judgment, declaring plaintiff entitled to a divorce. "As such it was subject to be vacated on appeal, or on motion for new trial, or by proceedings under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The time for all these proceedings having expired, and no such proceeding to vacate it having been instituted" until nearly two years after its rendition, the court is without jurisdiction by any proceeding in the case to vacate the judgment. Claudius v. Melvin, 146 Cal. 257, 79 Pac. 897. To the same effect is Suttman v. Superior Court, 174 Cal. 243, 162 Pac. 1032.

[2] While the court in a divorce action, as held in Olson v. Superior Court, 175 Cal. 250, 105 Pac. 706, 1 A. L. R. 1589, has the inherent power to refuse to enter a final decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony where it is made to appear that upon a condonation of the offense upon which the interlocutory judgment is based the parties resumed marital relations, it does not follow from such fact that the court, after the lapse of a year, has jurisdiction to vacate an interlocutory judgment the integrity of which, in so far as it determines the facts properly involved therein, is unaffected by subsequent relations of the parties. The facts having been judicially determined by a final judgment, it can only be set aside by a proceeding in the nature of a direct attack thereon. The question involved in the Olson Case was the right to a writ of mandate, compelling the trial court to enter a final judgment where it appeared the parties had within a year effected a reconciliation and resumed marital relations. It cannot be deemed an authority in support of respondent's contention.

[3] Conceding the court is without jurisdiction to grant the motion, respondent insists that petitioner's remedy for such unwarranted action, if had, is by an appeal. While it is true that a writ of prohibition will not ordinarily issue where there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law (Lindley v. Superior Court, 141 Cal. 220, 74 Pac. 765), and conceding that the order if made would, since made after judgment, be the subject of an appeal, nevertheless there are exceptional cases where an appeal is not an adequate remedy, among which are those where in obtaining a reversal of the unwarranted ruling of the court the aggrieved party would be subjected to other than the usual expense of a trial and appeal, where, due to the nature of the case, no recovery could be had therefor. Ophir Silver Min. Co. v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 467, 82 Pac. 70; Glide v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 21, 81 Pac. 225. While petitioner would upon an appeal be entitled to a reversal of the order, he could, by order of court, be compelled to supply his wife with the necessary means to enable her to resist the appeal; and likewise, under an order of court, compelled to pay his wife suit money and costs asked for in a futile prosecution of the second action instituted by her for divorce, as to all of which the law makes no provision for reimbursement.

The trial court is without jurisdiction to entertain the motion or make the order therein applied for, and under the circumstances, conceding that petitioner might appeal therefrom, it would not afford him an adequate remedy for the unwarranted action.

The alternative writ of prohibition heretofore granted is made permanent.

ROBINSON v. ORDER OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES. (Civ. 3872.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 5, 1921. Rehearing Denied Aug. 4, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 1, 1921.)

Insurance — 618—Action on accident policy may be brought where insured was killed; "obligation or liability arises."

Within Const. art. 12, § 16, providing that a corporation may be sued "where the obligation or liability arises," action by the beneficiary of an accident policy may be brought in the county where insured was killed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by Alta Robinson against the Order of Railway Employees. From an order denying change of venue, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hartley F. Peart, of San Francisco, and Puter & Quinn, of Eureka, for appellant.

J. J. Cairns and J. Logan Beamer, both of Eureka, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order denying its application for a change of the place of trial of this action from the county of Humboldt to the city and county of San Francisco. The action is one instituted by the plaintiff, as the mother of one Stanley Robinson, to recover upon a policy of accident insurance issued by the defendant to the latter and in which the plaintiff was named as beneficiary, the said Stanley Robinson having met accidental and violent injuries causing his death in the county of Humboldt on June 3, 1919, in which county both deceased and his mother, the plaintiff herein, resided at the time of his death. The defendant is a California corporation having its principle place of business in the city and county of San Francisco. The contract of accident insurance between the defendant and the deceased was made, executed, and delivered in said city and county of San Francisco, and the payments of the premiums due and to become due thereon were to be made there. The appellant insists that under the provisions of the state Constitution with respect to the place of trial of actions against corporations it was entitled to have its motion for a change of the place of trial to the city and county of San Francisco granted. Said provision of the Constitution reads as follows:

"A corporation or association may be sued in the county where the contract is made or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises or the breach occurs, or in the county in which the principal place of business of such corporation is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as in other cases." Const. art. 12, § 16.

It requires no citation of authority to support the appellant's contention that it would have been entitled to a change of venue to the place where the contract of insurance between itself and the deceased son of the plaintiff was made and was to be performed, namely, the principal place of business of the defendant corporation; but this contention does not entirely cover the terms of the foregoing section of the Constitution relating to the place of trial of actions against domestic corporations, since that section further provides that such corporations may be sued "in the county where * * * the obligation or liability arises or the breach occurs." It is the contention of the respondent herein that, aside from the fact that the contract between the defendant and the deceased was made and was to be performed in the city and county of San Francisco, the obligation or liability thereon arose and the breach thereof occurred in the county of Humboldt, wherein both the plaintiff and the deceased resided at the time of the latter's death. We are referred to no decision of the courts of this state wherein the direct question presented upon this appeal has been sufficiently touched upon or decided to be regarded as an authority herein; but the courts of other states seem to have quite uniformly held that the place where the holder of a policy of accident insurance is injured or killed is the place where the cause of action arises, and hence where under the statutes of those several jurisdictions an action may properly be commenced and tried. Rippstein v. St. Louis Mut. Life Ins. Co., 57 Mo. 86; Bruil v. N. W. Mut. Relief Ass'n, 72 Wis. 430, 39 N. W. 529; Attorney General v. Equitable Acc. Ins. Ass'n, 175 Mass. 196, 55 N. E. 890; Hildebrand v. United Artisans, 46 Or. 134, 79 Pac. 347, 114 Am. St. Rep. 852; Bankers' Life, etc., v. Shelton, 84 Mo. App. 634; Roberts v. Nat. Assur. Co., 201 Mo. App. 239, 212 S. W. 391; Ins. Co. of North America v. McLimans, 28 Neb. 653, 44 N. W. 991. In 11 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. 384, it is stated:

"Where statutes provide that an insurance company may be sued within the county in which the cause of action or some part of it arose, it is generally held that an action on a policy of life insurance is maintainable in the county where the insured resided and died."

It is true that in most of the foregoing cases the phrase "in which the cause of action arose" is used; while in the section of the Constitution above quoted the phrase "in which the obligation or liability arises" is employed. We see no real distinction between these two phrases, since the term "cause of action" can only be held to refer as to its inception to the obligation or liability from which it springs. In the case at bar there was no existing obligation or liability to the plaintiff as the decedent's beneficiary until his death, which occurred, as we have seen, in Humboldt county, where this action was properly begun.

Order affirmed.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the sureties on a contractor's bond from a judgment in favor of a materialman.

The decision of the superior court was based on the case of General Electric Co. v. American Bonding Co. of Baltimore, 180 Cal. 675, 182 Pac. 444. After a very careful examination of the record and briefs filed in the instant case, we believe it is not distinguishable from the General Electric Company case, supra; but, on the contrary, we are of the opinion that the aforementioned case is directly in point under the facts of the present case.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PARKER. (Cr. 949.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 26, 1921.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

William H. Parker was convicted of "pimping," and he appeals. Affirmed.

L. Gonsalves and Victor A. Dunn, both of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Rioridan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. Defendant was convicted by a jury of the offense designated "pimping" in an act approved February 8, 1911, and found in Statutes of 1911 at page 10. He moved for a new trial, which motion was denied, as was also his motion for probation, after the filing of the report of the probation officer thereon. From the judgment of the court rendered herein the defendant appeals.

The appeal is based solely upon the claim of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. No useful purpose would be served by a review of the evidence in this opinion. The evidence is ample to support the verdict, and we think no other verdict could have been reached by the jury.

The judgment is affirmed.

purchaser for the land, defendant would attempt to do so, and the parties should each receive one-third of the commission or profits of making the sale, etc.

6. Brokers ⇨66 — Broker cannot repudiate agreement to share commissions.

Where the owner of land employed a broker to sell, who took in a second broker under an arrangement providing that if another broker was taken in the commissions were to be divided three ways, so that the original broker found the land, while the second broker found the third, who found a purchaser, after consummation of the joint project, such third broker cannot repudiate his contract and deprive the other brokers of their just proportion of the fruits of the enterprise.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by J. E. West and others against the Visalia Abstract Company, wherein J. Goree intervened. Judgment for plaintiffs, and intervener appeals. Judgment affirmed.

Everts & Ewing and Gallaher & Simpson, all of Fresno, for appellant.

E. I. Feemster and D. E. Perkins, both of Visalia, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The record justifies this statement of facts: Messrs. Gibson, Quinn, and Snell were the owners of a certain tract of land in Tulare county. Mr. Gibson agreed with one J. W. Fewel that if the latter would find a purchaser for the land that the owners would sell it for $65,000 cash, and Fewel could retain all above that sum that the purchaser might pay for the land. Fewel at once entered into a verbal agreement with one J. E. West that if the latter would assist the former in finding a purchaser they would divide the profits or commissions equally, and, if desirable, they would obtain the assistance of a third party, and in that event they would divide the commissions equally among the three in case of sale. West then approached intervener, John Goree, and told him of this tract of land and of the terms upon which it could be purchased, and stated that if he would find a purchaser they would divide the profits or commissions equally; that is, that Fewel, West, and Goree would each receive one-third thereof. West told Goree that Fewel only had a verbal agreement with the owners of the land, but that on account of the close personal and business relations between Mr. Gibson and Mr. Fewel he had no doubt that the owners would carry out their agreement. Goree agreed to the proposition, and promised to aid in the sale of the land upon the terms proposed.

Within a day or two thereafter, and at the express personal direction of West and Fewel, Mr. Goree took an intending purchaser to Mr. Gibson at Visalia. Mr. Gibson, Mr. Goree, and said purchaser visited the land, and then went to see Mr. Quinn at Exeter.

WEST et al. v. VISALIA ABSTRACT CO. (GOREE, Intervener). (Civ. 2274.)

1. Contracts ⇨108(2)—Brokers' agreement for division of commission not illegal.

An agreement between realty brokers acting for the seller for division of the commission earned on a sale is not illegal, or against public policy.

2. Brokers ⇨66—Agreement for division of commission need not be in writing.

A contract between realty brokers for division of a commission earned on the sale of realty need not be in writing.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1)—Appellate court must uphold finding substantially supported.

An appellate court must uphold the finding of the trial court, if there be any substantial evidence in its favor, whatever may be the showing in opposition.

4. Brokers ⇨86(8)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding as to owners' agreement.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain the court's finding that the owners of the land verbally agreed with plaintiff that if he could find a purchaser at a given price he might retain as his commission all sums paid by the purchaser over the price.

5. Brokers ⇨86(1)—Evidence in action for share of commission sufficient to support finding.

In an action between brokers for a share of a commission earned on a sale, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that plaintiff and defendant brokers made an agreement whereby, in consideration of such plaintiff broker and another broker permitting defendant to find a

This purchaser could not pay the full purchase price, but only about $15,000 in cash, and the balance to be in certain installments. The owners therefore fixed the purchase price at $72,000, upon which they were to pay a commission of 5 per cent., and on these terms the sale was effected. Immediately thereafter West saw Goree, and made inquiry about the deal, at which time the latter stated to the former that he had been unable to close it upon the original basis, and that he was compelled to accept a commission of a little more than $1,900, and that by reason thereof each would receive a little more than $600. Later on Fewel and West discovered that the commissions amounted to $3,600, and, Goree having declined to recognize the claim of plaintiffs according to the contract, and a dispute having thus arisen as to the manner in which the commissions were to be divided, $2,000 of which was immediately payable, the owners of the property paid said sum to the Visalia Abstract Company with instructions to pay the same to the persons entitled thereto. Thereupon, plaintiffs commenced this action against said company to obtain the commissions, and Goree filed a complaint in intervention claiming that he was entitled to the whole thereof. At the time of the trial, the Visalia Abstract Company paid the $2,000 into court, to be disposed of as directed by the judgment in this action.

[1] There appears to be nothing illegal or against public policy in such contract. No good reason has been suggested why it may not be enforced. It is to be observed that the transaction involves an agreement between brokers for the division of a commission, and does not relate to the payment of a commission by the owners. The owners, for whom the services were performed, have indeed paid the money into court, and are only concerned in being protected against any duplicate claim.

[2] We do not understand that any objection is made to the validity of the contract on the ground that it was not in writing. In fact, appellant declares in his closing brief:

"We have no quarrel with the authorities cited by counsel in relation to contracts between brokers for a division of commissions earned upon the sale of real estate. There is no law that requires such a contract, or any memorandum thereof, to be in writing. It is also true that where such a contract is carried out and performed, and commission is paid to one of the parties to the contract by the vendor of the land, it is immaterial whether or not there had existed a contract in writing between the vendor and the agent selling the land."

Appellant, though, contends that these principles are not applicable to the situation herein, and he particularizes as follows:

[3, 4] 1. There is no support for this finding of the court:

"That about the month of February, 1919, J. F. Gibson, A. W. Quinn, and E. C. Snell, being then the owners of a certain tract of land in the county of Tulare, state of California, did verbally agree with plaintiff, J. W. Fewel, that, if he could and would find a purchaser for said land at a price to net to them the sum of $65,000 cash, said J. W. Fewel might retain as his commission and compensation all sums which said purchaser would pay for said land over and above said sum of $65,000."

In his contention as to this point, appellant ignores the rule that requires an appellate court to uphold a finding of the trial court, if there be any substantial evidence in its favor, whatever may be the showing in opposition. The very testimony quoted by appellant justifies the finding. J. W. Fewel testified:

"Why, I don't remember as to the dates, but it was some week or two weeks before the sale was consummated I had a conversation with Mr. Gibson in the office relative to this land, and I suggested to him that if he would make a price on it I thought I might find a buyer, so, after some preliminary conversation, we agreed that they would take $65,000 net and allow me to make whatever commission I could. * * * I might further state that he was to allow me a few days to carry on the proposition, and there was no specified time."

We must, of course, give full credit to the foregoing testimony, and its significance is easily understood. It is true that Fewel seems to have dealt with Gibson alone, but there is no contention that he was not authorized to represent the other owners.

Fewel is indeed corroborated by Gibson, who, testifying in reference to this conversation, said:

"Well, we talked about the selling of this place, and I told Mr. Fewel that he could sell it for $65,000 in cash, net.

"Q. Was anything said about his retaining anything in excess of that in case he found a purchaser? A. Well, I suppose he was going to make whatever he made over that. I don't know whether we had any conversation about that or not. Of course, he would not sell the land for nothing."

As stated by the learned trial judge:

"If he gave him a price, if he sold it for more and got the money, he would have the excess, I suppose that would follow naturally."

True, Mr. Quinn testified that the agreement was that it should be sold to Mr. Fewel for $65,000, and that "not to my knowledge" was anything said that, if he did not buy it himself, and should sell it to another, he should have the surplus.

It would seem to make little difference whether the agreement was to sell it to Fewel, or to any purchaser whom he might secure, but, at any rate, the finding is amply supported if we regard Quinn's testimony as adverse.

[5] 2. The same claim is made as to this finding:

"That thereupon said J. E. West and intervenor, John Goree, entered into an agreement whereby, in consideration of said Fewel and said West permitting said Goree to find a purchaser for said land, said Goree would attempt to find a purchaser therefor, and in the event that such purchaser was found by said Goree to purchase said land, then said Fewel, West, and Goree should each receive one-third of the commission or profits of making said sale."

It may be admitted that the agreement between the parties was not expressed in the identical language of the finding, but it is a fair inference from their conversation that such was their understanding and their engagement.

In reference to his conversation with Mr. Goree, Mr. West testified:

"I told him of this land, and that we had it for $65,000 net, and that I and Mr. Fewel were to have all over $65,000 that we sold it for, and if he cared to have—to help us sell it, we would give him one-third of the commission."

Referring to another conversation with Goree, he said:

"I told him that we were to make all over $65,000 that we sold the land for, and that would be divided three ways equally between him and Mr. Fewel and myself. He said he did not generally work on a split commission, or something to that effect, but he said that looks as though it is easy to sell, and I am willing to work. * * * Later in that afternoon I met Mr. Fewel on the street in passing through, and I told him our arrangement with Mr. Goree. That Mr. Goree would go down next day with his party, and also the other parties that I had on, and after we had talked a little bit I saw Mr. Goree across the street, and I went over and took him to Mr. Fewel and introduced him. Mr. Fewel asked me if I would be down there with him, and I said I could not be; in fact, I asked Mr. Fewel to go, and he said he could not go, and Mr. Fewel told him to go direct to Mr. Gibson and he would get all the information he needed, any help."

If the trial court believed the foregoing testimony—and obviously it did—it could reach no other conclusion than is contained in said finding. It may be that Goree did not say categorically that he accepted said terms, but they were proposed, and he said he was willing to work, and he immediately acted upon them by securing a purchaser. Of course, an agreement to the terms of a proposed contract may be evidenced and confirmed by conduct, as well as by verbal expression.

True, Mr. Goree differs somewhat in his recital of what took place, but we are not concerned with any conflict. We may add that, beyond question, he accepted and acted upon the situation as presented by Fewel and West, and there is evidence that, after the sale was made, he recognized this obligation under the agreement with them to divide the commissions earned into three parts, although at the same time misrepresenting to West the amount of commission actually earned. Respondent calls attention to the fact that this testimony is undisputed.

3. Appellant criticizes another finding, to the extent that it declares the owners of the property agreed "to pay a commission to the person or persons entitled thereto," the contention being that they agreed to pay it to John Goree. However, it is manifest that this is entirely immaterial. They could not preclude plaintiffs from asserting their claim to their proportion by an agreement that they would pay it to appellant. The fact is, though, that it is a fair inference from the testimony of Mr. Gibson, one of the owners, that they considered plaintiffs to be interested in the commissions and made the agreement accordingly.

4. Appellant makes the point that the evidence does not support the finding that the owners paid $2,000, the portion of the commissions which were due, to the abstract company, in escrow, to be paid to the persons entitled to receive said commissions. This portion of the finding is utterly immaterial, since it is admitted that the money at the trial was paid into court to abide the judgment. Moreover, Mr. Gibson testified:

"All this money went in together, into the escrow fund, and we retained this amount to pay who should have that commission when it was decided on who should have it; and it has laid and laid there all this time."

Thus is apparent how little fault can be found with said finding, even if it be deemed important.

5. The only question that could seemingly invite real controversy arises from the fact that the sale was made upon terms somewhat different from those negotiated by Fewel, and the claim that the owners repudiated or terminated the agreement with said plaintiff prior to the actual sale. Mr. Quinn testified that, when Mr. Goree produced the purchaser—

"We stated that we had offered that place for $65,000, and the proposition that he had was on a contract with a small payment down, and, of course, the other offer we had made of $65,000 did not include any commission. So we outlined the proposition of $72,000 for the property. We were to pay Mr. Goree 5 per cent. commission upon that purchase price, and the terms as stated in the contract."

He also testified that Mr. Gibson stated that—

"The offer we had given Mr. Fewel to buy it at $65,000 cash was off, and that we need pay no more attention to that."

As to the facts, it is to be observed that the parties considered the terms of the sale equivalent to those submitted to Fewel. The variance, at any rate, in that respect is too slight to be of vital importance.

It may be said, also, that it is a fair inference from other testimony that Gibson knew that Goree was acting under an agreement with plaintiffs, and in pursuance of said original agreement, and that Gibson had this in view when he made said declaration to Quinn. Indeed, though not positive about it, he was under conviction that Goree told him who had sent him to negotiate for the property. Anyhow, he understood it from his conversation with plaintiffs. Naturally he would inform the other owners, and, upon the theory that Goree and Gibson were honest and honorable men, we must assume that the real situation was understood.

[6] Moreover, appellant has unduly magnified the minor circumstances of the case. The essential fact is that there was a joint venture by these three parties upon an agreement to divide equally the profits. It is sententiously stated by respondent as follows:

"Mr. Fewel held the keystone position in the whole transaction from the beginning. It was he who had the knowledge that the land was for sale, and who had the primary right to purchase it. It is not shown that any one else knew that the land was on the market. In order to find a purchaser promptly he took in West under an arrangement that provided that if another broker was taken in then the commissions were to be divided three ways, or one-third each. Then we see that Fewel found the land, West found a broker who could find a purchaser, and Goree found the purchaser."

Manifestly, they all contributed to the result, and after the consummation of their joint project, it is too late for appellant to repudiate his contract and seek to deprive respondents of their just proportion of the fruits of the enterprise.

The judgment is affirmed.

BUTTERS et al. v. CITY OF OAKLAND et al.
(Civ. 3782.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 22, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 19, 1921.)

1. Municipal corporations ⚡266—Grade of streets under one act and improvement under another held proper.

It was proper to adopt an ordinance under Change of Grade Act of 1909, purporting to change grades of a street, and then to cause the improvement of such street to be made to such changed grade under Improvement Act of 1911; the first act making no provision either for damages or the doing of improvement work on streets.

2. Municipal corporations ⚡112(2)—Ordinance held not to embrace more than one subject.

An ordinance of the city of Oakland relating to change of grade of certain streets in the same neighborhood, and incidentally giving an official name to one of the streets, was not invalid as embracing more than one subject in its title, contrary to Oakland City Charter, § 46, subd. 4.

3. Statutes ⚡105(1)—Liberal construction of provisions relating to titles to acts.

Provisions of Constitution and laws relating to the subject-matter and titles of acts should be construed liberally, so as to permit matters which are germane to the main purpose of the enactment to be included in it.

4. Municipal corporations ⚡340—Noncollusive affidavit of contractor held unnecessary for street improvement.

Where Oakland city council adopted the Street Improvement Act of 1911 as the general law under which a street improvement should be made, the terms of such general law were controlling in the premises, and the provision of the city charter (article 19, § 126) requiring a noncollusive affidavit on the part of a contractor did not apply, in view of article 14, § 15, subd. 46, of such charter.

5. Municipal corporations ⚡488, 489(7)—Complaint of informalities in bid not available to prevent assessment, in absence of filing of notice with city council.

Where city adopted Street Improvement Act of 1911 as the general law under which improvement was to be made, informalities in contractor's bid for the work, such as a failure to accompany it with a noncollusive affidavit, could not be complained of, where no notice in writing regarding such defect was filed with the clerk of the council as required by section 16.

6. Municipal corporations ⚡439—Assessment for street improvement held not void.

In an action to restrain assessment for street improvements under Street Improvement Act of 1911, assessment held not void because property was not shown to have been benefited.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

7. Eminent domain ⚡167(3)—Property owner entitled to hearing in court on change of grade of street.

Establishing official grade of street under Change of Grade Act of 1909, without instituting any proceeding to ascertain and provide for the payment of damages caused by the raising or lowering of the level of the street by the change of grade, and proceeding to improve the street under Street Improvement Act of 1911 and reducing it to the official grade, would have the effect, if nothing further occurred, of changing the grade without compensation, and principles of justice would not allow such a proceeding without the test of an examination in the court.

8. Municipal corporations ⚡488, 489(5)—Restraint of performance of contract, and not collection of assessment, proper remedy.

Where city changed grade of street without making provision for payment of damages, the remedy of the property owner was not to enjoin the collection of the assessment levied to pay the cost of the work, but to enjoin the performance of the contract prior to the work having been done until damages were paid, in case the result of such work would cause damage to the abutting property, constituting no defense against the collection of the assessment.

9. Eminent domain — 101(1)—Liable for damage to abutting property by changes in street.

A city is liable for damage caused to abutting property by excavation or fills in a street in front thereof.

Action by Charles Butters and others against the City of Oakland and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed in District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Johnson & Shaw, of Oakland (R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent Marsh Bros. & Gardiner, Inc.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiffs in this action sought to enjoin the recordation of a certain assessment for street improvements in the city of Oakland done under the district plan provided for by the terms of the Improvement Act of 1911. St. 1911, p. 730. The same assessment was before the Supreme Court in the case of Rockridge Place v. City of Oakland, 178 Cal. 58, 172 Pac. 1110, in which case the facts were quite fully stated and a number of the points discussed on this appeal were decided. It will be only necessary therefore to refer to such of the facts of the case as may be germane to the legal questions presented for the first time upon this appeal.

[1] Somewhat more than one year prior to the adoption by the council of the city of Oakland of the resolution of intention by which the proceedings under review upon this appeal were initiated the said council adopted an ordinance under the so-called Change of Grade Act of 1909 (St. 1909, p. 1018), purporting to change certain grades on Broadway, which at the point along its route affected by the present proceeding was at that time unimproved in the sense that it had not previously been graded or paved. While this change of grade act of 1909 prescribes a detailed procedure for accomplishing the change or modification of the grades of public streets after notice and an opportunity to protest and have a hearing thereon upon the part of abutting owners, it contains no provision for the assessment or award of damages arising out of such change of grade, and this probably for the reason that the change or modification of the grade of the street affected thereby is merely a record or paper change out of which in itself no particular damage to abutting property owners could arise. The appellant herein, however, seems to complain that the council of Oakland saw fit to change the grade of Broadway and then to cause the improvement of said street to be made to such changed grade under another and different act, viz. the Improvement Act of 1911.

We fail to appreciate the force of this contention, since the change of grade of 1909 made no provision either for damages, or for the doing of improvement work upon streets, the grades of which had thus been changed of record. Whatever improvements were thereafter to be done upon such street must therefore necessarily be initiated and carried forward under some other street improvement act; and we can see no reason why the council was not at liberty to select the Improvement Act of 1911 as the act under which the improvement in question was to be accomplished, or wherein the plaintiffs had any ground of complaint at the action of the council in the selection of said act in making such street improvement.

The appellant, and in this same connection, urges that the ordinance of the council under which the change of grade of Broadway was accomplished was invalid for the reason that it embraced more than one subject in its title, contrary to the provisions of section 46, subdivision 4, of the Oakland Charter.

[2, 3] We do not find this objection to be well founded. The general subject of the ordinance in question was that of the change of grade of certain streets in the same neighborhood; and the fact that there were several of these streets affected by the proposed change of grade, or that in the course of making the change it became necessary incidentally to give the official name of Patton street to one of said streets, did not render the ordinance void as embracing more than one subject. It is a well-established rule that the provisions of Constitutions and laws relating to the subject-matter and titles of acts should be construed liberally so as to permit of matters which are germane to the main purpose of the enactment to be included in it. 36 Cyc. p. 1017; Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed.) p. 204.

[4, 5] The next contention of the appellants is that the contract for the street work in payment for which the assessment in question was levied, and about to be recorded, was void for the reason that the bid of the contractor was not accompanied by his affidavit, that his bid was genuine and not sham or collusive, required by the terms of section 126 of article 19 of the Oakland

Charter. This section of the charter, however, is a portion of the general article therein entitled "Public Work and Supplies," and is not a portion of those other parts or provisions in said charter having special reference to street work. When these are referred to they are found to contain the following provision:

"Whenever in the judgment of the council the cost and expense of any of the foregoing (street improvements) should be paid by special assessment on private property, the general laws of the State of California in force at the time of the improvement shall govern and control, and all procedure shall be in conformity thereto." Charter, subd. 46, § 15, art. 14.

The Street Improvement Act of 1911, expressly adopted by the Oakland council as the general law under which the improvement in question was to be made, does not contain any requirement as to a noncollusive affidavit on the part of the contractor; and we are of the opinion that the terms of said general law are controlling in the premises, and that the provision of said charter relied upon by the appellants does not apply to street work undertaken under this general law. The case of Barber v. Costa, 171 Cal. 138, 152 Pac. 296, cited by the appellants in support of their contention, shows when examined a material difference between the terms of the charter of San Jose and those of the charter of Oakland in respect to this particular matter, since by the terms of the former charter its provisions are expressly made controlling over the general law in case of a conflict between the two; while on the other hand the charter of Oakland gives the entire control over this class of street improvements to the general law.

In addition it may be said that even if it were to be conceded that the objection which the appellant now urges to the contractor's bid was originally a good and valid objection thereto, it was such an objection as would be waived by the property owner through his failure to avail himself of the provisions of section 16 of the Improvement Act in question by filing with the clerk of the council a notice in writing stating in what respect the acts and proceedings thus far taken were irregular, defective, erroneous, or faulty. Having thus failed to avail himself of this special remedy the property owner cannot, after the contractor has expended his time and money in the improvement of the street in front of his property, be heard to complain of informalities in his bid for the work. Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 405, 14 Pac. 71; Harney v. Benson, 113 Cal. 314, 45 Pac. 687; O'Dea v. Mitchell, 144 Cal. 374, 77 Pac. 1020.

The next several contentions of the appellants have reference to questions which were considered and decided adversely to the appellants' position in the case of Rockridge Place v. City of Oakland, supra, and hence a restatement or reconsideration of those matters is deemed unnecessary.

[6] The case of Spring Street Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 170 Cal. 24, 148 Pac. 217, L. R. A. 1918E, 197, relied upon by the appellants as supporting their contention that the assessment was void because this property was not shown to have been benefited, has been distinguished from cases identical with the case at bar by both the supreme and appellate tribunals, the basis of distinction being that that case was a proceeding in eminent domain while these are street assessment cases. Cutting v. Vaughn, 187 Pac. 19; Hutchinson v. Coughlin Co., 184 Pac. 435. We think the distinction therein drawn has application to the facts of the case at bar.

Judgment affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [7-9] The petition for a rehearing in this court is denied. The record indicates that the City of Oakland, after establishing the official grade of the street and without instituting any proceeding to ascertain and provide for the payment of the damages caused by the raising or lowering of the level of the street by the change of grade, proceeded to improve the street under the Street Improvement Act of 1911, and reduced it to the official grade. The effect would be, if nothing further occurred, that the change of grade would actually take place without previous compensation to the owners for the damages caused thereby, if any. If this closed the case so far as the right to damages was concerned we do not think the principles of justice would allow such a proceeding without the test of an examination in the courts. But the remedy of the property owners in such a case is not to enjoin the collection of the assessment levied to pay the cost of the work, but to enjoin the performance of the contract prior to the work having been done until damages are paid, in case the result of such work would cause damage to the abutting property. It constitutes no defense against the collection of the assessment. That the city is liable for damages caused to the abutting property by excavation or fills in a street in front thereof, see Eachus v. Los Angeles, 130 Cal. 493, 62 Pac. 829, 80 Am.St.Rep. 147; Eachus v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 103 Cal. 614, 37 Pac. 750, 42 Am.St.Rep. 149; *Reardon v. KASHIKI v. CALIFORNIA GROWERS & SHIPPERS, INC. (Civ. 3426.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 5, 1921.)

1. Account — Evidence held to prove that defendant had made a double charge against plaintiff in a certain amount.

In an action for an accounting between plaintiff, engaged in the growing of crops, and the defendant, engaged in the marketing thereof, evidence held to justify the court in finding that the defendant, who had kept the accounts of the transactions between the parties in its books, had made a double charge against the plaintiff in a certain amount.

2. Contracts — Parol modification of written contract, wholly unexecuted on both sides, did not impair integrity of writing.

Parol modification of a written contract, where wholly unexecuted on both sides, did not operate to impair the integrity of the original writing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by F. U. Kashiki against the California Growers & Shippers, Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

H. L. Welch and Jas. W. Glassford, both of El Centro, for appellant.

Hickcox & Crenshaw and Frederick J. Trude, all of El Centro, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action for an accounting under the operations of the parties pursuant to two contracts between them. The contracts had to do with the growing and marketing of melons and lettuce; plaintiff contracting as a grower of such products and defendant as a concern engaged in marketing them. The accounts of the transactions between the parties were kept in the books of defendant. Plaintiff had judgment for $2,254.60, and defendant appeals.

An item of $1,000, included in the amount for which judgment was rendered, was allowed respondent upon the theory that appellant had made a double charge against him, in that amount, on its books. Appellant contends that there was no sufficient evidence of the double charge, and that the trial court erred in allowing the item. The point must be resolved almost wholly upon the testimony of the president of appellant, who was the only witness sworn in the case. Both parties argue the question upon the basis of that testimony, pointing, in support of their respective claims, to various statements made by the president. Appellant, it is true, refers to the books as having been introduced in evidence, but reproduces in its brief no entries from them which bear on this question, the appeal being under the alternative method, nor is it argued, nor does appellant say it was objected at the trial, that statements made by the witness as to entries appearing in the books were not the best evidence. After this preface, let us examine the testimony. The record shows the following, at one place:

"Mr. Hickcox (counsel for respondent): * * * His books show that $1,000 both ways. In the statement he has given us, he has charged us with that $1,000 twice. Their books show that—

"The Witness: Here is a charge we have charged against Mr. Kashiki, $1,010.43. He borrowed that money on our note, with the interest, which he paid, and we charged it against him. There is another $1,000 charged against him, and that was the only $1,000. When we borrowed money for him, we charged it against him, and when he paid it, we charged this amount also against him.

"Q. By the Court: This is where you paid the bank the note? A. Yes, sir; when the $1,000 was borrowed, it was entered on the books, and that is the statement Mr. Hickcox alleges. This was where we paid the note to the bank, and we charged him. If that is the case, this $1,000 would not show here. It would be a double entry and an error of the bookkeeper."

The witness continued for a few lines upon other matters, and then came back to the questioned item, thus:

"We have that entry, but we cannot find a voucher for the $1,000. It might have been at the time we paid that $1,000 we took from the bank and paid it, we entered it against Mr. Kashiki, and when we took up that note we entered another $1,000 against him. I cannot state that positively."

A page further on the record shows this:

"The Court: If that money was borrowed and charged to him and when the note was taken up and paid it was charged to him, that is a duplicate charge.

"A. The only difficulty is I cannot see exactly—there is $1,000 entered here that Mr. Kashiki claims he hasn't received. Whether the $1,000 was actually given to Mr. Kashiki and when he got the money from the bank and they entered it against him and made a double charge of 1010.43, I cannot state, although I think the statement of Mr. Hickcox is correct. Personally, I think he is correct.

"The Court: It looks reasonable that that could happen.

"A. Before any judgment is entered for the full amount, I request the court to have a few days to have the bookkeeper go over it. I said I would go over the books with the court and Mr. Hickcox, and then submit it for final settlement.

"The Court: We want to get this matter concluded. As I understand Mr. Hickcox's contention, the amount is $2,254.60.

"Mr. Hickcox: Yes sir, and that amount is practically agreed upon so far as any amount is agreed upon, but Mr. Glassford thinks he has a matter that should offset that."

Mr. Glassford then questioned the witness about the matter referred to by Mr. Hickcox, which was wholly apart from the question of the disputed item of $1,000.

[1] It is evident from the extracts we have made from the record that the issue as to the double charge was tried in an informal manner, and in an endeavor to reach a settlement of the question in a good-natured way. It is shown by the briefs that before the president of appellant took the witness stand the parties went over the books in an attempt to compose their differences amicably. According to one of the briefs, this process occupied nearly a day. This circumstance explains the informal manner in which the witness was examined, and it explains, especially, the last three statements included in our excerpt from the record, one by the witness, one by the court, and one by Mr. Hickcox. Upon the situation thus disclosed, as a background, it is to be observed that the witness finally stated, "Personally, I think he [Mr. Hickcox] is correct;" that it plainly appears that the trial judge had the books under his eye during the testimony, an opportunity which is denied us; that the request of the witness for further time to go over the books was not followed by counsel with any demand for a continuance for that purpose; and that counsel made no attempt to challenge the final statement of Mr. Hickcox, but immediately went on with an examination into the question which the latter had suggested as involving a possible offset against the stated total of $2,254.60. Further, when the witness was under examination as to the alleged offset, he said:

"Mr. Kashiki owes us money which brings our indebtedness from $2,250 considerably down. * * *"

Then the following transpired:

"Q. If it hadn't been for this arrangement [involving the claimed offset] * * * you then admit you would have owed him $2,250? * * * A. Yes, sir; if that is the way I understand it."

Under all these circumstances the court was amply justified in allowing the item of $1,000.

The remaining point in the case arises upon the matter which has been mentioned as a possible offset, which offset was not allowed by the trial court. A contract between the parties, referred to as the contract of 1918, provided that appellant was to advance to respondent 25 cents per crate for picking and hauling lettuce, and was to charge him not to exceed 50 cents per crate for packing. The president of the appellant testified:

"Later, Mr. Kashiki said, 'I will throw in my hauling and picking this lettuce, and you throw in your packing charges, which would make a difference from $500 to $1,000.' I said, 'Kashiki, I will let you do it, provided we carry on our business for 1920,' and when that statement was made, that was our understanding, but afterward Mr. Kashiki refused to do business with us, and revoked the contract."

The reference to "that statement" will be better understood from an earlier portion of the testimony of the witness, where he said:

"He [Kashiki] came to the office and received his statement on the basis he submitted to us, and he later repudiated the contract for the 1920 crop, and on that basis we have gone back to the status of the former contract. I consented to his changing it for the reason that we would carry on business in 1920. We didn't do any business in 1920, and I think the language and understanding of the contract of 1918 should prevail."

[2] In their brief counsel for appellant claim the offset on the ground that there was a failure of consideration for the modification of the written contract, in that respondent "repudiated his agreement, and failed and refused to market any of his products of 1920 through the defendant company," but we do not see how such a question can arise. To say that the consideration failed is to say that the alteration of the written contract was complete, but it really never was consummated. The attempt to make the change was by parol, and the parol arrangement was wholly unexecuted on both sides. It therefore never operated, under the law, to impair the integrity of the original writing. The true situation was better expressed by the witness, arguing from the stand, than in the contention of counsel that there was a failure of consideration under a consummated agreement. The witness said, "I think the language and understanding of the contract of 1918 should prevail." The situation, as it appears to us, is this: So far as the present question is concerned the action is for an accounting under the written contract of 1918. There is nothing in the pleadings on either side upon which to base a claim that the writing had been altered by a subsequent parol agreement. At the trial, as part of his evidence in the accounting, respondent relied upon a written statement furnished him by appellant, from which charges for packing lettuce had been omitted, although they would have been proper under the contract. The witness was called upon to explain the omission, and it seems to us that his explanation was complete and full, in the absence of contradictory evidence. The case must be retried, but it will be retried as to this one issue alone, which course will involve an ascertainment of the amount of the charges for packing, that amount to be subject to the deduction of any sum due respondent under the contract of 1918 for picking and hauling the lettuce. The amount thus resulting will be deducted in turn from $2,254.60, the amount of the present judgment, and a new judgment be rendered for respondent accordingly.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial in accordance with this opinion.

MAURICE v. LEHNHARDT. (Civ. 3775.)

Master and servant $\Rightarrow$ 80(10)—Evidence held to show salary checks satisfied all claims.

In an action by an employé to recover from his employer a sum as due for extra services rendered, evidence held to support the trial court's findings that defendant employer by the weekly salary checks given plaintiff employé had fully paid and satisfied all claims and demands which plaintiff employé had against her.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred Wood, Judge.

Action by J. J. Maurice against Hattie Lehnhardt, etc. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Howard K. James, of Oakland, for appellant.

Richard M. Lyman, Jr., and Vance McClymonds, both of Oakland, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought to recover the sum of $347.46, claimed to be due plaintiff from defendant for services rendered, including a certain sum due as interest upon an account stated. Judgment went for defendant and plaintiff appeals.

It appears from the evidence that plaintiff was employed by defendant to determine the factory cost of certain products manufactured by her in the candy business. The alleged claim grew out of services performed by plaintiff on Sundays, which services plaintiff testified were outside of his regular employment, and for which plaintiff's manager had promised him he would be paid. The services covered a period of some two years, during which time plaintiff had received and accepted a salary check of $46.03 each, and every week he was employed by defendant, attached to which was a slip stating that the amount of the check was for salary for the particular week for which it was given. These checks, 118 in number, were received by the plaintiff during the course of his employment without any objection as to the sufficiency or correctness of the amount. Upon the severance of their relation of employment plaintiff for the first time demanded payment for 38 days' services covering the several or various Sundays intervening during the course of his employment, claiming that the amount received by him as a weekly salary was for a 6-day period only, and that the same did not include payment for the services he rendered on Sundays. The demand for payment of these extra services was made by letter, in which plaintiff stated to defendant, among other things, that he had worked Sundays for the reason that he thought it would be a benefit to the house as well as to his own future advancement, and that he knew it was not the desire of defendant to have any one labor for her without compensation.

Under these facts it was defendant's contention below and is here that the evidence shows plaintiff to have been employed at a fixed salary, and, having accepted a salary check each week for his services without objection as to the sufficiency of the amount, that his act in so doing must be regarded as a deliberate admission that the rate of compensation paid was correct, and that the demand for extra services was an afterthought, and only made when plaintiff had ceased to be in the employ of defendant. In other words, defendant claims that the demand came too late, for the reason it deprived defendant of her option to terminate the employment had she known of plaintiff's intention to make the demand involved.

From the evidence the trial court found in substance that the defendant had fully paid and satisfied all claims and demands which plaintiff had against her, and specially found that plaintiff had received from defendant during the course of his employment a weekly salary check in the sum of $46.03 as payment in full for seven days' services, and that such checks were received by plaintiff in full satisfaction for his services without any objection on his part as to the sufficiency thereof.

We are of opinion that aside from any question of estoppel the findings are supported by the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

MOHN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SAN DIEGO COUNTY. (Civ. 3664.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 7, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error —464—Where bond has only two sureties, each must qualify in double the amount of the judgment.

Under section 942, Code Civ. Proc., providing that in order to stay a money judgment on appeal bond must be executed by two or more sureties in double the amount of the judgment, and section 1057, providing that the sureties must accompany the bond with an affidavit that they are each worth the sum specified in the bond, but where the amount of the bond exceeds $3,000, and there are more than two sureties, they may state that they are severally worth less amounts, if whole amount is equivalent to that of two sufficient sureties, on an appeal from a judgment for $100,000, if there are but two sureties, each must qualify in the sum of $200,000.

2. Appeal and error —464—Bond held not to comply with statutes as to qualification of sureties.

Under section 1057, Code Civ. Proc., providing that in giving a bond of more than $3,000 on appeal, where there are more than two sureties, the affidavit filed with the bond may state they are severally worth less than the amount of the bond, if the whole amount is equivalent to that of two sufficient sureties, on an appeal from a judgment for $100,000, where one surety was worth $220,000, and the other five together were worth $180,000, the bond was not the equivalent of two sufficient sureties.

3. Appeal and error —467—Stay of execution on judgment can be had only on compliance with statutes.

Although an appeal bond is given in good faith and is ample to secure payment of a judgment, since stay of execution of judgment on appeal is a matter of statutory regulation, it can only be had on a compliance with the Code, and in absence of such compliance a court cannot stay the issuing of execution.

Petition by Irene M. Mohn for a peremptory writ of mandate to the Superior Court of California, in the County of San Diego, requiring it to make an order directing the clerk thereof to issue execution. Writ granted.

Wright & McKee, Charles C. Crouch, and Hugh A. Sanders, all of San Diego, for petitioner.

A. J. Morganstern and Iverson L. Harris, both of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an application by petition made upon notice for a peremptory writ of mandate commanding respondent, the superior court of San Diego county, to make an order directing the clerk thereof to issue a writ of execution upon a judgment for $100,000, rendered by said court on March 17, 1921, in favor of petitioner and against Katherine Tingley, from which judgment the latter has appealed.

For the purpose of staying execution of the judgment, Katherine Tingley, defendant in the action, executed an undertaking in the sum of $200,000, upon which the sureties thereon qualified as follows:

Willard Smith for.....	$ 6,000
Abbott Clark for.....	27,000
Orange Clark for.....	27,000
Hyman Lischner for.....	40,000
Dinah W. Morris for.....	80,000
Elizabeth C. Spalding for.....	220,000

Making a total of.....$400,000

Upon the justification so had, the court held the undertaking sufficient to stay execution upon the judgment, and denied the petitioner's motion for an order requiring the clerk to issue an execution thereon.

[1] Section 942, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that in order to stay a money judgment from which an appeal is taken, a written undertaking must be executed on the part of the appellant by two or more sureties in double the amount named in the judgment. By section 1057, Code of Civil Procedure, the sureties are required to accompany the undertaking with an affidavit to the effect that they are each worth the sum specified in the undertaking; provided, however, that when the amount specified in the undertaking exceeds $3,000, and there are more than two sureties thereon, they may state in their affidavit that they are severally worth amounts less than the amount specified in the undertaking, if the whole amount is equivalent to that of two sufficient sureties. In the instant case and under these provisions, in order to constitute sufficient sureties, if but two, each must have qualified in the sum of $200,000, specified in the undertaking, thus affording as security for the payment of the judgment two sureties, each of whom would, subject to the conditions of the undertaking, be obligated to pay the judgment.

[2] The undertaking in question is not its equivalent. There are six sureties, the affidavits of five of whom show they are severally worth amounts less than that specified in the undertaking, the aggregate of which sums, to wit, $180,000, is less than that required of one sufficient surety. The affidavit of the other surety, Elizabeth C. Spalding, shows that she is worth $220,000; that is, $20,000 more than the amount specified in the undertaking. While the total for which these sureties qualify is equivalent to that which would be required if there were but two sureties, nevertheless it is not the equivalent of two sufficient sureties, each of whom is obligated in the sum of $200,000.

In other words, it is equivalent to one sufficient surety who qualifies for $220,000 and another surety who qualifies for $180,000 only. An undertaking in the sum of $200,000, executed by 11 persons, 1 of whom justifies for $399,990 and the others in the sum of $1 each, would be the equivalent in amount of that required from two sureties, but instead of two, each of whom is obligated in the sum specified in the undertaking, there would be but one qualifying in double the amount so specified; hence but one sufficient surety. The provision of the statute allowing sureties, where more than two, to qualify for less than the amount specified in the undertaking, is significant, and must be construed in accordance with the plain import of the language used. It cannot be construed as authorizing a stay upon an undertaking executed by more than two sureties in the sum required, where, in order to constitute an amount equivalent to two sufficient sureties, one of them states he is worth more than the amount therein specified and the total for which the others qualify is less.

[3] A stay of execution upon a judgment on appeal therefrom is a matter of statutory regulation, and can only be had upon a substantial compliance with the provisions of the Code. While, in our opinion, the undertaking in question was given in good faith and is ample to secure the payment of the judgment, nevertheless, in the absence of such compliance, courts have no discretion in the exercise of which they can stay the issuance of the execution.

It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue to the superior court of San Diego county, respondent herein, returnable in 10 days from the service thereof, commanding it to make an order requiring the clerk of said court to issue an execution upon the judgment as prayed for.

DALLAS et al. v. DE YOE. (Civ. 2312.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 8, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⚡1001(1)—Verdict supported by evidence not disturbed.

Where there was evidence that defendant caught his right foot between the foot brake and the accelerator and lost control of an automobile, which ran backward more than 60 feet and killed a person, and that there were three ways of stopping the automobile within a few feet, verdict for plaintiff will not be disturbed.

2. Pleading ⚡364(3)—Refusal to strike out qualifying adverbs on motion held not error.

The refusal of motion to strike out the words "negligently, carelessly, recklessly, suddenly, abruptly," etc., as irrelevant, redundant, and immaterial, in the allegation that the defendant, without warning to pedestrians and without due regard to the safety of pedestrians, unlawfully backed his automobile across the street, thereby causing the death of a person, is not error, since defendant cannot suffer prejudice from an unnecessary multiplicity of adverbs in the complaint.

3. Municipal corporations ⚡706(1)—Allegations of negligence in operation of automobile held not demurrable, as not disclosing acts or omissions.

A demurrer to a complaint, alleging that defendant negligently, carelessly, recklessly, suddenly, abruptly, and without warning to pedestrians backed his automobile across a street and over a sidewalk, thereby causing a death, on the ground that the complaint did not disclose the acts or omissions constituting negligence, was properly overruled.

4. Municipal corporations ⚡706(8) — Issues submitted by instructions embraced in general allegations of negligence in action for negligence of automobile driver.

Under general allegations of negligence, instructions covering the question of the defendant's knowledge and skill in managing an automobile, as to whether he became confused in operating the automobile, and to the effect that the jury might consider defendant's familiarity and knowledge of the appliances for controlling the automobile in determining negligence, held authorized.

5. Evidence ⚡589—Jury, in passing on defendant's experience in managing automobile, not bound by his statements.

In an action for a pedestrian's death, in passing on defendant's experience in managing an automobile, and as to whether he became confused, the jury was not bound to accept his statements as conclusive, but may consider his acts and omissions at the time of the accident.

6. Municipal corporations ⚡706(8) — Proper for court to state the law as to all conclusions which might be legitimately drawn from the evidence.

Where it devolved on a jury to decide whether injuries were due to unavoidable accident, to defendant's inexperience, to his lack of familiarity with control devices on an automobile, or to his confusion, it was proper to state the law as to all conclusions which might be legitimately drawn from the evidence.

7. Death ⚡99(4)—Damages held not excessive.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, providing that in case of death such damages may be awarded as under all the circumstances may be just, an award of $11,875 for the death of a woman 51 years of age, who left a husband and three children, aged 20, 19, and 14 years of age, held not excessive.

8. Death ⚡77—Mortality tables not essential.

In an action for death, mortality tables, showing the expectancy of life of the deceased, are admissible, but not essential.

9. Evidence ⇨58(1) — Normal health is presumed.

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it is presumed that a person is in average normal health.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Action by Robert L. Dallas, individually and as guardian ad litem of his minor children, against N. E. De Yoe. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. J. Carlson, and L. J. Maddux, both of Modesto, for appellant.

R. R. Fowler, of Turlock, and James L. Crittenden, of Modesto, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiffs recovered judgment against the defendant in the sum of $11,875 as damages for the death of Martha R. Dallas, the wife of plaintiff Robert R. Dallas and mother of the other plaintiffs. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

The undisputed facts are that the defendant was in his automobile, a Hudson Super-Six, on the east side of Tenth street in the city of Modesto, facing north, immediately preceding the time of the injury of which complaint is made. Other automobiles were parked diagonally across the center line of the street. The defendant threw the control lever into reverse and commenced to back his car for the purpose of gaining clearance to pass another machine in front. From some cause, as to the exact nature of which conflicting inferences may be drawn from the evidence, the powerful machine at once got beyond the defendant's control, the engine "roaring like an airplane," and the automobile, speeding backwards in a semicircle to the west, passed partly through a vacant parking space, struck a Ford and threw it out of its path, and continued on its course over the curbstone and onto the sidewalk, where it was brought to a standstill by striking a pier near the entrance to the Modesto Theater on the west side of the street; the machine then facing the southeast. The engine was running with such force that after the automobile had been stopped by the pier the wheels continued to spin in reverse until the ignition was disconnected by defendant's son, who arrived upon the scene immediately after the injury. Mrs. Dallas, who happened to be walking along the sidewalk near the pier mentioned, was struck by the automobile with such force that she died within a few minutes thereafter.

[1] The defendant denies negligence, and contends that the death of Mrs. Dallas was due to an unavoidable accident, and that there is no evidence to support the verdict and judgment. This court is called upon to decide, not whether negligence was proven by a preponderance of the evidence, but whether there was sufficient evidence to support the implied finding of the jury. In order to determine this question it will not be necessary to review the entire evidence, because the jury might logically have inferred that the defendant was negligent from a consideration of his own testimony. He testified that he had owned and run the Hudson for more than a year, and a Cadillac for six years before the purchase of the Hudson; that at the time of the accident his right foot became fastened between the foot brake and the accelerator in such manner that he could not extricate it; that he attempted unsuccessfully to throw the control lever into neutral, and at some stage of his course put on the emergency brake; that he could not use the foot brake on account of the position of his right foot; that his left foot was free, and he thought he tried to disengage the clutch with it; and that he did not disconnect the ignition. At first the defendant said his right foot was caught between the accelerator and the clutch pedal, but he finally said he was quite sure it was between the accelerator and the foot brake, and, of course, the jury would be justified in so finding. The accelerator is located between the foot brake and the clutch pedal; the foot brake being to the right. There was testimony to the effect that it is not probable the defendant's foot could have been caught in the manner described by him; that the car had traveled not less than 60 feet before striking the pier; that if the ignition had been disconnected, or the clutch disengaged, the machine would have stopped within a few feet. There are at least three usual methods of stopping an automobile: disengaging the clutch, putting on the brakes, and disconnecting the ignition. The jury was justified in finding that of these three methods the defendant adopted the least effective, that of using the emergency brake. Whether the defendant was negligent, under all the circumstances disclosed, in omitting to use the more effective means, is a question upon which the finding of the jury is conclusive on appeal.

[2,3] The appellant assigns the overruling of his demurrer to the amended complaint as error. The complaint alleged that the defendant "did negligently, carelessly, recklessly, suddenly, abruptly, and without warning of any kind to any person or persons or pedestrians then and there walking or being upon said sidewalk or upon said street or highway, * * * and without due or any regard to the safety of said persons or said pedestrians at the time and place last aforesaid, unlawfully back" his automobile in the manner and with the result in this opinion stated. It is urged that the complaint does not disclose what acts or omissions constituted the alleged negligence. The case of Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 113 Pac. 663, furnishes a complete answer to the objections made. The defendant moved to strike out the words "negligently," "carelessly," "recklessly," "suddenly," "abruptly," and other similar words and phrases, on the ground that they are "irrelevant, redundant, and immaterial." There was no error in denying the motion. The plaintiffs may have used an unnecessary multiplicity of adverbs, but the defendant could suffer no prejudice therefrom.

[4] The appellant complains of certain instructions given by the court. The jurors were instructed that, if they found that the injuries "were caused solely by the defendant on account of his lack of knowledge, skill, or experience in the management, control, or operation of said automobile, and that an ordinarily prudent, careful, cautious, and skillful man, * * * in the due exercise of reasonable care, caution, and skill, could have avoided such injuries, then you are instructed that defendant's lack of knowledge, skill, or experience in the operation and driving of said automobile constitutes and is, under such circumstances, negligence on his part." By instruction No. 20 the court stated that if the defendant became so confused that he omitted to make proper use of the appliances for the control of the automobile, and that an "ordinarily prudent and careful man, in the exercise of ordinary prudence and care," would have controlled the machine and avoided the accident, then the failure of the defendant to control the same was negligence on his part. By instruction No. 21 the jurors were told that they were entitled to consider, in arriving at their verdict, "the familiarity or knowledge of the defendant with the appliances for the control and operation of his automobile, and his experience and skill, or lack thereof, in the management or control of said automobile." The objection is made that there was neither issue nor proof to which the foregoing instructions were applicable. There is no doubt but that the issues submitted by the instructions were embraced within the general allegations of negligence.

[5, 6] In determining the defendant's experience, and whether or not he was familiar with the appliances for the control of his automobile, and whether he was confused in the use of them, the jurors were not bound to accept his statements as conclusive; but they had a right to consider all of his acts and omissions at the time of the tragedy. He failed to throw out the clutch or push the switch button. When asked if he did not know that he could stop the machine by pushing in the switch button, he replied that he knew it would stop the engine; that he did not push the button because "that wasn't the way I had been accustomed to stopping my car." It devolved upon the jury to determine whether the injuries inflicted were due to an unavoidable accident, to the defendant's inexperience, to his lack of familiarity with the control appliances, or to his confusion. Since the court could not know what the jury would find to be the cause, it was proper to state the law applicable to all conclusions which might legitimately be drawn from the evidence. It is not contended that the instructions did not accurately state the law as an abstract proposition, but that there was no evidence upon which to predicate them. As to the correctness of the instructions the following cases are in point: Carpenter v. Campbell Automobile Co., 159 Iowa, 52, 140 N. W. 225; Brown v. Des Moines Steam Bottling Works, 174 Iowa, 715, 156 N. W. 829, 1 A. L. R. 835.

[7] Lastly, it is contended that the damages awarded are excessive. At the time of her death Mrs. Dallas was 51 years of age. Her daughters were 20 and 19 respectively, and her son was 14. The evidence shows that the deceased was an educated woman, devoted to her husband and children; that she assisted and advised her husband in his business affairs, and was the main guide in the education and training of the children. Section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that in cases of this character "such damages may be given as under all the circumstances of the case may be just." This statutory rule is the only measure of damages in such cases. Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 276, 113 Pac. 369, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50. "The statute does not fix the period of minority as a limit beyond which the jury cannot go in estimating the probable pecuniary loss." In Redfield v. Oakland C. S. Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 277, 42 Pac. 822, 1063, decided in 1895, in a somewhat similar case, where the deceased wife and mother was 35 years of age and her children were aged 12 and 11 years respectively, a verdict of $14,000 was upheld. The purchasing power of money is much less now than in 1895, and this court cannot say that the award was excessive.

[8, 9] Appellant urges that there was no evidence as to the expectancy of life of Mrs. Dallas or as to the condition of her health. Mortality tables are admissible in such cases, but not essential. 17 C. J. 1366. It is presumed that a person is in average normal health, in the absence of evidence to the contrary. Rowley v. London & Northwestern Railway Company, L. R. 8 Exch. 221; Harris v. Ogden Steam Laundry Co., 39 Utah, 436, 117 Pac. 700, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 101; 10 R. C. L. 879.

SHEBLEY v. PETERS et al. (Civ. 2310.)

1. Trial ⚡81—Objection implied from objection to preceding question.

In an action for damages for death, an objection to the question, "Except as you stated, were you at the time of his death dependent upon him for support?" will be implied as being made to a question following it, "That is true, also, with the children as with you?" both being answered in the affirmative.

2. Appeal and error ⚡1048(1)—Harmless to ask superfluous question.

It is not prejudicial error to ask simply an unnecessary and superfluous question, such as an inquiry concerning a fact admitted by the pleadings.

3. Appeal and error ⚡1032(1)—Appellant must affirmatively show error.

In order to obtain a reversal, an appellant must affirmatively show that the error upon which he relies was prejudicial; injury not being presumed from error.

4. Appeal and error ⚡1032(2)—Prejudice from evidence not shown, in absence of evidence or instructions.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, it cannot be said that prejudice resulted from admission of certain evidence, where appellant did not bring up the evidence received at the trial or the instructions of the court.

5. Appeal and error ⚡907(1)—All intendments in favor of judgment, where evidence and instructions are not in record.

Where the evidence and instructions are not in the record, all intendments are in favor of the judgment, and it must be assumed that the evidence showed without any conflict that plaintiff was entitled to recover the full amount of a verdict in his favor, and that defendant proposed an instruction for the jury to entirely disregard evidence erroneously admitted, and that the court gave it.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.6. Death ⚡95(1)—Measure of damages.

The measure of damages for the wrongful death of husband and father is the pecuniary loss suffered because of the death.

7. Death ⚡69—Evidence as to dependency inadmissible.

In an action for death of husband and father, evidence to show that wife and children were dependent upon the decedent for support was inadmissible, since the amount of damage would be precisely the same, whether or not they were dependent upon him, being entitled to demand it of him in accordance with his station in life.

8. Husband and wife ⚡4—Parent and child ⚡3(1)—Wife and children entitled to demand support.

Wife and children are entitled to demand of husband and father support in accordance with his station in life, even if they are not dependent upon him and have ample means of their own.

9. Death ⚡67—Evidence of ability to earn money admissible.

In an action for wrongful death of husband and father, evidence of deceased's ability to earn money is admissible to show the quality of the support wife and children are entitled to.

10. Death ⚡58(2)—Presumed that father and husband supported wife and children.

In an action for death of husband and father, the presumption is that the wife and children got the support from him that they were entitled to.

11. Appeal and error ⚡1170(7)—No reversal, in absence of miscarriage of justice.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, Supreme Court should not reverse a case for any error in the admission of evidence, unless from the whole case it is of the opinion that the result of the error was a miscarriage of justice.

12. Appeal and error ⚡1170(7)—Admission of evidence not shown to be ground for reversal.

In an action for damages for wrongful death of husband and father, erroneous admission of evidence to the effect that wife and children were dependent upon the deceased for their support held not shown to be prejudicial error, under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; James F. Lodge, Judge.

Action by Inez Shebley, as administratrix of F. A. Shebley, deceased, against W. C. Peters and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant G. A. Reichman appeals. Affirmed in District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Taylor & Tebbe, of Yreka, and C. E. Johnson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. W. Preston, of San Francisco, H. R. Raynes, of Yreka, and Sullivan, Sullivan & Roche, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for damages for the death of F. A. Shebley, occurring while he was a passenger in an auto stage run and operated by appellant between Yreka and Ft. Jones in Siskiyou county. At the trial the case was dismissed as to all the defendants except appellant. The claim was based upon alleged negligence of the driver in the operation of the machine and the failure of the owner to keep said auto in proper condition and repair. Defendants denied any negligence and claimed the accident was occasioned by a latent defect in a wheel of the machine, which no degree of care could have avoided. The cause was tried before a jury and a verdict rendered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $16,500, and the appeal is from the judgment following said verdict. Appellant states:

"This appeal is based entirely upon errors in law committed by the court in the trial of said cause by permitting plaintiff over the objections of appellant to introduce evidence showing the poverty of the widow and children of plaintiff's intestate."

[1] The question to which the objection was made is as follows: "Except as you stated, were you at the time of his death dependent upon him for support?" The objection was general in its nature, and it was overruled by the court. The answer was in the affirmative, and it was followed by this question: "That is true, also, with the children as with you?" To this the witness answered: "Yes, sir." While there was no objection made to this latter question, it would be implied from the objection to the preceding similar question.

Appellant relies in support of his objection upon the decision of the Supreme Court in Shea v. Potrero & Bay R. R. Co., 44 Cal. 415; Malone v. Hawley, 46 Cal. 409; Mahoney v. San Francisco & San Mateo Railway Co., 110 Cal. 471, 42 Pac. 968, 43 Pac. 518; Green v. S. P. Co., 122 Cal. 563, 55 Pac. 577; Story v. Green, 164 Cal. 768, 130 Pac. 870, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 961; Steinberger v. California Electric, etc., Co., 176 Cal. 386, 168 Pac. 570. It is not necessary to review these decisions, but it is sufficient to say that, in each, the inquiry which was condemned related directly to the poverty of the plaintiff or the affluence of the defendant, and was made obviously for the purpose of exciting the sympathy or prejudice of the jury. Herein it is the claim of respondent that the inquiry was proper because—

"It related to the relationship between widow and deceased and between children and deceased, and, besides, it referred to the relationship at the time of the death of the deceased, and not at the time of the trial."

Plaintiff avows that the purpose of the questions was to show that the family were living happily together and that they were supported by the wages of the deceased. Such inquiry would be, of course, entirely proper. Simoneau v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 159 Cal. 494, 115 Pac. 320; Kramm v. Stockton Electric R. R. Co., 22 Cal. App. 757, 136 Pac. 523.

The questions might have been phrased more accurately to reach that objective, and may have been open to criticism for indefiniteness; but appellant made no such objection, contenting himself with the statement that the question was "incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant." The questions, indeed, may reasonably be considered as signifying: "Were you and your children supported by your deceased husband?" In fact, since plaintiff relied upon the loss of support by deceased as an important element of the damages caused by his death, it was manifestly important for the jury to know to what extent the surviving members of the family had been dependent upon that support, in order that this element of damage might be properly appraised.

[2] In this connection it may be said that the questions were unnecessary, for the reason that the plaintiff alleged and the answer admitted the following:

"At the time of his death said F. A. Shebley was, and for a long time prior thereto had been, using his entire earnings in the support and maintenance of his wife, his children, and himself."

This implies that they were necessary for that purpose and that the family were dependent upon them. Of course, it could not be prejudicial to ask simply an unnecessary and superfluous question, as to inquire of a witness concerning a fact that was admitted by the pleadings. Dyas v. Southern Pacific Co., 140 Cal. 296, 73 Pac. 972.

[3] But, assuming that the court committed error in overruling the objection to the question, it would be entirely improper for an appellate court to reverse the judgment. This follows from the consideration that an appellant must affirmatively show that the error upon which he relies was prejudicial. Myers v. Canepa, 37 Cal. App. 556, 174 Pac. 903, 906; Mathes v. Aggeler & Musser Seed Co., 179 Cal. 697, 178 Pac. 713. In other words, the rule now is that injury is no longer presumed from error. Vallejo R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 147 Pac. 238.

[4] How can it be said that prejudice has been shown, when the appellant has not brought up the evidence received at the trial or the instructions of the court? Indeed, as pointed out in the last-mentioned citation, it is the duty of an appellate court, under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, to determine from an examination of the evidence that an error complained of "has resulted in a miscarriage of justice" before it is authorized to reverse a judgment, unless the nature of the error be such as necessarily result in prejudice. Manifestly, the error herein, if it be error at all, is not of such nature as necessarily result in prejudice.

[5] Since all the intendments are in favor of the judgment we must assume that the evidence showed without any conflict that plaintiff was entitled to recover the full amount of the verdict. We must go further, upon the theory that the ruling complained of was erroneous, and assume that the defendant proposed an instruction, and the court gave it, for the jury to entirely disregard such evidence. The case is the same in legal contemplation as though such a record were before us. Such being the situation, it can hardly be seriously contended that it is shown that the ruling complained of in relation to a question, the propriety of which might be open to controversy, resulted in a miscarriage of justice or prejudice to the substantial rights of appellant. To the contrary it must be held that no prejudice has been shown, and it would be in opposition to precedent and in violation of the established principle of appellate practice for this court to reverse the judgment.

For further discussion of this rule by which appellate courts must be governed in the consideration of supposed errors, we may refer to People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 Pac. 1042; Jameson v. Tully, 178 Cal. 380, 173 Pac. 577; Reid v. Superior Court, 186 Pac. 634.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank
Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. We are not satisfied with the treatment by the District Court of Appeal of the question whether or not, in an action for damages on behalf of a widow and children for an injury causing the death of the husband and father, evidence is admissible to show that the widow and children were dependent upon the decedent for support.

[6-11] It is well settled that in such an action the pecuniary loss suffered because of the death is the measure of the damages. The admissibility of evidence to show that they were dependent upon the decedent for support depends upon the question whether that fact does or does not enhance their loss. We think it is clear that such evidence is not admissible, and that this is so because their loss is the same, regardless of their dependence upon him for support. They were entitled to demand of him a support in accordance with his station in life. Such support it is the right of every wife and minor child to receive from the husband and father, even if they are not dependent upon him at all, but have ample means of their own. It is that support of which they have been deprived by his death, and it is compensation for that loss that they are entitled to have by the verdict. The amount would be precisely the same if they were not dependent upon him as if they were; it is that support which he may be able to give them suitable to his station in life. Hence evidence of his ability to earn money may be admissible to show the quality of the support he should give them, but evidence that they have no means of their own and that they are dependent upon him for their support is not admissible, because it is immaterial, and because it is likely to be injurious on the question of damages, from the fact that it tends to arouse a sympathy which has no place in the estimation of the pecuniary loss. Perhaps the defendant in such a case may have the right to prove that the deceased could earn but little or nothing, in order to reduce the damages; but the plaintiffs may not prove their dependence upon him in any case, for they are entitled to support from him in any event, even if they do not get it. The presumption, in the absence of proof, is that they did get the support they were entitled to, and evidence is not necessary from the plaintiffs to prove that fact.

[12] But this evidence could be of no effect in the case, except on the subject of damages. We are satisfied with the second proposition of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, to the effect that, even if the admission of the evidence was erroneous, the record does not show that it caused a miscarriage of justice. There is abundant evidence to support the finding on the question of the amount of damages, without resort to the sympathy that might have been aroused by the evidence objected to. Under the Constitution we should not reverse a case for any error in the admission of evidence, unless from the whole case we shall be of the opinion that the result of the error was a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½. An examination of the evidence in this case does not produce that opinion in our minds. Consequently there should be no reversal.

It is ordered that the petition for a rehearing in this court be denied.

All concur, except ANGELLOTTI, C. J., absent.

SNYDER V. UNITED PROPERTIES CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 3721.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 7, 1921.)

I. Limitation of actions § 178—Complaint based on written agreement to deliver bonds held sufficient to show action not barred.

Complaint filed September 14, 1914, alleging the defendant's breach of its written agreements denominated "bond certificates" issued between September 28, 1911, and August 5, 1912, to deliver bonds to be secured by a deed of trust to be dated January 1, 1911, "when the said bonds may be certified, issued, and ready for delivery" and alleging demand upon defendant on September 24, 1913, that it issue, certify, and deliver to plaintiff the agreements called for by each certificate, and that such demand was refused, and pleading facts sufficient to show that a reasonable time had expired from the date of each certificate to the commencement of the action to enable the defendants to certify and deliver the bonds, held sufficient to show the action not barred by the statute of limitations as against contention that it did not clearly appear therefrom when the breach occurred.

2. Pleading ⚡433(9)—Insufficiency of complaint to show claim, not barred by statute of limitations, held harmless in view of finding.

Insufficiency of complaint to clearly show when the breach occurred, and therefore when the statute of limitations began to run, was harmless where the defendant specifically pleaded various statutes of limitations and trial court found against it on such issue.

3. Contracts ⚡346(2)—Denial of allegations as to legal effect of instrument held to raise issue as to execution where complaint did not expressly allege execution.

Where complaint did not specifically allege the execution by defendant of a contract, but did allege its legal effect, and indorsement and assignment by original promisee to the plaintiff, and where the defendant specifically denied such allegations, the due execution of the certificate was in issue, notwithstanding defendant's failure to specifically deny its execution, since it was not incumbent upon defendant to expressly deny its execution, inasmuch as the complaint did not expressly plead the execution.

4. Trial ⚡105(4)—Failure to object to introduction of instruments waived question of genuineness of corporate officers' signatures and due execution.

In action against a corporation for breach of its agreement to deliver bonds designated "bond certificate," the corporation, by failing to object to the introduction of the certificate, waived the point of the genuineness of the signatures thereto of the officers of the corporation and the due execution by them.

5. Corporations ⚡432(4)—Corporate seal prima facie evidence of authority of officers to execute instrument.

The presence of corporate seal on an instrument was prima facie evidence of the authority of the officers to execute the instruments on behalf of the corporation.

6. Bills and notes ⚡496(2)—Possession by promisee at time of assignment to plaintiff presumptive evidence of ownership in promisee at time of assignment.

In action against a corporation on its bond certificates by original promisee's assignee, the possession of the certificates by the promisee at the time of assignment to plaintiff, and his act in assigning them, was presumptive evidence of delivery to him and of his ownership of certificates at the time he made the assignment, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 12.

7. Contracts ⚡324(2)—Holder of bond certificate by which corporation agreed to deliver mortgage bonds could sue for breach of agreement on its failure to deliver bonds without enforcing lien.

Holder of bond certificate by which corporation agreed to deliver bonds to be secured by a mortgage, was not, on corporation's failure to deliver the bonds, required to first establish an equitable lien, and to bring foreclosure suit under Code Civ. Proc. § 726, but could sue the corporation for breach of its agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by A. J. Snyder against the United Properties Company of California, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. P. Henshall, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Nusbaumer & Bingham, of Oakland, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant for $52,000, and interest for breach of a written agreement on the part of the defendant to deliver a certain number of its bonds secured by a first mortgage or deed of trust upon its properties. The complaint set forth six separate causes of action, each based upon a separate written agreement designated "bond certificate," and reciting that the United Properties Company of California would, upon surrender of the certificate, deliver to the purchaser or order a certain number of its first mortgage and collateral trust bonds of the denomination of $1,000 each, "to be issued under and secured by the deed of trust in preparation dated January 1, 1911, made by said the United Properties Company of California, and to be delivered hereunder as and when the said bonds may be certified, issued, and ready for delivery." It was alleged further that plaintiff acquired each of these bond certificates or obligations of the defendant for a valuable consideration, and that they were assigned to him for a valuable consideration by the original promisee thereof. The bond certificate was then set out in the complaint in hæc verba, followed by allegations to the effect that the defendant "did then and there and thereby" promise and agree to deliver to the promisee, in said writing named, the bonds specified in the complaint. The answer denied on information and belief that plaintiff had acquired the paper for a valuable consideration, and specifically denied those portions of the complaint which may be referred to as the allegations pleading the legal effect of the writing which is the basis of the suit. On the trial plaintiff offered evidence to prove his possession of the certificates, the assignment to him, the amount of both principal and interest unpaid, and the genuineness of the signature of the promisee subscribed to the assignment. The certificates were then offered and received in evidence without any proof of their execution, but without objection by defendant, and the plaintiff rested. No evidence was offered by the defendant, and the court thereupon rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff as above stated, findings of fact and conclusions of law having first been waived.

On this appeal defendant presents two grounds for reversal: (1) That the complaint does not state a cause of action; (2) that there is no evidence to sustain the allegation of the promise and agreement on which the complaint is based, and no evidence to sustain the finding that said allegation or any part thereof is true.

[1, 2] As to the point first raised, it is argued that the complaint is insufficient, in that it does not clearly appear therefrom when the breach occurred, and that consequently it cannot be determined when the cause of action arose, and when the statute of limitations began to run. The contract called for the delivery of bonds as and when they may be certified and ready for delivery. Sufficient facts are pleaded to show that a reasonable time had expired from the date of each certificate to the commencement of the action to enable the defendants to certify and deliver the bonds. The earliest date of issuance of any of the certificates in suit was September 28, 1911, and the latest date was August 5, 1912. Each certificate recited that the bonds were to be secured by a deed of trust to be dated January 1, 1911. It is alleged that demand was made upon the defendant on December 24, 1913, that it issue, certify, and deliver to plaintiff the bonds called for by each certificate, and that this demand was refused. It does not appear when the complaint was filed, but the appeal is based upon an amended complaint which was filed September 14, 1914. The action is well within the period of any statute of limitations. Though the objections to the complaint in this respect might be available when raised by a special demurrer on the ground of uncertainty, they are not such as would require a holding that the complaint did not state a cause of action. Manifestly the appellant suffered no injury from the form of these allegations, because it specifically pleaded various statutes of limitations, and the trial court found against it on that issue.

[3] (2) The complaint did not specifically allege the execution of the written agreement. It did allege that on a certain date respondent, for a valuable consideration, acquired the written promise and obligation of the United Properties Company, which said promise was then set forth in hæc verba. It then alleged the indorsement and assignment to plaintiff by the promisee named therein, and plaintiff's ownership of the writing. The execution of the agreement by the United Properties Company can be inferred only by those allegations of the complaint to the effect that the corporation did then and there and thereby promise and agree to deliver the bonds specified therein, and then and there and thereby agreed that said bonds should and would be secured by a first mortgage or first trust deed upon all the properties of the United Properties Company. The answer denied, for lack of information and belief, the allegations of the complaint relating to plaintiff's acquisition of the paper for a valuable consideration, and specifically denied all the allegations as to what the defendant promised and agreed to do. As the complaint did not expressly plead the execution of the agreement, it was not incumbent upon the defendant to expressly deny its execution. The plaintiff having elected to plead the legal effect of the writing, and thereby place his own interpretation on what the defendant promised to do, and the defendant having specifically denied all these allegations, whatever inference is to be indulged in to support the complaint as pleading the due execution of the written instrument must with like force be indulged in to support the denials in the answer. Higgins v. Graham, 143 Cal. 131, 133, 76 Pac. 398.

[4-6] The answer must, therefore, be taken as sufficient to put in issue the due execution of the instrument, and, such being the case, it was incumbent upon plaintiff to make his proof. In this connection plaintiff offered proof of his purchase of all the certificates for a consideration, of his possession of the same, and of the genuineness of the assignment on the back of each by the promisee named on the face. The certificates themselves were then offered and received in evidence without objection. By failing to object to the introduction of the instruments defendant waived the point of the genuineness of the signatures thereto of the officers of the corporation, and the due execution by them. Shain v. Sullivan, 106 Cal. 208, 211, 39 Pac. 606. The presence of the corporate seal was prima facie evidence of the authority of the officers to execute the instruments on behalf of the corporation. Chandler v. Hart, 161 Cal. 405, 420, 119 Pac. 516, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1094. The possession of the certificates by the promisee at the time of his assignment to plaintiff and his act in assigning them was presumptive evidence of delivery to him (Shain v. Sullivan, supra), and of his ownership of the certificates at the time he made the assignment to plaintiff. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 12; Bickerdike v. State, 144 Cal. 698, 701, 78 Pac. 277. The direct evidence taken with the presumptions was sufficient to support the finding that the certificates had been duly executed and delivered and assigned to plaintiff.

"It would appear as if the promise alleged was secured by a certain mortgage lien on certain property, and in consequence the plaintiff is prohibited from bringing the present action by section 726, Code of Civil Procedure."

The answer to this proposition is that no mortgage lien was ever created. Plaintiff did not sue to establish an equitable lien, but, relying upon his contract, sued for damages for its breach. He might have asked that a lien be declared to aid in enforcing the judgment (Beckwith v. Sheldon, 168 Cal. 742, 747, 145 Pac. 97, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 963; Beal v. United Properties Co., 189 Pac. 346), but he was not required to do so. It is only a debt which is secured by a mortgage on real or personal property which must be enforced under the provisions of section 726, Code of Civil Procedure. The fact that a debtor has agreed to execute a mortgage to secure the debt does not require the creditor to first establish an equitable lien and sue under that section. He may stand upon his contract and sue for its breach.

The judgment is affirmed.

KNABBE v. UNITED PROPERTIES CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 3820.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 7, 1921.)

1. Limitation of actions § 178—Complaint charging breach of defendant to deliver bonds held sufficient to show action commenced within period of limitations.

Complaint filed July 12, 1915, alleging that defendant corporation, by its bond certificates, agreed to deliver to the plaintiff bonds when certified, issued, and ready for delivery, that more than three years elapsed after the certificate was made and delivered to him before plaintiff demanded delivery and issuance of the bond, that such period was a reasonable time for defendant to certify, issue, and deliver bonds, that last payment of interest was on January 1, 1913, and that demand was made on July 9, 1915, held sufficient to show that the action was commenced within the period of limitations, as against contention it did not appear in the complaint when the breach occurred, or when statute of limitations began to run.

2. Pleading § 433(9)—Inaccuracies in complaint held harmless in view of finding.

Inaccuracies in complaint relating to time when breach occurred held harmless where the trial court found, after trial, that the action was not barred by limitations.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

Action by D. Knabbe against the United Properties Company of California, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. P. Henshall, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Chas. E. Snook and T. P. Wittsches, both of Oakland, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant for $20,000 and interest, for breach of a written agreement on the part of the defendant to deliver a certain number of its bonds secured by a first mortgage or deed of trust on its properties. The complaint set forth eight separate causes of action, each based upon a separate written agreement designated "bond certificate," and reciting that the United Properties Company would, upon surrender of the certificate, deliver to the purchaser or order a certain number of its first mortgage and collateral trust bonds of the denomination of $1,000 each—

"to be issued under and secured by the deed of trust in preparation dated January 1, 1911, made by said the United Properties Company of California, and to be delivered hereunder as and when the said bond may be certified, issued, and ready for delivery."

It was further alleged that on certain days between February 2, 1912, and July 9, 1915, the certificates which were made the basis of each separate cause of action, were executed by defendant and delivered to the plaintiff; that certain installments of interest were paid thereon; and that, prior to the commencement of the action—July 12, 1915—demand was made upon the defendant that it comply with the terms of the contract, which it refused to do. The bond certificates were then set out in the complaint in hæc verba, followed by an allegation of the damage suffered by plaintiff through defendant's failure to meet the terms of the agreement. The defendant denied the execution of the writings, alleging in that behalf that, though the certificates were issued by officers of the corporation, and contained the corporate seal, their issuance was not authorized by the board of directors or by the stockholders. After the trial the court found in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, and, upon the defendant's special defense relating to the execution of the certificates, found that the board of directors of the corporation did authorize the issuance of the certificates, that the stockholders of said corporation did not authorize the board of directors to issue the certificates referred to, but that they did, on December 5, 1911, ratify and confirm all acts of the board of directors. The court also found that plaintiff's causes of action were not barred by any of the statutes of limitations pleaded by defendant.

[1, 2] On this appeal plaintiff urges but one ground for reversal, and that is that the complaint does not state a cause of action. In this connection it is argued that the complaint is insufficient, in that it does not appear therefrom when the breach occurred, and that consequently it cannot be determined when the cause of action arose and when the statute of limitations began to run. The contract called for the delivery of the bonds as and when they may be certified and ready for delivery. It was recited in each certificate that the bonds were to be secured by a deed of trust dated January 1, 1911. The complaint alleged that more than three years elapsed after the certificate was made and delivered to him before plaintiff demanded the issuance and delivery of the bonds. It also alleged that this period was a reasonable time for defendant to certify, issue, and deliver the bonds. The last payment of interest was on January 1, 1913, the demand was made on July 9, 1915, and the complaint was filed July 12, 1915. Hence the action was commenced well within the period of any statute of limitations applicable to the case. Furthermore, the trial court found after trial that the action was not barred. Thus any inaccuracies in the complaint were without injury to defendant.

Appellant suggests that it would appear as if the promises alleged were secured by a certain mortgage lien on certain property, and that therefore plaintiff's only remedy was an action to foreclose the mortgage lien under section 726, Code of Civil Procedure. The same point was raised in Snyder v. United Properties Co. of California, 200 Pac. 366, this day filed, and was decided adversely to appellant's contention.

The judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF PASADENA v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 3514.)

1. Master and servant — 373—Injury in scuffle with foreman held not compensable; "course of employment."

Where claimant was injured in the scuffle with a subforeman who was acting outside his authority in attempting to discharge claimant, the injury did not arise out of the employment, so as to warrant an award of compensation.

2. Master and servant — 417(9)—Court's decision in compensation case not deferred because similar cases are pending.

Although the employer consents, the decision in a compensation case will not be delayed because of the possibility that the Supreme Court in pending cases may reach a conclusion on a proposition involved more favorable to compensation claimant than heretofore announced by it.

James H. Howard, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Petitioner herein brings this proceeding for the purpose of having reviewed the evidence taken before, and an award made by, the Industrial Accident Commission. The contention urged in support of petition is that the accident which caused the injuries of the complainant did not arise out of the employment in which claimant was at the time engaged. The facts are succinctly stated in the findings of the Commission, from which we here quote:

"Applicant was one of a small group or gang of high school students hoeing weeds under hire of defendant city during vacation, under immediate direction of one Frank Wood, a student of about the same age as applicant; that said Wood did not have authority to discharge or discipline any member of the gang, and applicant so understood; that said Wood, under pretense of such authority, purported to discharge applicant for some alleged breach of rules, and attempted to take away from applicant the latter's hoe, Wood being entirely the aggressor; that applicant resisted, and in the ensuing scuffle he sustained injury to his left ankle; that it is claimed on behalf of Wood that his motives in so acting were those of playfulness and in the spirit of a joke, but the evidence is insufficient to establish that such were his motives, and this Commission finds the applicant was unaware of such playful intent, and believed that Wood was improperly attempting to exercise his authority as subforeman, and that if there had been such intent it had ceased to operate by the time the scuffle had reached the stage in which, and by reason of which, applicant sustained said injury."

The amount of the award entered pursuant to the findings was $106.81. The above findings as to the facts were fully supported by the testimony given before the Commission. It is made to appear that the attack upon the claimant by the subforeman was wholly unjustifiable. The cause of the difference between the two boys arose because Wood assumed to have authority to do something which the claimant knew he had no right to do, to wit, to discharge the claimant from the work. These conditions being established, the act of Wood was no different, legally considered, than would have been the act of any of the other fellow employees working with the claimant.

[1] The decision here must be controlled, we think, by the decision of the Supreme Court in Coronado Beach Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 682, 158 Pac. 212. In the course of a quite exhaustive discussion to be found in the opinion, the court there said:

"The accidents arising out of the employment of the person injured are those in which it is possible to trace the injury to the nature of the employee's work or to the risks to which the employer's business exposes the employee. The accident must be one resulting from a risk reasonably incident to the employment. * * * It arises out of the occupation when there is a causal connection between the conditions under which the servant works and the resulting injury."

That was a case where an employee was injured while attending strictly to his work by reason of the playful act of a fellow employee who "tickled" him when he was about to descend a stair carrying a load. It was held that there could be no compensation awarded for the resulting injury. And we gather from what is said by the court in that decision that the conclusion would have been the same even though the employee at fault had acted maliciously and with the intent to cause the injury to his fellow worker. The only limitation indicated upon this holding seems to be that the employer will be held liable in a case such as that last noted, only when he has knowledge of the fact that some of his employees are maliciously inclined and apt to do injury to their fellow workers. We do not find that the case is helped any by the general statements made in Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 151 Pac. 398. In that case a foreman was injured while engaged in what was held to be the rightful discharge of his duty through the resistance of an employee working under him, and whom he had attempted to discharge. See, also, Kimbol v. Industrial Accident Commission, 173 Cal. 351, 160 Pac. 150, L. R. A. 1917B, 595, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 312. Counsel for respondent represents in his brief that there are several cases pending before the Supreme Court in which the Commission is seeking to secure a modification of the rule as laid down in the Coronado Case, and requests that decision herein be deferred until such cases have been decided.

[2] While the petitioner is agreeable to such a course, we do not feel that a decision in this case should be delayed upon a statement of the possibility merely that our Supreme Court may hereafter reach a conclusion on the proposition involved more favorable to respondent than that heretofore announced by it. Furthermore, there is available to respondent the right to file a petition for rehearing with the Supreme Court and so secure a speedy review of the question here considered.

The award as entered by the respondent Commission is annulled.

1. Brokers ⚡56(2)—Enough that owner was informed by another that broker had found the purchaser.

It is not a prerequisite to recovery of commission by a broker that he should have given the owner notice that he had found a purchaser, but it is enough that the purchaser, who was referred by the broker to the owner relative to reduction of price, which the broker had told him he had no authority to make, told the owner that the broker had shown the property to him.

2. Brokers ⚡56(3)—When having exclusive contract, broker entitled to commission on sale by owner to broker's client.

A broker having an exclusive contract of sale cannot be deprived of his commission by the owner consummating the sale to the broker's client within the period covered by broker's contract.

3. Evidence ⚡471(24)—Question held to call for mere conclusion of witness.

Question to purchaser in action for broker's commission, whether the fact that the broker showed him the place after he knew it was for sale had any bearing on his buying it, or anything to do with closing the deal, calls for the mere conclusion of the witness.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; Pat. R. Parker, Judge.

Action by R. C. Falkenberg against Elvezio G. Giacomazzi. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hugh R. Osburn, of King City, for appellant.

David J. Aaron, of San Francisco, and C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment rendered against him and in favor of plaintiff for $600 as a real estate broker's commission, on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment.

The contract between plaintiff and defendant gave plaintiff the exclusive right of sale for a period of 30 days from date (March 17, 1920), and thereafter until 10 days' written notice of cancellation; $15,000 was the selling price named therein, and it provided for payment to plaintiff for services rendered in securing a buyer of 5 per cent. commission on the above-mentioned sale price, "or any less price that may hereafter be agreed upon." April 28, 1920, defendant notified plaintiff that the contract was canceled. But the court found that the "plaintiff had prior to the giving of said notice secured said F. V. Ferrari as a purchaser of said real property"; also "that plaintiff was instrumental in obtaining said F. V. Ferrari as a purchaser of the real property referred to in said count, and that said purchaser was secured by the plaintiff pursuant to and within the time limited by the contract referred to." Defendant personally sold the property to Ferrari on the day notice of cancellation was given.

The only question for determination on this appeal is whether plaintiff was instrumental in making the sale. Defendant challenges the findings that he was, claiming the evidence does not show that plaintiff was the procuring or inducing cause of the sale. He also claims that the court erred in its ruling on certain questions asked by defendant to show whether the moving cause of the sale was plaintiff's act in showing the property to Ferrari or the latter's prior knowledge that it was for sale.

On April 16, 1920, plaintiff took Ferrari to see the ranch, and the two went all over it and examined it thoroughly. Ferrari objected to the price, and plaintiff told him to go and see defendant, and he might sell for a cheaper price than that named in the contract. Ferrari did talk to defendant a few days later, and on a number of subsequent occasions, and made an offer of $12,000 for the land. They finally agreed upon $12,700 for the land and all the personal property thereon, including the crops; the trial court finding that $12,000 was paid for the land and $700 for the personal property. Ferrari then gave defendant his check for $1,000 on the purchase price, and defendant gave him a receipt therefor. Ferrari testified that this receipt provided that, if plaintiff herein should claim a commission, defendant reserved the right to call the deal off; that after this action was commenced defendant asked him for this receipt, which he kept, and gave him an entirely different one, omitting all mention of plaintiff. This was denied by defendant. On May 12, 1920, the deed was executed and the balance of the purchase price paid. Plaintiff did not go with Ferrari to see defendant, nor personally inform him that he had sent Ferrari, until after the sale. Ferrari, however, testified that he told defendant that plaintiff had taken him to see the property, but that he had not signed any agreement with him. Ferrari knew the property was for sale, and had himself gone to see it about six weeks previous to his visit with plaintiff. Referring to this visit, and in reply to a question by defendant whether he went to see defendant by reason of his prior knowledge that the place was for sale, or the fact that plaintiff showed him the property, Ferrari testified:

"I was there once and went a little around the house, not much, because I didn't have much interest on the place. That day I was there with Ray Falkenberg, we went all over the place, and then we looked it over, and figured up a little how much come out an acre for it, and then I see what was on the place."

[1] Defendant argues that notice to him of the finding of a purchaser was a prerequisite to plaintiff's right to recover commission and that plaintiff had failed to give such notice. This point is without merit. The evidence shows that defendant knew plaintiff had shown the property to Ferrari; the latter testifying that he so informed defendant. Neither is there any merit in the argument that plaintiff had abandoned the attempt to sell to Ferrari. The evidence is that he referred Ferrari to defendant for the purpose of enabling them to come to an agreement on the price; he having stated that he was without authority to reduce the contract price.

[2] The contract gave plaintiff the exclusive right to sell within the time specified, and the sale was made within that time. The facts in this case differentiate it from those cases relied on by defendant, in which the sale was made after the contract had expired, or in which the sale was made by the owner during the contract period entirely independent of and without any assistance from the broker. A broker having an exclusive contract of sale, as here, cannot be deprived of his commission by the owner himself consummating the sale to the broker's client.

[3] The trial court properly sustained plaintiff's objection to questions, asked Ferrari by defendant, whether the fact that plaintiff showed him the place after he knew it was for sale had any bearing on his buying the place, or had anything to do with closing the deal. The question called for the mere conclusion of the witness.

The judgment is affirmed.

INYO COUNTY v. HESS et al. (Civ. 3600.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 5, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 1, 1921.)

1. Telegraphs and telephones ⚡10(4)—Private individual not entitled to use county highways for telephone lines without grant from supervisors.

Civ. Code, § 536, as amended in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 492), authorizing "telegraph or telephone corporations" to use the public highways is not applicable to private individuals, and a private individual, in order to use county highways for construction of telephone lines, must first obtain a grant of such right from the board of supervisors of the county, under Pol. Code, § 4041, subd. 35, and the Broughton Act.

2. Telegraphs and telephones ⚡10(4)—Corporation acquiring telephone system of private individual constructed under grant from supervisors under Broughton Act may construct lines over highways 'unrestricted by such act or grant.

A corporation, having acquired telephone system constructed on county highways by a private individual under a grant from the board of supervisors of a county under the Broughton Act, could thereafter, under Civ. Code, § 536, as amended by St. 1905, p. 492, construct its lines upon the county highways without the restrictions of the Broughton Act, or the grant by the board of supervisors to such individual.

3. Telegraphs and telephones ⚡4—Statute permitting telephone corporations to use highways 'not repealed by Broughton Act.

The enactment of the Broughton Act prescribing conditions on which a franchise to construct intrastate telephone lines along public highways may be granted did not repeal by implication the 1905 amendment (St. 1905, p. 492) to Civ. Code, § 536, permitting telephone corporations to construct lines along the public highways, since such amendment was enacted only a few days prior to the enactment of the Broughton Act, and since there is no repugnancy between the amendment and the act.

4. Statutes ⚡158—Repeals by implication not favored.

Repeals by implication are not favored, and in the absence of express terms courts will not indulge in the presumption that the Legislature intended by a later act to repeal the former one if by a fair and reasonable construction effect can be given to both, particularly where the effect of such repeal is to impair a settled prerogative of the government.

5. Telegraphs and telephones ⚡10(10)—Corporation acquiring lines constructed by private individual under franchise granted under Broughton Act from county is not required to pay county percentage of receipts; "construct."

A telephone corporation, having acquired telephone lines constructed by a private individual under a grant from the county board of supervisors under the Broughton Act, requiring such individual to pay the county 2 per cent. of the gross annual receipts, was not required to pay the county such 2 per cent. of the gross annual receipts, since under Civ. Code, § 536, as amended by St. 1905, p. 492, it had the right to "construct" telephone lines along and upon public highways, which right was not restricted to construction of new lines, but included the right to use the highways for lines constructed by such individual under such grant from the board of supervisors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Inyo County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by the County of Inyo against Fred M. Hess and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Isaac B. Potter, Newman Jones and Henry W. Coll, all of Riverside (John R. Dixon, of Riverside, of counsel), for appellants.

Jess Hession, Dist. Atty., of Independence, Richard S. Miner, of Independence, and W. B. Mathews, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In this action the county of Inyo, as plaintiff, sought the recovery of 2 per cent. of the gross annual receipts derived from the operation of a telephone system during the years mentioned in the complaint for the franchise or privilege of using the county highways over which to construct and operate telephone and telegraph wires. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants have appealed.

The decision of the case involves the interpretation and application of the so-called Broughton Act (St. 1905, p. 777), under and pursuant to which it is claimed a telephone franchise was granted to defendant Hess by plaintiff to construct telephone lines over the public highways of Inyo county, and in connection therewith the rights of the corporations as assignees under section 536, Civil Code.

In the absence of findings, which were waived, and omitting matters not pertinent to the decision, under our view of the case, the material facts are as follows: On April 21, 1906, the board of supervisors of Inyo county, after full compliance with the provisions of the Broughton Act, by ordinance No. 95 duly adopted, granted to Hess as the highest bidder therefor a franchise to construct a telephone system over all the public roads and highways in said county, which ordinance, in accordance with the provisions of the Broughton Act, provided that the privilege so granted should be fully exercised within three years from the date of the grant, and that no work or construction in extending said lines or system of telegraph or telephone poles should be permitted after the lapse of three years from said date, to wit: April 21, 1906. Among other obligations imposed upon Hess as grantee of the franchise was one requiring that he and his assigns should, commencing at the expiration of five years from the making of the grant, pay to the county 2 per cent. of the gross annual receipts arising from the use and operation of the franchise. The three years within which Hess was to exercise the privilege granted expired on April 21, 1909, prior to which time he, under the franchise so granted, constructed his telephone lines over some 40 odd miles of public highway, connected with which and as a part of the system was some 19 miles constructed over government lands and private rights of way, making a total of about 60 miles which Hess owned and had in operation on April 21, 1909, at which time, under the provisions of the franchise granted, his privilege to extend the line over additional highways terminated.

On June 30, 1909, and prior to the expiration of five years from date of the grant, when the 2 per cent. tax attached, he sold, transferred, and assigned all of his rights in and to the franchise and telephone system to the Inyo Telephone Company, a corporation, which company, on March 5, 1912, sold and transferred the same to the Interstate Telegraph Company, a corporation, both of which corporations were entitled to do a telephone business in the state of California. Notwithstanding the time for constructing the system expired on April 21, 1909, both of said corporations, without further grant than that so made to Hess, continued the construction of lines of telephone in extending the system, to which they added 176 miles, some 50 miles of which were constructed over the public highways, the balance being over government lands and private rights of way. On November 9, 1915, in compliance with a demand from plaintiff, Hess, as vice president and general manager of the Interstate Telegraph Company, which then owned and operated the entire system, filed with the county clerk separate statements purporting to be for the gross income, less that derived from interstate business, arising from the operation of the telephone system for each of the five years immediately following April 21, 1911, which statements, duly verified, and varying only in amounts and the year for which each was made, were in form as follows:

"Interstate Telegraph Company. Gross Receipts in Inyo County, exclusive of interstate business, April 21, 1911, to April 20, 1912, $14,088.22."

The amounts as stated for the other years, in order were: For the second year, $20,897.28; for the third year, $18,993.48; for the fourth year, $20,498.37; and for the fifth year, $20,150.77—each of which sums was made the subject of a separate cause of action. While these statements were exclusive of income derived from interstate business which the assignee of Hess conducted over the system and lines with which it was connected, they did include income derived from the operation of the telephone system in the incorporated town of Bishop, which latter income, upon defendants showing the amount thereof, was by the court deducted from the gross income as shown by defendants' statements, and judgment rendered for each year upon the amount stated, less the Bishop revenue. It thus appears that the entire system of telephone lines, excluding the municipal line in the town of Bishop and a certain line acquired by the Interstate Company from the Nevada-California Power Company, the use of which enabled defendants to conduct an interstate business by transmitting messages from points in California to points in the state of Nevada, consisted of about 240 miles in length, 60 miles of which, mostly over highways, were constructed by Hess prior to the time specified in the grant within which his right to erect telephone poles in the highways terminated, and approximately 180 miles constructed by his successors after the termination of his right to extend the lines under his franchise.

While the judgment rendered excluded any percentage upon income derived from interstate business and income derived from the operation of the plant in the town of Bishop, it was computed not only upon income derived from the operation of the 60 miles of line constructed by Hess under the terms of his franchise, but also upon income derived from the 180 miles of line constructed by the Inyo Telephone Company and the Interstate Telegraph Company after the time when the rights of Hess to occupy the highways with poles in new construction had, under the terms of the franchise, ceased and terminated, and, in so far as the public roads were used therefor, without right so to do, other than as such right is granted by section 536, Civil Code.

[1] Excepting the legislative grant made in 1872 by section 536, authorizing telegraph companies to use the public highways for the purpose therein specified, and which right was, by an amendment of the section approved March 20, 1905, extended to telephone companies as well, the power to grant franchises to use public highways for secondary purposes appears to have been generally delegated to the local subdivisions of the state, subject to certain restrictions. Assuming that section 536 is not affected by the provisions of the Broughton Act, and that, in accordance with the plain import of the language used, it grants to both telegraph and telephone corporations the right to construct lines of telegraph and telephone by means of poles for supporting insulators, wires, and other necessary fixtures thereof over and along the public roads, such right is restricted to corporations only, and cannot be construed as a grant to individuals. City of San Diego v. Kerckhoff, 193 Pac. 801; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Hopkins, 160 Cal. 122, 116 Pac. 557. They have no right to appropriate the use of the highways for such secondary purposes save and except upon a grant of the privilege so to do made by the legislative body of the local subdivision concerned, which in this case was the board of supervisors of Inyo county. Its authority to make the grant is found in section 4041, Political Code, subdivision 35 of which provides that such boards, subject to such limitations and restrictions as are prescribed by law, shall have power—

“to grant franchises along and over the public roads and highways for all lawful purposes, upon such terms and conditions and restrictions as in their judgment may be necessary and proper.”

While the Broughton Act does not purport to either grant or authorize the granting of such franchises, it does in express terms place restrictions upon the exercise of the power so delegated to boards of supervisors. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Pasadena, 161 Cal. 265, 118 Pac. 796; Oro Electric Corp. v. R. R. Commission, 169 Cal. 466, 147 Pac. 118. The provision thereof is that—

“Every franchise or privilege to erect or lay telegraph or telephone wires, * * * upon any public * * * highway * * * proposed to be granted by boards of supervisors * * * of any county * * * within this state, except * * * telegraph or telephone lines doing an interstate business, * * * shall be granted upon the conditions in this act provided, and not otherwise.”

Hence, since the franchise to Hess as a private individual was granted by the board of supervisors, whose right so to do is in express terms made subject to the provisions of the Broughton Act, it must follow that that part of the telephone line in question constructed by him over highways prior to the time fixed in the grant for the termination of such right, less the income derived therefrom during the first five years of such period, is subject to the payment of 2 per cent. per annum upon the gross income, arising from the use of the right so granted, unless its acquisition by the telephone corporations so vested with the rights specified in section 536, under which they, and not Hess, the individual, operated the lines, exempted them from the payment.

A municipal telephone line, from its nature and the service rendered, is never complete. To meet the demands of the public it must be, and in fact is, constantly extended by adding new lines, using streets and highways therefor. Hence, if the grantee of such privilege is restricted to three years within which to construct the same, it would seem that no authority existed for making such extensions after the expiration of such time. Notwithstanding such result, and construing the provision in accordance with the plain import of the language used, it would seem clear that, since, as provided in the franchise granted to Hess, his right to extend the lines by erecting poles in the highways had terminated when he transferred the telephone system and franchise to the Inyo Telephone Company, such company by the purported transfer acquired no right to make extensions of the system under and by virtue of the franchise granted to Hess. In other words, it acquired no right from Hess under which it was authorized to erect telephone poles and wires over the portions of the highway which he had not occupied within the three-year period specified in ordinance No. 95.

Conceding the correctness of the proposition stated, and expressly disclaiming any right to occupy the highways under and by virtue of the Act of Congress of July 24, 1866, appellants, as telephone corporations, insist that under the legislative grant made by said section 536 they were at all the times mentioned entitled not only to construct and maintain their telephone lines along and upon any public road or highway, free of any restrictions imposed by the Broughton Act, but entitled to acquire and operate the Hess lines likewise free from such restrictions. This section in its present form, except that it did not apply to telephone companies, was adopted in 1872, and when acted upon by a telegraph company it constituted a grant of the right as therein stated. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Hopkins, 160 Cal. 106, 116 Pac. 557. As originally adopted, however, it did not include telephone companies (Davis v. Pacific Telephone & Tel. Co., 127 Cal. 312, 57 Pac. 764, 59 Pac. 698), and hence it did not constitute a grant to corporations engaged in such business. On March 20, 1905 (St. 1905 (p. 492) the section was amended so that it applied to telephone corporations equally with telegraph corporations. The section as amended, however, did not become operative until 60 days after its passage. Two days later, to wit, on March 22, 1905, the Broughton Act, imposing conditions in the granting of franchises, was adopted, with the provision that it should take effect immediately. Excepting telegraph and telephone lines doing an interstate business, and the provision that every franchise or privilege granted by boards of supervisors to erect telephone wires along and upon the public highways should be granted upon the conditions specified therein and not otherwise, it provides that all acts or parts of acts in conflict therewith are repealed, save and except certain acts therein specified, among which section 536, Civil Code, is not mentioned. Hence the question presented is whether section 536 (which, if valid, designates telephone and telegraph corporations solely and alone as subjects of legislative grant, free and independent from any action on the part of the board of supervisors) conflicts with the Broughton Act, the provisions of which by the language employed appear to be limited to franchises and privileges the granting of which is confided to—

"boards of supervisors, boards of trustees, or common councils, or other governing or legislative bodies of any county, city and county, city or town within this state."

The question arose in the case of City of Pomona v. Sunset Telephone & Tel. Co., decided by the Supreme Court of the United States (224 U. S. 330, 32 Sup. Ct. 477, 56 L. Ed. 788), wherein Justice Holmes, of that court, in discussing the question, said:

"It [the telephone company] contends that this act [the Broughton act] establishes conditions only for counties, cities and towns, and does not qualify the grant from the state in the amended section 536. The appellant [City of Pomona], on the other hand, argues that the franchise act repealed section 536, so far as it affects this case, except as to telephone [companies] doing an interstate business. In view of the frame of the act as a whole, of a general repealing clause at the end, naming certain exceptions of which section 536 is not one, and of the fact that the grant of such franchises seems generally to have been left to the local subdivisions concerned, * * * we construe the words quoted as of general application, and are of opinion that they cannot be supposed to have had the narrow operation that would be left to them if there were in force a grant from the state of almost universal scope. Until the state court shall decide otherwise we must take section 536 to have been repealed, subject to the exception contained in the later act. * * *

[2, 3] Notwithstanding this high authority to the contrary, we are forced to the conclusion that the provisions of the Broughton Act are not in conflict with section 536, Civil Code, and hence the legislative grant therein made is not subject to the restrictions and limitations contained in the Broughton Act, and which, according to the plain import of the language used therein, are applicable solely to franchises granted under delegation of power to the legislative bodies of local subdivisions of the state directly concerned, which, as we have seen, appears to have been the legislative policy pursued in granting rights in the public highways for all secondary uses other than to corporations for telephone and telegraph lines (and perhaps to railroad corporations), as to which, for reasons satisfactory to the Legislature, it, instead of delegating to local legislative bodies the power to act in such matters, has itself, by section 536, tendered to all such corporations a franchise to use the highways for their lines, an acceptance of which is signified by their act in constructing the same over the highways so offered.

[4] Repeals by implication are not favored, and in the absence of express terms courts will not indulge in the presumption that the Legislature intended by a later act to repeal a former one, if by a fair and reasonable construction effect can be given to both. This is particularly true where the effect of such repeal is to impair a settled prerogative of the government, as, in the instant case, the state's control of its highways. The two acts in question were adopted at about the same time, and it would seem improbable that the Legislature would on one day amend section 536, under which for more than 30 years telegraph corporations had been accorded the right to use the highways over which to construct their lines, the sole purpose of the amendment being to give telephone corporations like rights, and the next day or day following pass a repealing act. On the contrary, the Legislature must be deemed to have recognized the fact that section 536 constituted a legislative grant, not to private individuals, but limited in its operation to telegraph and telephone corporations only; that the right of individuals to construct telephone and telegraph lines over the highways and the right to use the highways by either individuals or corporations for all secondary purposes other than by corporations for telegraph and telephone lines, could be acquired only by action of the local legislative bodies to which the power of granting such privileges was delegated, and that as to grants of franchises made in the exercise of such power it was intended they should be subject to the conditions prescribed in the Broughton Act.

Since the act thus in terms limits its operation to those franchises only which boards of supervisors and other minor legislative bodies are authorized to grant, it cannot, without violating well-recognized principles of interpretation, be construed as applicable to the statutory grant made directly by the Legislature, and which without any action on the part of boards of supervisors authorized such corporations to occupy the highways. In our opinion, there is no repugnance between the act and section 536. Upon a fair and reasonable construction both can be given effect, and hence our conclusion is that, in constructing their lines of telephone over the public highways of Inyo county after the date of the transfer made by Hess to the Inyo Telephone Company, the corporations named acted under the right so to do granted by section 536, unrestricted by the provisions of the Broughton Act or any of the conditions contained in ordinance No. 95 granting the franchise to Hess.

[5] Were the Hess lines, as operated by the corporations as part of the telephone system, subject to the payment of the 2 per cent. tax? We think not. The grant to Hess was "over, along, and upon any or all public highways in the county of Inyo," and in accordance with the act it was made subject to the provision that the grantee and his assigns should, during the term thereof, pay to the county 2 per cent. of the gross annual receipts arising from the use, operation, and possession thereof. It cannot be said, however, that this imposed upon him the duty of constructing telephone lines upon all the highways of the county, and, while the grant was for a term of 25 years, it cannot be construed as requiring him to operate the lines so constructed for any given period. So long, however, as he or his assigns, if other than a telephone corporation, operated them, the gross revenue derived from such operation was subject to the payment of the 2 per cent. arising from such operation. As we have seen, the right of the corporations to use the highways existed independently of the Hess franchise, and under the assignment thereof they took nothing other than what they already had, namely, the right to occupy the highways with poles and lines of wire constructed by them. This right, in our opinion, implies the right to use the highways for the lines constructed by Hess, and which they acquired by purchase. While the accepted meaning of the word "construct" is to assemble or build, it should, as used in section 536, be construed to apply to lines in place and purchased by such corporations. The operation of the lines by the corporations was not under the Hess franchise, but under an existing and superior right granted the corporations by section 536. As operated by the corporations, there was no gross revenue arising from the use, operation, and possession of the Hess franchise. Their right to use the highways in operating such lines was not impaired by the fact that Hess, by a naked assignment, transferred the franchise to them. We perceive no difference between the case as stated and one where an individual without a franchise wrongfully occupies highways in constructing a telephone line which, as built, he transfers to a telephone corporation having the right under its legislative grant to operate it.

Our conclusions are: First, that a private individual has no right to use county highways over which to construct a telephone line, save and except upon a grant of such right made by the board of supervisors in the exercise of the power vested in it by subdivision 35 of section 4041, Political Code, and under and pursuant to the restrictive provisions of the Broughton Act; second, that so long as he and his assigns operate the line under such franchise, and after five years from the date of the grant, it, in the absence of a transfer thereof to a telephone corporation, is subject to the annual payment of the 2 per cent. tax upon the gross receipts arising from the use of the franchise; third, that under and by virtue of the provisions of section 536, Civil Code, telephone corporations are granted the right and privilege to use the public highways over which to construct and operate lines of telephone wires, free from any grant made by subordinate legislative bodies, and unrestricted by the provisions of the Broughton Act, and that their right so to do applies not only to lines constructed by them, but to lines in place which they acquire by purchase from private individuals, constructed under franchises granted by boards of supervisors.

If we are correct in these conclusions, it follows therefrom that the judgment must be reversed, and the action, as disclosed by this record dismissed; hence it is unnecessary to discuss other grounds upon which appellants base their claim for a reversal.

The judgment is reversed.

CLOUGH v. W. H. HEALY CO. (Civ. 3863.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 1, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 29, 1921.)

1. Easements — 61(2)—Mandatory injunction may issue for protection of easement.

A court of equity will, in a proper case, award a mandatory injunction for the protection and preservation of an easement, will enjoin a threatened interference, and will require a defendant to repair an injury already done, or to remove an obstruction already erected; but each case is determined according to the particular circumstances, and it rests in the sound discretion of the court whether or not a mandatory injunction will issue.

2. Easements — 61(2)—Right to mandatory injunction to protect must be clear.

To entitle a complainant to a mandatory injunction for the protection and preservation of an easement, the right must be clear, and there must be a material interference with the right of the owner of the easement, and damages sustained must be more than merely nominal, and the court will consider the expense which would be occasioned to the defendant if the writ be granted as against the inconvenience to be suffered by the complainant; and where the removal of the interference or obstruction would bring no actual advantage, or the expense entailed thereby would be entirely disproportionate to the benefit resulting the complainant will be relegated to his legal remedy.

3. Easements — 61(2)—Landowner held not entitled to mandatory injunction for the preservation of easement.

In a suit to preserve and protect an easement, held that plaintiff was not entitled to a mandatory injunction.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

4. Judgment — 743(2) — Decision denying mandatory injunction held not to foreclose plaintiff's right of easement.

A judgment denying a mandatory injunction to restrain interference with an easement and to compel removal of an obstruction held not to foreclose plaintiff's rights as to the strip of land in question.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by George A. Clough against the W. H. Healy Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed in District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Tobin & Tobin and George Clough, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edwin T. Cooper and H. K. Eells, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action to quiet title and for a mandatory injunction restraining interference with an easement. Judgment went for the defendant, from which plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

F. Dudley Tait owned a parcel of land at the southeast corner of Hyde and Francisco streets in San Francisco, having a frontage on each of the streets named of 97½ feet. On the 7th day of May, 1914, Tait sold to the plaintiff the easterly 35 feet on Francisco street and granted to him in the same deed as an appurtenance to the lot sold an easement of light, air, and right of way 3 feet wide across the 62½ feet of the lot retained by Tait at the extreme rear thereof. The entire lot at that time was unimproved, and in its natural condition, and the easterly end of the 3-foot strip where it connected with the parcel conveyed to Clough was approximately 6 or 7 feet higher in elevation than the sidewalk on Hyde street. In the month of December, 1914, and during Clough's absence from San Francisco, and without his knowledge or consent, Tait, in connection with the construction of a residence upon the portion of the lot retained by him, excavated it in its entirety, including the 3-foot strip, and paved with concrete all of his lot up to said strip, so that the back yard of Tait was several feet lower than the adjacent land in the rear, and Tait accordingly constructed a concrete retaining wall on the rear 14 inches of the 3-foot strip, and at the same time constructed at the extreme western end of said strip a concrete retaining wall, leaving therein, however, an arched gateway about 3 feet wide and did also construct and erect across said gateway upon said strip an iron gate.

Immediately upon discovering the changes thus made, and in January, 1915, Clough demanded that Tait remove the obstructions from the 3-foot strip and restore it to its original condition. Thereafter, in September, 1915, Clough and Tait entered into a written agreement, which was recorded, and which, after reciting the facts as above stated, provided that Tait was to be permitted to maintain said obstruction upon condition that Tait should not permit certain trees and shrubbery which he had planted upon said strip to grow to such height as to interfere with Clough's easement of light and air; that he also would allow Clough a free, continuous, and unobstructed passage way over the rear portion of said back yard, and that he would not maintain in said yard any nuisance. Upon the breach, however, of any of the foregoing covenants, "or upon demand," said agreement provided that Tait should restore said strip to its original condition and elevation. The new right of way was to be approximately 3 feet wide, and was situated immediately adjoining and alongside said strip; in other words, Clough's right of way was shifted 3 feet north. There was also a provision in said agreement that the occupation by Tait of said original 3-foot strip by the erection thereon of said retaining wall and the planting of said trees and shrubbery should under no circumstances be construed as adverse to the original rights of Clough, but, in the event of Clough being restored to his former right of way, his right to the substituted way should terminate.

In June, 1917, defendant W. H. Healy Company, with actual and constructive notice of plaintiff's rights in the original 3-foot strip, purchased the Tait lot, and thereafter and before the commencement of this action, plaintiff demanded of the defendant the restoration of said strip of land to its original condition, which being refused he commenced this action to quiet title to said easement, and to compel the defendant to remove the obstruction and restore the easement to its condition at the time of the grant thereof to plaintiff. In addition to the facts above stated defendant testified that to remove the 14-inch wall at the south of his lot and to fill in the 3-foot strip with soil in order to restore the easement to its original condition would cost $1,500.

The trial court made findings, among others, to the effect that the plaintiff had not suffered and would not suffer great or irreparable, or any, injury from the obstruction of the right of way originally granted; that the defendant has not violated in any manner the contract with plaintiff as to the use of the substituted right of way; that to restore the original right of way to its condition at the time of the conveyance to plaintiff "would be very costly, and would be a material and positive damage and detriment to both the lands of plaintiff and defendant," and that it would furnish to plaintiff no better or more convenient right of way than the one now enjoyed by him, and "would be useless and unjust and inequitable and unreasonable, and highly burdensome to this defendant, and without any benefit or value, profit or convenience to plaintiff whatsoever."

[1, 2] A court of equity will, in a proper case, award a mandatory injunction for the protection and preservation of an easement; will enjoin a threatened interference, and require a defendant to repair an injury already done or to remove an obstruction already erected. Mandatory injunctions have been awarded directing that a closed or obstructed way be cleared and opened for the owner; but it is not in every case of a permanent obstruction that such relief will be granted. Each case is determined according to the particular circumstances; and it rests in the sound discretion of the court whether or not a mandatory injunction will issue. To entitle the complainant to equitable relief the right must be clear, and an injunction of the character here in question will be denied when the obstruction does not constitute a material interference with the right of the owner of the easement, or where the damage sustained by him is merely nominal. The court will consider the expense which would be occasioned to the defendant if the writ be granted, as against the inconvenience to be suffered by the complainant if it be refused; and where the removal of the obstruction would bring no actual advantage, or the expense entailed thereby would be entirely disproportionate to the benefit resulting, the complainant will be relegated to his legal remedy for the vindication of his right. 19 C. J. 996, § 258.

[3] In the case at bar there was no willful or deliberate invasion of the plaintiff's right of way, nor was there any breach of the agreement respecting it after its change of location. The plaintiff has suffered no damage, and it is not even claimed that the substituted right of way is less convenient, or that the right and privilege in the one is superior in any way to the other. Moreover, it appears, and the court in effect found, that the relief sought would result in no substantial benefit to the plaintiff if granted, but that it would impose an unreasonably burdensome task on the defendant if he were compelled to accede to the demand of the plaintiff.

In the case of Bochterle v. Saunders, 36 R. I. 39, 88 Atl. 803, 806, it was held that, where the owner of a house admitted its encroachment for 13 inches upon a right of way 33 feet wide, and agreed to remove the encroachment, which would require an expenditure of $300 to remove the house back or of $100 to cut off the projecting part, which would reduce the dining room to a size rendering it useless, or exceedingly inconvenient for its intended purpose, and which would bring complainant no practical advantage, a court of equity, in view of the disproportion between the outlay and the benefit to the complainant, would refuse to compel performance of the agreement, but would leave the complainant to his remedy at law.

The circumstances of the present case were not such, in the opinion of the trial judge, as to warrant the granting of the remedy invoked, and we cannot say that he abused a sound legal discretion in arriving at his conclusion.

Judgment affirmed.

Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM, The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District Division 1, is denied.

[4] We do not construe the judgment in this case as foreclosing plaintiff's rights as to the original strip in the event of any breach of the supplemental agreement, and are of opinion that, under the terms of such agreement, in connection with said judgment, such rights are fully preserved.

SINCERNEY v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (Civ. 3605.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 7, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 1, 1921.)

1. Railroads ⚡75(3)—Use of street without municipal consent a trespass.

A railroad company's use of a city street without the city's consent required by Civ. Code, § 470, constitutes a trespass.

2. Electricity ⚡19(2)—City, sued for injuries to railroad brakeman, struck by pole near track, need not allege plaintiff was trespasser on street, or that company was using same without franchise.

In an action for injuries to a railroad brakeman, while climbing the side of a moving box car, by coming in contact with a pole erected by the city near the tracks on street, over the line of which the car projected, it was not necessary that defendants plead that plaintiff was a trespasser on the street, or that the railroad company was using the street without a franchise, defendants, under their denial of negligence and damage, as well as under their plea of contributory negligence, being entitled to prove any fact which would make good such defenses.

3. Negligence ⚡32(1)—Licensee cannot complain of unsafe condition of premises.

Under Civ. Code, § 1714, liability for negligence arises where one person causes an injury to another by his want of ordinary care or skill in the management of his property, except so far as the person injured has willfully or by want of ordinary care brought the injury upon himself, but a mere licensee cannot recover where his injuries are caused solely by reason of the unsafe condition of the premises, and without any active or overt act of negligence committed against him by the occupant or owner thereof.

4. Electricity ⚡19(4)—Evidence that railroad company used street without franchise when brakeman was struck by light pole held admissible.

In an action for injuries to a railroad brakeman by coming into contact with an electric light pole erected by a city near the railroad tracks on a street, the court erred in refusing to admit evidence that the railroad company had no franchise to operate its cars on such street, for even if, by reason of long use, without any objection from the city, the company had ceased to be a trespasser in so encroaching on the street, neither it nor its employees could have acquired any status better than that of a mere licensee with respect to such use of the street.

5. Municipal corporations ⚡590—City held independent of general laws on municipal affairs except as limited by charter.

In view of Const. art. 11, §§ 6 and 8, providing that cities by their charters may make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their charters and that, in respect to other matters, they shall be subject to and controlled by general laws, the city of Los Angeles, on adopting its city charter (article 1, § 2, subd. 51), empowering it to make and enforce all such laws and regulations, except as therein limited, became independent of general laws on municipal affairs, including laws giving the Railroad Commission powers over public utilities, except as limited by its charter.

6. Electricity ⚡9(1)—Municipal corporations ⚡733(3)—Railroad Commission's order, prohibiting poles within given distance of railroad tracks, held applicable to city street lights.

While the supplying of electric light and power by a city to its inhabitants is within the scope of municipal purposes, where the right to conduct such business has been granted to the city, the city of Los Angeles, though vested by its Charter (article 3, § 31), with power to regulate the placing or maintaining of poles and suspending of wires along or across its streets, and though its board of public service commissioners, by charter (article 18, § 192g), is vested with power to construct, operate and maintain electric plants, systems, and equipments for supplying the city and its inhabitants with electric light, power, etc., in conducting such business is exercising proprietary, rather than governmental, functions, and is liable for negligence in the operation thereof, so that a general order of the State Railroad Commission prohibiting the erection of poles within eight feet of the center line of a railroad track applies to and controls the location by such city of poles for use as a part of its power distributing system to the same extent as to a private corporation exercising similar rights under a franchise, the subject-matter of such order being of general interest, and not merely of local, municipal concern.

7. Electricity ⚡15(1)—Violation by city of order of State Railroad Commission as to erection of poles near railroad tracks not negligence where railroad company was using street without franchise.

A city erecting an electric light pole less than eight feet from the center line of an adjacent railroad track, in violation of the State Railroad Commission's order, is not guilty of negligence as respects the rights of a railroad brakeman injured by coming into contact with such pole while climbing the side of a moving box car which extended over the line of the street in which the pole was erected, where the railroad company employing such brakeman was so using and occupying the street without a franchise, since there cannot be neglect without the existence of a corresponding duty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by James R. Sincerney against the City of Los Angeles and the Board of Public Service Commissioners of the City of Los Angeles. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Charles S. Burnell, City Atty., W. B. Mathews, Lewis E. Whitehead, Trent G. Anderson, and Ray C. Eberhard, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Stuart M. Salisbury, Stannard A. McNeil, and Philip C. Sterry, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff when, in the course of his employment on August 31, 1918, as a brakeman on the Atchison, Topeka, & Santa Fé Railway, he was climbing the side of a moving box car which had been detached from the engine, and came in contact with a pole which appellant, board of public service commissioners, had erected near the railway track and on the sidewalk of Palmetto street, in the city of Los Angeles. This pole was a part of a system of poles and wires for the transmission of electric power to the inhabitants of said city, for which service the city was receiving remuneration and deriving a profit from the sale of said electric power. The car on which the plaintiff was riding was traveling on a spur track built on a private right of way immediately north of and adjacent to Palmetto street. Judgment was entered upon the verdict in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $2,500, from which judgment defendants appeal.

The railroad track was so located that at the point opposite the pole the nearest rail was only 1.65 feet from the north line of the street. The width of the car (which was an ordinary box car on the side of which respondent was climbing on a ladder at the instant of the accident) was such that the car projected more than a foot beyond the street line, and over the sidewalk. This condition of the track, and similar use thereof by the railroad company, had existed for a long time. Accordingly the fact is established that the railroad company, and respondent as its employee, both before and at the time of this accident, were engaged in the business of using and occupying the street for the purpose of operating railroad trains thereon. Supplementary to the foregoing facts and for the purpose of establishing their contention that respondent, at the time of the accident, was a trespasser upon the street, appellants offered evidence, appropriate for the purpose, to prove that the railway company had no franchise to operate its cars on Palmetto street at the point where the accident occurred. Objections to this evidence were sustained upon the ground that, as stated in the objections of counsel, evidence concerning the franchise was immaterial—

"in view of the law in this case that an obstruction shall not be placed within so many feet of a railroad track. It is immaterial where the franchise extends to."

Appellants contend that the court erred in rejecting this evidence. The "law in this case," referred to in the objection, is general order No. 26 of the Railroad Commission of the state of California, which establishes a minimum clearance for pole lines on each side of the center line of railroads. Appellants were charged with negligence in the erection and maintenance of the pole, in that the pole was located less than eight feet from the center line of the railroad track, and therefore was so placed in violation of law.

[1] The right of a railroad corporation to use a street within an incorporated city cannot exist unless it is granted by a two-thirds vote of the town or city authorities from which the right must emanate. Civ. Code, § 470; San Pedro, etc., Co. v. City of Long Beach, 172 Cal. 631, 158 Pac. 204. In Pittsburgh, etc., Co. v. Hood, 94 Fed. 618, 36 C. C. A. 423, the Circuit Court of Appeals said:

"In the absence of legislative authority, either direct or through the authorized action of a municipality, the construction and use by a railroad company of its road longitudinally on a highway or street is a public nuisance, and the company is subject to indictment for creating and maintaining such a nuisance. * * * Such unauthorized occupation and use of streets and highways, being wrongful, not only creates a nuisance, but constitutes a railway company a trespasser, and renders it liable for such damages as proximately result to persons or property in the absence of contributory negligence."

In response to the proposition last above stated, counsel for respondent say that the right of way in question had been given to the railroad company by the city of Los Angeles, and had been used by the railroad for over 15 years; that the railroad was not a trespasser in using this track; further, that this question is not raised by the pleadings, but was raised for the first time upon the trial of the case. But they do not refer us to any part of the record showing that any right of way over Palmetto street had ever been given to the railroad by the city. The error which appellants complain of is that the court refused to permit appellants to introduce evidence proving that no such right of way had ever been granted.

[2] It was not necessary that appellants in their answer allege that respondent, at the time and place of the accident, was a trespasser upon the street, or that the railroad company was using the street without a franchise. Under the denial of negligence on the part of the defendants, and their denial that the plaintiff had suffered damage through such alleged negligence, as well as under their plea that the plaintiff's injuries were due to his own negligence, they were entitled to prove any fact which, if established, would make good these defenses.

[3] Liability for negligence arises where one person causes an injury to another by his want of ordinary care or skill in the management of his property, except so far as the person injured has willfully, or by want of ordinary care, brought the injury upon himself. Civ. Code, § 1714. But the standard by which to test the "ordinary care or skill" required of a person in the management of his property is different, in the case of a trespasser or mere licensee upon the defendants' property, from the standard established in favor of a person lawfully present upon the premises where the injury is inflicted, and whose right to be there is not limited to that of a licensee.

"A mere licensee cannot recover where the injuries are caused solely by reason of the unsafe condition of the premises, and without any active or overt act of negligence committed against him by the occupant or owner of the premises." Herold v. P. H. Mathews Paint House, 39 Cal. App. 489, 493, 179 Pac. 414.

[4] Even if it were conceded that by reason of long use, without any objection from the city, the railroad company had ceased to be a trespasser in encroaching upon the street in the manner hereinabove stated, without any franchise having been granted to it for that purpose, the company and its employees could not in any event have acquired any status better than that of a mere licensee with respect to such use of the street. So considered, any person using the street under that license must take the premises as he finds them. Under the evidence in this case no claim can be made that any active or overt act of negligence was committed by appellants against respondent at the time and place of the accident by which his injuries were received. The unsafe condition of the premises, if they were unsafe at all, was caused solely by reason of the presence of the pole in the place where it had been set up before the day when the accident occurred. This being so, appellants would not have been guilty of any negligence of which respondent had a right to complain. Therefore we conclude that the court erred in refusing to admit the offered evidence. And if evidence to the effect that the train was being operated without a franchise had been received, appellants would have been entitled to have appropriate instructions given to the jury stating the legal effect of such evidence if believed and found to be true.

[5] The distance of the pole as located and placed by appellants was less than eight feet from the center line of the spur track. This was less than the minimum clearance for pole lines on each side of the center line of railroads, as established by general order No. 26 of the Railroad Commission, which is set out in the complaint. Respondent claims that the order is applicable to the location or maintenance of poles in the public streets of the city of Los Angeles, and that therefore the pole was erected and maintained at that place in violation of law, and that this was negligence, in that it was a violation of an obligation imposed by law, due from appellants to respondent at the time and place of the accident. Appellants contend that the order has no application to the location or maintenance of poles in the public streets of said city, and therefore that the court erred in giving to the jury the following instruction:

"You are instructed that if the defendants, or either of them, placed a pole such as is alleged in the complaint at a point nearer than eight feet from the center line of the railroad track described in the complaint herein, then I instruct you that the defendants are guilty of negligence, and if you find that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury complained of, your judgment shall be for the plaintiff, unless you further find that the plaintiff's injuries were caused by his own contributory negligence."

The city council of the city of Los Angeles is vested with power by ordinance to regulate the placing or maintaining of poles and the suspending of wires along or across any of its streets. Charter, art. 3, § 31. The board of public service commissioners is vested with power to construct, operate, maintain, and extend electric plants, works, systems, and equipments, and other means for supplying the city and its inhabitants with electricity for light, power, heat, and other purposes. Charter, art. 18, § 192g. Subdivision 51 of section 2 of article 1 of the charter empowers the city—

"to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in this charter. * * *

This charter power is conferred within the terms of sections 6 and 8 of article 11 of the state Constitution which provides that by their charters cities may—

"make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their several charters, and in respect to other matters they shall be subject to and controlled by general laws."

Referring to the adoption of said subdivision 51 the Supreme Court, in Civic Center Ass'n v. Railroad Commission, 175 Cal. 441, 448, 166 Pac. 351, 354, said:

"Thereupon, according to the terms of those sections of the Constitution, its powers over municipal affairs became all-embracing, restricted, and limited by the charter 'only,' and free from any interference by the state through general laws, including laws giving the Railroad Commission powers over public utilities. The result is that the city has become independent of general laws upon municipal affairs. Upon such affairs a general law is of no force with respect to Los Angeles. If its charter gives it powers concerning them, it has those powers; if its charter is silent as to any such power, no general law can confer it."

[6] In view of the law as above stated, if the location of poles in a public street of said city is in all of its possible relations a municipal affair, the conclusion must follow that the general order in question of the Railroad Commission had no force or effect with reference to the location of the pole with which respondent came into contact, and thereby received the injuries of which he complains. The use of the streets of a municipality for the maintenance therein of telegraph and telephone poles and wires, although a use secondary to the ordinary uses thereof by the general public, is a municipal affair. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Pasadena, 161 Cal. 265, 285, 118 Pac. 796. But while in general terms this is true, it is also true that these and analogous uses of a street sometimes have interrelations with things of general state interest which are not municipal affairs. In recognition of this fact, it has been held that the right and power of the Railroad Commission, under section 43 of the Public Utilities Act (St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 40), to require state railroads to establish viaducts or subways at street crossings in the city of Los Angeles, is a right and power to make regulations which are matters of general state concern, which are not properly municipal affairs.

"The right of the Legislature, under sections 17, 22, and 23, art. 12, of the Constitution, to commit the regulation of these railroads, so far as they operate within the cities, to the exclusive control of the Railroad Commission, is not a matter which can be classed as a municipal affair, but is a matter of general concern, and the legislative declarations on the subject are paramount to any city charter." Civic Center Ass'n v. Railroad Comm., 175 Cal. 441, 451, 166 Pac. 351, 355.

The principle of decision based upon the Constitution and charter provisions above mentioned is applicable to appellant city while acting in the capacity of a corporation owning and conducting the business of selling and distributing electric power. While the supplying of water by a city to its inhabitants is held to be a municipal purpose (Marin Water, etc., Co. v. Town of Sausalito, 168 Cal. 587, 598, 143 Pac. 767), and while the supplying of electric light and power by a city to its inhabitants is also a thing within the scope of municipal purposes where the right to conduct such business has been granted to the city, it is also well established that, in conducting business of this character, the city is exercising proprietary, rather than governmental, functions. It is upon this principle that cities are liable for negligence in the operation of such business. Davoust v. City of Alameda, 149 Cal. 69, 84 Pac. 760, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 536, 9 Ann. Cas. 847; Chaffor v. City of Long Beach, 174 Cal. 478, 487, 163 Pac. 670, L. R. A. 1917E, 685, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 106. In Davoust v. City of Alameda, supra, the court (quoting Western S. F. Society v. Phila., 31 Pa. 185) said in effect that, where the power is given to a city to supply gaslight to its inhabitants, the city thereby exercises a special private franchise; that the investment made in such business is the private property of the city, as much as are the lands and houses belonging to it; that the city stands on the same footing as would any individual or body of persons upon whom the like special franchises had been conferred.

We conclude, therefore, that general order No. 26 applies to and controls the location by appellants of poles for use as a part of their power-distributing system, to the same extent that it is applicable to a private corporation exercising similar rights under any franchise. That the subject-matter of the order, whether the particular matter involved be within or without the city of Los Angeles, is of general interest, and not merely of local or municipal concern, is quite as clear as that the power to require state railroads to establish viaducts or subways at street crossings in that city is a matter of general state concern. The act of setting a telephone pole in the street within eight feet from the center line of a railroad track was a violation of a valid order, having the force of law, governing that situation.

[7] But the unqualified statement made in the court's instruction to the jury, that if the defendants placed the pole less than eight feet from the center line of the railroad track they were guilty of negligence, would not have been a correct statement as applied to the situation existing between the plaintiff and the defendants, if it had been a proved fact in the case that the railroad company, in whose business the plaintiff was employed, was occupying and using the street without any franchise giving it a right to such occupancy and use. "There cannot be neglect without the existence of a corresponding duty." Kennedy v. Chase, 119 Cal. 637, 52 Pac. 33, 63 Am. St. Rep. 153. It seems clear that the rejection of the evidence heretofore discussed, affecting plaintiff's rights in the street under the stated circumstances, was prejudicial error.

Judgment reversed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. SHAFER et al.
(Civ. 3155.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 9, 1921.)

Municipal corporations — 347(1) — Contractor's bond held not to provide for liquidated damages.

Under Street Improvement Act, § 9, providing that a contract for the improvement of streets must be let to the lowest responsible bidder, who must give bond for the faithful performance of the work, and, on failure of the contractor to do the work, that the legislative body may relet the contract and pay costs of it, and expenses incident to the reletting out of funds due or to become due to the contractor, and hold him and his sureties responsible on his bond for costs and expenses, and damages resulting from abandoning the contract, a bond given by contractor to perform his contract is not for liquidated damages, and in the absence of evidence of actual damages there can be no recovery on the bond.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by the City of Los Angeles against M. T. Shafer and the Maryland Casualty Company, a corporation. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Bicksler, Smith & Parke and F. C. Austin, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Charles S. Burnell, City Atty., and Wm. P. Mealey, Asst. City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, Judge pro tem. This is an action against the contractor and his surety on a faithful performance bond given pursuant to the Street Improvement Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 954).

In May, 1917, the city of Los Angeles, after proceedings regularly taken, invited proposals for the improvement of Oregon and Ezra streets. The defendant M. T. Shafer submitted a bid to do the work for $4,487.84. The bid was accepted, and the contract, which was awarded to him, was executed on June 16, 1917. On the same day the defendant Shafer and Maryland Casualty Company, as his surety, executed a bond in the sum of $1,125 for the faithful performance of the contract, as required by section 9 of said act. The city then proceeded to ascertain the damages to private property by reason of the proposed improvement, and to levy and collect an assessment sufficient to pay the damages and the contract price. On December 22, 1917, the city, through its board of public works, caused a notice to be deposited in the United States mail, addressed to the defendant contractor at 220 West Thirty-Third street, Los Angeles. This street number was the address placed by Mr. Shafer on his bid when the same was submitted by him in May. The notice stated that there was sufficient money and bonds in the special improvement fund to pay the contract price, and concluded with the following:

"You are further notified to commence within twenty days from the date of service upon you of this notice, and thereafter diligently prosecute to completion, the work of said improvement, according to the terms of that certain contract therefor made and entered into between you and the city of Los Angeles, dated the 16th day of June, 1917, and now on file in the office of the city engineer of said city."

Work was not commenced within 20 days after the date of the mailing of the notice, nor at all. On January 21, 1918, the contract was canceled by resolution of the board of public works, and the city relet the contract to another contractor for $5,104.97, or $617.13 more than Mr. Shafer's bid. On June 10, 1918, the plaintiff brought this action. Judgment for the full amount of the bond was rendered against the defendants, both of whom have appealed.

The principal contentions presented on behalf of the appellants are: First, that the contractor never was placed in default in accordance with the statute, and therefore no liability accrued on the bond; and, second, that the trial court enforced the obligation under the bond as one for liquidated damages, whereas it is contended the plaintiff is entitled under the statute to actual damages, and none other, and that no such actual damages were shown.

[1] As to the first contention, it is urged that, under section 9 of the act, and the contract made in pursuance thereof, the plaintiff must allege and prove receipt by the contractor of the said notice before he can be put in default. Section 9 provides that—

"The contract shall provide that the work must be commenced within twenty days after the contractor receives written notice from the superintendent of streets that there is sufficient money or bonds, or money and bonds in the special fund devoted to the proposed improvement to pay the contract price, and completed within such time as the superintendent of streets shall prescribe."

In obedience to this requirement of the statute the contract contains the following provision:

"It is further understood and agreed that the work herein mentioned shall be commenced by the party of the first part within twenty days after notice in writing is received by said party from the board of public works of the city of Los Angeles that there is sufficient money or bonds, or money and bonds, in the special fund devoted to the improvement, * * * and shall be completed within sixty days after the receipt of said notice by the said party of the first part."

The contention of the appellants is well taken. Under the statute and the contract the receipt of the notice by the contractor starts the time within which work must be commenced, or he be in default, and subject to a cancellation of the contract, and the burden is on the plaintiff both to allege and prove receipt by the contractor of the notice. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff—

"did duly perform or did cause to be duly performed all of the conditions and acts on its part which it was required to do under said contract and under said statute hereinbefore referred to."

This allegation is denied and issue is thus properly joined under section 457, Code of Civil Procedure. The court found "that on the 24th day of December, 1917, the board of public works of said city served the defendant M. T. Shafer with a notice that there was at that time in the special fund devoted to the improvement" sufficient money and bonds to pay the contract price. Assuming that this is equivalent to a finding that the contractor received the notice, it is the position of the appellants that there is no evidence to support such finding. There is no contention by the respondent that the notice was served other than by mail to the address given by Mr. Shafer in his bid, which was submitted over six months before the mailing of the notice. It is contended, however, by the respondent that the deposit of the notice in the mail on the 22d day of December, 1917, together with the presumption of receipt provided for in subdivision 24 of section 1963, Code of Civil Procedure, is sufficient to prove its receipt. The presumption relied upon is: "That a letter duly directed and mailed was received in the regular course of mail." But before this presumption can arise it must be shown that the letter was duly directed. A letter is duly directed when it is addressed to the person intended at the city or town where he resides or has his place of business, or at the post office where he usually receives his mail. 22 Corpus Juris, § 39, and cases therein cited. There is no evidence that the place to which the envelope containing the notice was directed was the address of the defendant Shafer at the time of the mailing. On the contrary, the only evidence as to his post office address at that time was that of Shafer himself, who testified that he had moved to Exeter, Cal., in August, 1917, and that his post office address at the time of the mailing in question, to wit, December, 1917, was at that place.

There is authority to the effect that the presumption of receipt arises when the letter is addressed to a former address if it be shown that the addressee gave a forwarding address to the postal authorities, or that such authorities knew of the change of address. Marston v. Bigelow, 150 Mass. 45, 22 N. E. 71, 5 L. R. A. 43. But no such showing was here made. In the absence of such showing, certainly it may not be said that the letter was duly directed. The presumption, therefore, did not arise. The defendant Shafer testified that he did not receive the notice. Respondent comments on this testimony by saying that the trial court did not believe this testimony. But we are here dealing not with the question of whether the presumption has been overcome, but with the question of whether the presumption has arisen at all under the evidence. Our conclusion is that it has not.

It is further alleged in the complaint that—

"On the 22d day of December, 1917, the board of public works of said city notified the said defendant M. T. Shafer, under the provisions of section 20 of said act, that there was sufficient money in the hands of the city treasurer," etc.

This allegation was made apparently on the theory that, if the mailing of the notice without proof of receipt is insufficient under section 9 of the act, such mailing would be sufficient under section 20 of the act. That section provides that when sufficient money is on hand to pay the estimated damages, and all expenses and costs of doing the work—

"It shall be the duty of the superintendent of streets to notify the contractor for the work of that fact, and to draw demands on such special fund for the respective amounts of damages awarded by the report, and to notify the owner of each parcel of land declared by the report to be damaged, if the name of such owner is stated in the report, that the awards of damages are payable, and that he may receive the sum awarded him on executing a release to the city of all liability for damages caused by the improvement. Such notification may be given by depositing a notice, postage prepaid, in the post office, addressed to such person at his last known place of residence."

Respondent's contention is that the mailing of the notice to the "last known place of residence" permitted by this section applies to the notice to the contractor as well as to the notice to the property owners. There would be some force to this contention if this section stood alone, but, when this provision is read in connection with section 9, we conclude that it was intended to apply only to the notice to property owners, whose present addresses are usually widely separated and difficult to follow. Reading the two sections together there is no indication in any language used in section 20 of an intention to dispense with the requirement of receipt of notice by the contractor as specified in section 9.

The second contention of appellants is that there was no evidence to support the finding that the amount of the bond in question was agreed upon as liquidated damages in the event of a breach of the contract, and that it was impossible under the evidence to fix the actual damages sustained by reason of the alleged breach. The bond is to the effect that the principal and his surety are bound unto the city of Los Angeles in the sum of $1,125. The condition is that, if the principal shall faithfully perform all covenants, conditions and agreements of the contract, then the obligation to be void; otherwise to remain in full force and effect. If it be assumed that under some circumstances and an appropriate statute a bond in this form might be held to constitute an agreement for liquidated damages, we are again confronted with the particular statute under which the agreement was made, and which must be read into it and considered a part of it.

Section 9 further provides that "the legislative body must let the contract to the lowest responsible bidder, who shall give bond for the faithful performance of the work in such sum as may be required by it;" that if the contractor fails to proceed with the work the legislative body may relet the contract and "pay the cost of the same, and also any expenses incident to the reletting, out of the funds due, or to become due the contractor, and also hold him and his sureties responsible on his bond for such costs and expenses, and also any damages resulting from the abandonment." Under the statute the city is not authorized to agree on any sum as liquidated damages, but only to hold the contractor and his surety for "any damages resulting" from the breach. The statute contemplates that if any damages result they are ascertainable. If the Legislature intended that the obligation be one for liquidated damages or for a penalty or a forfeiture, it could have so provided. It is significant that in this same section 9 it is provided that the certified check required to be deposited with the clerk when the bid is submitted "shall be forfeited to the city" in case the bidder fails to enter into the contract awarded to him. Not so as to the faithful performance bond. As to it the section specifies that the recovery thereunder shall be for "any damages," in the sense, we think, of "whatever damages" resulted from the abandonment.

It was stipulated that the city levied the assessment, that it collected either money or bonds in sufficient amount to pay the awards of damages, the contract price, and the incidental expenses. It was also stipulated that upon the reletting of the contract a supplemental assessment was levied to cover the difference between the Shafer contract and the subsequent contract. It therefore appears that the property owners paid the entire cost of the proceeding through the original and the supplemental assessments, and that the city itself did not bear any of such cost. It is the position of the city, as expressed by its counsel at the trial, that, if the full amount of the bond cannot be recovered, no recovery is sought. It is urged that, although the city, as a corporation, is out nothing from a monetary standpoint, yet there is an unascertainable loss to the public of the use of the improved street because of the delay in the commencement and completion of the work.

In this connection the city produced witness Gibson who was asked if in his opinion it was possible to estimate the damages to the city of Los Angeles because of the failure of the original contractor to improve the street. The question was objected to on general grounds, and on the ground that it called for the conclusion of the witness. The court sustained the objection, and declared that this was not a question of fact, but a question of law under the statute. Thereafter the court found:

"That the city of Los Angeles and its inhabitants were deprived of the use of Oregon street as it was contemplated to be improved under and by virtue of said contract during the time that the contract was being relet and said supplemental assessment was being levied and collected; that it is impossible to fix the actual damages suffered or sustained by plaintiff by reason of the failure of said defendant M. T. Shafer to carry out the terms of said contract and to do the improvement work specified therein; and that by reason thereof the sum of $1,125 was agreed upon by the said plaintiff and the said defendants as liquidated damages for the breach of said contract."

We believe the court was in error in assuming that it was a question of law as to whether it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damages. In Consolidated Lumber Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 33 Cal. App. 698, 166 Pac. 385, it is said:

"Whether 'it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage' in a case in which the parties have attempted to agree upon the liquidated damages in advance, is a question of fact."

See, also, Thomas v. Anthony, 30 Cal. App. 217, 157 Pac. 823; Los Angeles Olive Growers' Ass'n v. Pacific Surety Co., 24 Cal. App. 95, 140 Pac. 295; McInerney v. Mack, 34 Cal. App. 153, 166 Pac. 867; Pacific Factor Co. v. Adler, 90 Cal. 110, 27 Pac. 36, 25 Am. St. Rep. 102; Long Beach City School District v. Dodge, 135 Cal. 401, 67 Pac. 499. In Consolidated Lumber Co. v. City of Los Angeles, supra, the general rule is also stated to the effect that the declaration of the parties in their contract that the actual damages would be difficult of ascertainment, and that the sum agreed upon should constitute liquidated damages, tends strongly to establish the fact required by the statute to exist. In the present case the plaintiff alleged that "it would be and was and is impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the breach of said contract," and "by reason of such impracticability or extreme difficulty of fixing such damages the sum of $1,125 was agreed upon by the said plaintiff and the above-named defendants as liquidated damages for the breach of said contract." These allegations were denied, but were found to be true notwithstanding the fact that neither the contract nor the bond so declared, and no evidence was admitted to support the allegations. There is therefore no support in the evidence for the findings complained of. Furthermore, there is no evidence in the record to show that the contractor to whom the contract was relet completed the work at a date later than the defendant Shafer could have done under the contract had he duly proceeded thereunder.

There is nothing in the statute or the contract or the bond to indicate that the parties had in mind an agreement for liquidated damages. In Re The Colombia (D. C.) 197 Fed. 661, it was said, quoting from Keeble v. Keeble, 85 Ala. 552, 5 South. 149:

"The courts are disposed to lean against any interpretation of a contract which will make it liquidated damages; and in all cases of doubtful intention will pronounce the stipulated sum a penalty."

Respondent contends that this rule should not be invoked as against a public corporation, and cites authority to the effect that a city should be favored in attempting to enforce a contract for liquidated damages in connection with public work. Brooks v. City of Wichita, 114 Fed. 297, 52 C. C. A. 209. But in that case the contract provided for the payment of a sum as liquidated damages, and not as a penalty. The intention of the parties was manifest. No good reason has been advanced why a public corporation of this state should be relieved under present law from the operation of sections 1670 and 1671 of the Civil Code.

The authorities cited by the respondent are not inconsistent with the authorities supporting the appellants' contention, or the conclusions herein expressed. The cases of Potter v. Ahrens, 110 Cal. 674, 43 Pac. 388, and Pogue v. Kaweah Power & Water Co., 138 Cal. 664, 72 Pac. 144, and earlier cases relied upon, were actions in which the parties agreed upon a sum which should constitute liquidated damages, or in which the court found from the peculiar circumstances surrounding the contract and the intention of the parties that the obligation was one for liquidated damages.

The determination of the two principal contentions of the appellants disposes of or renders unnecessary a discussion of other points suggested.

The judgment is reversed.

FINLAYSON, P. J., and CRAIG, J. We concur in the judgment of reversal on the ground that there is no evidence to support the finding that the sum named in the bond was agreed upon as liquidated damages. That instrument is a statutory undertaking, and should therefore be construed in the light of the statute, which declares that, if the contractor abandons the work or fails to proceed with it as rapidly as required by his contract, the city may hold him and his sureties responsible on the bond for the cost of any new contract that may be relet by it, for the expenses incurred in reletting the contract, and for "any damages resulting from such abandonment." St. 1913, pp. 959, 960. The damages thus referred to are actual damages, and the statute therefore contemplates the recovery of no more than the damages actually sustained, including the costs and expenses incurred in reletting the contract. It follows that the amount of the city's recovery must be measured by its actual damage; and since respondent failed to prove the amount of its actual damages, if any were sustained, there is no basis for the judgment.

STETSON v. SHEEHAN, Sheriff, et al.
(Civ. 3728.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 26, 1921. As Modified by Order of May 26, 1921, Denying Rehearing. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 25, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error § 437—Appeal by plaintiff from insufficient judgment does not affect lien.

Code Civ. Proc. § 949, did not have the effect of staying proceedings on a money judgment, so as to either deprive plaintiff of the benefit of his lien acquired by the docketing of the judgment on property of the judgment debtor, or to deprive him of the right to file for record a transcript of the docket in another county, under section 674, although he was appealing from the judgment because he deemed it inadequate in amount.

2. Appeal and error § 460(1)—Plaintiff entitled to redeem from money judgment, notwithstanding appeal.

Where plaintiff obtained a money judgment, and appealed, without executing undertaking under Code Civ. Proc. § 671, deeming judgment inadequate in amount, and pending the appeal filed a transcript of the judgment in another county, under section 674, he was entitled to exercise the rights of a redemptioner accorded under section 701, as regarded land of judgment debtor sold under execution in another suit.

3. Judgment 780(4)—Transcript filed after execution sale gave judgment creditor lien on right to redeem.

Where transcript of money judgment obtained in another county was filed after land of judgment debtor had been sold under execution in another action, a lien attached to the judgment debtor's right to redeem, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 671, 674.

4. Appeal and error 1177(1)—New trial unnecessary, in view of stipulation in trial court.

Where parties in trial court stipulated that, in event court found that a redemption from execution sale was duly made under an agreed statement of facts, the plaintiff should be entitled to a judgment for a certain sum, and not the land, and trial court found that there was no redemption, the appellate court, on finding on defendant's appeal that there was a redemption under the agreed statement of facts, will not order a new trial, but will reverse and remand, with directions to enter judgment for defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Harry N. Stetson against M. Sheehan, as Sheriff, etc., and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court, 200 Pac. 392.

J. J. Lermen, of San Francisco, and Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for appellants.

Thos. C. Jordan and Wright, Wright & Stetson, all of San Francisco, and A. Kincaid, of Redwood City, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action was submitted to the trial court upon an agreed statement of facts, of which the following is a brief, but sufficient, summary:

On or about January 11, 1918, in an action pending in the county of San Mateo, wherein George O. Rich was plaintiff and Micajah Cross and Moss Beach Realty Company, a corporation, were defendants, a judgment was made and entered in favor of said plaintiff for the recovery against the defendants of the sum of $1,025.94. Thereafter, and on January 14, 1918, an execution duly issued upon such judgment, and was delivered to the sheriff of said county, who proceeded to make a levy thereunder upon certain real estate then belonging to the said Moss Beach Realty Company within said county, and thereafter, and on February 18, 1918, an execution sale was had under said writ and the levy thereof, at which said sale the right, title, and interest of the said Moss Beach Realty Company in said property so levied upon was sold to one Thomas C. Jordan as the highest and best bidder therefor, who thereupon paid to the said officer conducting said sale the sum of $1,080 in cash, being the whole amount of said judgment, with accrued costs, and thereupon, and on February 18, 1918, a certificate of sale of said property was duly issued to such purchaser and filed for record in the office of the county recorder of said county. Thereafter, and on February 20, 1918, said Thomas C. Jordan transferred said certificate of sale and all of his rights in said property acquired thereunder, to Harry N. Stetson, the respondent in the present case. Thereafter said George O. Rich commenced another action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against the said Moss Beach Realty Company to recover certain sums of money alleged to be due as commissions upon the sale of certain properties of said corporation, in which action a judgment was made and entered on September 20, 1918, in favor of said George O. Rich for the sum of $311.43 and costs. Thereafter, and on November 18, 1918, the said plaintiff therein, George O. Rich, being dissatisfied with the amount of said judgment in his favor, took an appeal therefrom and from the whole thereof to the Supreme Court by the alternative method provided for taking appeals, filing no bond of any kind upon such appeal. This appeal was transferred by the Supreme Court to Division 2 of this court, where it was still pending and undetermined at the time of the institution, trial, and appeal of the present case.

After having taken and perfected said appeal, and on February 17, 1919, the said George O. Rich procured from the clerk of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco a certified transcript of the original docket of the said judgment, which transcript he caused to be filed with the recorder of the county of San Mateo, and having so done he proceeded to give written notice of redemption of the property of the said Moss Beach Realty Company sold to said Thomas C. Jordan under said former judgment and execution sale, at the same time paying to the sheriff the sum required to consummate said redemption, and otherwise doing all of the acts required by the statute effectuate such redemption. Thereafter, and after the expiration of the time for any further redemption of said property, and on or about April 23, 1919, the said sheriff, upon his demand therefor, made, executed, and delivered to said George O. Rich, as such redemptioner, his sheriff's deed, wherein he attempted to convey to said George O. Rich all of the right, title, and interest of the Moss Beach

Realty Company in and to said property affected by such redemptions; and thereafter, and on the same date, the said George O. Rich and Mary A. Rich, his wife, made, executed, and delivered to one Hall C. Ross their deed to said premises, which deed said Hall C. Ross received and took with full knowledge of all of the matters and proceedings whereby the said George O. Rich had acquired whatever right, title, and interest he undertook to convey by said deed. Thereafter, and on May 13, 1919, plaintiff herein, Harry N. Stetson, as the transferee and successor in interest of said Thomas C. Jordan, the original purchaser at said execution sale, commenced the present action against said Sheehan, as the sheriff as aforesaid, and also against George O. Rich and Mary A. Rich, his wife, and Hall C. Ross, the grantee under their aforesaid deed, wherein said plaintiff sought to have a decree entered compelling said sheriff to execute and deliver to him a deed to the premises in question under said original execution sale, and to further have it declared that said George O. Rich and his said wife, and also their said grantee, Hall C. Ross, had no right, title, interest, or estate in said property, and to have the aforesaid attempted redemption of said property by said George O. Rich canceled, and all subsequent acts done by him thereunder declared null and void.

This case came to trial upon an agreed statement of facts, of which the foregoing is a summary, at the conclusion of which the trial court adopted the said agreed statement of facts as its findings of fact, and as its conclusions of law based thereon found that—

"The defendant Rich having appealed from the San Francisco judgment, the transcript of the original docket of that judgment before the appeal was determined gave him no rights; hence judgment will be entered for plaintiff as per stipulation herein."

The judgment followed in practically the form of the prayer of the complaint, adjudging the attempted redemption of the premises in question by said Rich to have been ineffectual, and the sheriff's deed to him to have been void, and hence also his conveyance of the premises to said Ross, and directing the said sheriff to execute a deed of said property to the plaintiff, Stetson, as the successor in interest of said Thomas C. Jordan, the original purchaser of the premises at said execution sale. The defendants have prosecuted this appeal from said judgment.

Two questions are presented and discussed upon this appeal. The first of these is as to whether said George O. Rich, as the plaintiff and judgment creditor in the case of George O. Rich v. Beach Realty Co., in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, having himself taken and prosecuted an appeal from such judgment, was entitled to have issued to him while said appeal was pending the certified transcript of the docket of said judgment, and was entitled to file the same for record in the county of San Mateo. It is the contention of the respondent herein that the effect of the appeal of Rich from said judgment was to create a stay of proceedings upon such judgment, within the meaning and effect of section 949 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that, this being so, the said plaintiff and appellant Rich in that case was not entitled to have issued to him the transcript of the docket of said judgment for record in the county of San Mateo under section 674 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and hence that he acquired no rights as a redeeming judgment creditor by virtue of the issuance and recordation of said transcript of the docket of said judgment in the county of San Mateo.

[1] Upon this first question we are of the opinion that the appeal taken by the plaintiff Rich from the said judgment in his favor cannot be held to have had the effect of staying proceedings upon said judgment, so as either to deprive him of the benefit of his lien acquired by the docketing of said judgment upon any property which the defendant Moss Beach Realty Company might have had in the city and county of San Francisco, or to deprive him of the right to file for record a transcript of said docket in the county of San Mateo, and by so doing acquire the lien of a judgment creditor upon any interest in real property which the said judgment debtor might have in the latter county. We are led to this conclusion by the language of the Supreme Court in the case of Halsted v. First Savings Bank, 173 Cal. 608, 160 Pac. 1075, wherein the court, in construing section 949 of the Code of Civil Procedure in its application to the facts of that case, said:

"The stay given by the statute in the event of appeal is effectual only as to the judgment in so far as it affects the appellant, requires him to do something, or permits something to be done as to him."

Clearly the plaintiff, appealing from a money judgment in his favor which he deems inadequate in amount, could have no intent or desire to stay the operation of and proceedings under said judgment in so far as the same was in his favor; nor, on the other hand, could the judgment debtor be entitled to the benefits of a stay of proceedings upon a judgment as to the amount and effect of which it was so far satisfied as to have taken no appeal on its part.

The case of In re Schedel, 69 Cal. 241, 10 Pac. 334, and the later cases of like import, relied upon by the respondent, do not fit the situation presented in the instant case, since in each of those cases the appellant needed the benefit of a stay of proceedings to prevent the injurious operation of the judgment or order appealed from against his interests pending the appeal. But that is not this case; and it would seem that the only penalty which a plaintiff appealing from a money judgment in his favor might be put to in the event of his seeking to enforce said judgment pending his appeal would be that of having his appeal dismissed upon the ground that he had waived the same by accepting or seizing upon the benefits of said judgment. This ground would not be available for obvious reasons to the respondent here.

[2] We think the foregoing conclusion is correct for another reason. The apparent intent and purpose of section 674 of the Code of Civil Procedure was to enable a judgment creditor to acquire a like judgment lien upon the real property of a judgment debtor in another county to that acquired by him upon the real property of the judgment debtor in the county in which his judgment was obtained and docketed. Under section 671 of the Code of Civil Procedure, when a judgment is docketed in the county in which it is obtained, it becomes a lien upon all the real property of the judgment debtor owned by him at the time or which he may afterward acquire in said county until the lien ceases. This lien, by the express terms of that section, "continues for five years, unless the enforcement of the judgment be stayed on appeal by the execution of a sufficient undertaking as provided in this Code, in which case the lien of the judgment and any lien by virtue of an attachment that has been issued and levied in the action ceases." It would seem clear that the lien of a judgment creditor appealing from a money judgment in his favor would not cease to exist upon the taking and perfecting by him of an appeal, and that, if it did so exist, he would be entitled to exercise the rights of a redemptioner accorded him under section 701 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and if under such circumstances he would have such right, it would follow that he would have the further right to record his judgment in another county and acquire the like lien of a judgment creditor and right of a redemptioner therein.

Upon the first point in this case we are therefore of the opinion that the plaintiff Rich in said former action was entitled, notwithstanding the pendency of his appeal therein, to apply for and have issued to him a transcript of the docket of his judgment therein for the recordation in the county of San Mateo, and was entitled to have the same filed for record in said county for whatever statutory benefits might accrue to him by virtue of said acts.

[3] The remaining question presented upon this appeal has reference to whatever rights as a judgment creditor of the Moss Beach Realty Company said George O. Rich acquired by said recordation of the transcript of his judgment in San Mateo county with relation to the property of said corporation in said county which had already been sold under execution to the predecessor in interest of the plaintiff herein. It is the contention of the respondent herein that said Rich did not become invested with any right to redeem said property from said prior execution sale by the doing of the aforesaid acts. This contention is based, in part, at least, upon the respondent's construction of the provisions of section 674 of the Code of Civil Procedure having relation to the effect of the filing for record of the transcript of a judgment in a county wherein the judgment creditor has an interest in real property. That section reads as follows:

"The transcript of the original docket of any judgment, the enforcement of which has not been stayed on appeal, certified by the clerk, may be filed with the recorder of any other county, and from such filing the judgment becomes a lien upon all the real property of the judgment debtor not exempt from execution in such county, owned by him at the time, or which he may afterward, and before the lien expires, acquire. The lien continues for two years unless the judgment is previously satisfied or the lien otherwise discharged."

Respondent herein argues that the judgment so filed for record under the terms of the above section becomes thereby a lien upon the real property of the judgment debtor which is "owned by him at the time or which he may afterward and before the lien expires acquire," and that in the instant case the judgment debtor did not own the real estate to which it is sought to have said judgment lien attach for the reason that all of the said judgment debtor's right, title, and interest in said property had been theretofore sold at said execution sale.

We think that this is altogether too narrow a construction to place upon the provisions of the above-quoted section of the Code in so far as they purport to create a lien upon the real property or an interest therein of a judgment debtor. The same precise language is employed in section 671, Code of Civil Procedure, in relation generally to judgment liens, and to hold that a judgment creditor, filing his transcript of judgment in another county, did not thereby acquire a lien upon such of the real property of the judgment debtor as had theretofore been sold at an execution sale, but which was still subject to redemption, would be to hold in effect that no judgment creditor having such subsequent judgment could acquire such a lien or become a redemptioner of property which had been subjected to such prior execution sale but which was still open to redemption. To so hold would be to nullify the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 701 relating to the redemption of real property from execution sale, which section reads as follows:

"Property sold subject to redemption, as provided in the last section, or any part sold separately, may be redeemed in the manner hereinafter provided, by the following persons, or their successors in interest: (1) The judgment debtor, or his successor in interest, in the whole or any part of the property; (2) a creditor having a lien by judgment or mortgage on the property sold, or on some share or part thereof, subsequent to that on which the property was sold. The persons mentioned in the second subdivision of this section are, in this chapter, termed redemptioners."

We are cited to a number of cases by respondent as to the effect of execution sales in relation to the interest of the judgment debtor acquired by the purchaser at such sale. It is not necessary to review in detail these cases, since none of them go to the extent of holding that, notwithstanding the sale under execution of the real property of a judgment debtor, such judgment debtor does not retain during the redemption period such an interest in said property as may be subjected to the lien of a subsequent judgment creditor who may become a redemptioner under the express terms of section 701 of the Code of Civil Procedure. On the other hand, the Supreme Court has in numerous cases expressly recognized the rights of judgment creditors becoming such after execution sales to redeem the property of the judgment debtor from such sales. The following are some of these cases: Bennett v. Wilson, 122 Cal. 509, 55 Pac. 390, 68 Am. St. Rep. 61; Id., 133 Cal. 379, 65 Pac. 880, 85 Am. St. Rep. 207; Woods v. Kellerman, 3 Cal. App. 422, 89 Pac. 358; McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 365, 70 Am. Dec. 655. In the case last above cited Mr. Justice Field, in discussing the origin and effect of section 230 of the Practice Act (which has been retained in precise terms in section 701, Code of Civil Procedure), shows its derivation from the New York Code, and also shows by a uniform current of authority in that state that a junior judgment creditor, becoming such subsequent to the creation of the lien upon which the real property of the judgment debtor has been sold upon execution, has the right to redeem the property from such execution sale.

We do not think that any change in the statute with respect to the interest of the judgment debtor passing after such execution sale was ever intended to take away this right of redemption in junior judgment creditors which has so long obtained, and which would seem to have been expressly reserved in the retention of section 230 of the Practice Act in its ancient origin and precise form in section 701, Code of Civil Procedure. It is our conclusion, therefore, that the junior judgment creditor, Rich, had the right to redeem the property in question from said execution sale. It is conceded that he took all of the proper statutory steps to exercise that right and that there was no other redemption. It follows that he had a right to demand and receive from the sheriff the deed to the premises which was issued to him, and hence that the conveyance thereof by himself and wife to Ross operated to transfer all of the right, title, and interest acquired by him under such redemption and sheriff's deed to the grantee; and it results as a necessary conclusion that the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief which was accorded him by the judgment in his favor herein upon the record as it was made up at the time of the entry of such judgment and of the appeal therefrom.

[4] By stipulation of the parties, the agreed statement of facts was accepted and adopted by the trial court. The appeal is from the judgment. Consequently it is unnecessary to order a new trial. City of Eureka v. McKay, 123 Cal. 666-673, 56 Pac. 439; Perkins v. Cowles, 157 Cal. 625-627, 108 Pac. 711, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 283. The parties stipulated that, in the event the court found that a redemption was duly made by Rich, the plaintiff should be entitled to judgment for the sum of $1,209.60, the amount of the redemption money paid by Rich for that purpose and no more. Consequently, upon the determination of this court that Rich was entitled to, and did, redeem the property, appellants are entitled to have judgment entered in accord with the stipulation.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to the lower court to enter judgment, upon the agreed statement of facts in conformity with the views expressed in this opinion.

STETSON v. SHEEHAN, Sheriff, et al.
(S. F. 9534.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 23, 1921.)

Appeal and error $\Leftrightarrow$ 833(3)—Modification by appellate court of judgment held to extend time for petition for hearing in Supreme Court.

A modification by the District Court of Appeal of a judgment which merely reversed the judgment of the trial court, so that the judgment of the trial court was reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for appellants without new trial, extended the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to grant a petition for hearing for 30 days thereafter, although such would not be true of a modification of the opinion which did not affect the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Harry N. Stetson against M. Sheehan, as Sheriff, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appealed. Reversed, and cause remanded by the District Court of Appeal (200 Pac. 387) and plaintiff petitions for a hearing. Petition held duly filed.

J. J. Lermen, of San Francisco, and Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for appellants.

Thos. C. Jordan and Wright, Wright & Stetson, all of San Francisco, and A. Kincaid, of Redwood City, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. A petition for hearing in this court, after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division One, was filed herein on June 4, 1921, on the theory that the judgment of the District Court of Appeal was given on April 26, 1921. The judgment of April 26, 1921, of the District Court of Appeal, was, however, modified by that court on May 26, 1921, with the result that the judgment of the District Court of Appeal in the matter, as finally given, was given on May 26, 1921, and does not become final in that court until 30 days thereafter, viz. on June 25, 1921, and the jurisdiction of this court to grant a petition for hearing herein continues for 30 days thereafter, viz. to and including July 25, 1921.

A different situation would be presented if the modification by the District Court of Appeal had been solely with regard to its opinion. Such a modification would not have affected the judgment, which would in that event have become final in that court on May 26, 1921, with the power in this court to grant a hearing within 30 days thereafter. See National Bank of California v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 2 Cal. App. 659, 663, 84 Pac. 466, 468.

The petition for a hearing filed herein June

4, 1921, will be considered as duly filed herein, and will be acted upon prior to the expiration of the time within which it may be considered by this court, viz. on or before July 25, 1921.¹

WAKABASHI v. STAFFORD PACKING CO.

Chattel mortgages $\Leftrightarrow$ 110—Payments by mortgagee for fish purchased from mortgagor held not advancements.

Even if the taking possession of the property under a chattel mortgage securing the debt and future advancements without foreclosure of the mortgage canceled the liability of mortgagor for the debt and advancements, the amounts paid by mortgagee after the mortgagor had begun delivering fish to it were merely payments on the purchase price of the fish, and not advancements, so that the mortgagor or his assignee cannot recover such purchase price, where such payments exceeded the price.

Action by N. S. Wakabashi against the Stafford Packing Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

S. C. Schaefer, of San Pedro, for appellant.
Henry Stieglitz, of San Pedro, and W. A. Alderson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover the sum of $990 for fish delivered by his assignor, Harry T. Yoshida, to the defendant. Yoshida was a fisherman and the defendant a canning company. An arrangement was made between them by which the defendant paid off an indebtedness upon a fishing motor boat named Roma and took a chattel mortgage to secure the amount thus advanced, amounting to the sum of $2,340.38. This chattel mortgage also provided that it was security for future advances to be made by the defendant to Yoshida. A fishing agreement was entered into between Yoshida and the defendant, in addition to the chattel mortgage and note. During the fishing season Yoshida delivered $482.37 worth of fish. During that same period defendant paid out on account of Yoshida $1,492.83, or more than $1,000 in excess of the value of the fish delivered to defendant by Yoshida. Thereafter defendant took possession of the boat. It was stipulated that the assignment to the plaintiff was merely for the purposes of collection and that the plaintiff is for that purpose the agent of Yoshida.

The chattel mortgage provided that upon default the mortgagee might take possession of the motor boat and would thereupon become vested with absolute title thereto and the mortgagors' indebtedness thereby be fully paid. This portion of the mortgage was clearly void. Civ. Code, § 2889. But it was apparently treated by the parties and by the court as valid. The defendant by counterclaim set up the indebtedness from Yoshida to the defendant of $1,492.83, and also by cross-complaint, to which Yoshida was made a party defendant, sought to foreclose the chattel mortgage; but upon the trial announced to the court that inasmuch as it had treated the mortgaged property as its own and in full satisfaction for the balance of indebtedness due it, no foreclosure should be had of the mortgage. Yoshida does not appeal from that portion of the judgment which exonerated him from the mortgage indebtedness, but his agent appeals from that portion of the judgment which denied judgment for the fish delivered by him. The theory of the plaintiff is that the seizure of the vessel and its appropriation by the defendant operated to pay the entire indebtedness, which included not only the original amount advanced and evidenced by the promissory note thereby secured, but also was a satisfaction of all subsequent advancements and therefore of the total advancement of $1,492.83, thus leaving the amount of $482.37 still due and owing from the defendant to Yoshida and by assignment to the plaintiff. The defendant kept an account on its books with Yoshida. This account showed that in July Yoshida delivered $315.09 worth of fish; in August, $135.13 worth; in September, $12.15 worth; and in October, $20 worth—total, $482.37. During this same period the defendant paid out upon the order of and for the account of Yoshida $1,492.83. All payments made previous to the delivery of fish might be considered as advancements within the meaning of the mortgage, but payments made subsequently on the order and for the account of Yoshida would in effect be payments for the fish delivered by Yoshida. Yoshida was simply credited upon the general account with the amount of fish delivered and debited with the amounts subsequently paid out for and on his account. These two amounts offset each other, with $1,010.46 balance in favor of the defendant.

While very meager portions of the record are printed in the briefs, we have examined the entire typewritten transcript and are satisfied therefrom that the appellant is not aggrieved by the judgment and that there has been no miscarriage of justice.

A motion to dismiss the appeal was made by the respondent on the ground that the notice was insufficient by reason of the failure to give proper notice that an appeal was taken. There is no merit in this motion. The notice conforms to that held sufficient in Estate of Faber, 168 Cal. 491, 143 Pac. 737. No point is made of the fact that Yoshida does not appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

SAN DIEGO TUBERCULOSIS ASS'N v. CITY OF EAST SAN DIEGO et al.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨625—Ordinance, prohibiting hospital for contagious and infectious diseases, unreasonable.

An ordinance, prohibiting maintenance anywhere in the city of any hospital for treatment of contagious or infectious diseases, is wholly unreasonable, and so not justified as an exercise of the police power.

2. Injunction ⇨105(2)—Enforcement by prosecution of invalid ordinance against hospitals restrained.

Enforcement by threatened repeated prosecutions of invalid city ordinance against maintenance of a hospital for tuberculosis will be enjoined, as they would cause substantial and irreparable injury, and there is no adequate remedy in the ordinary course.

Action by the San Diego Tuberculosis Association against the City of East San Diego and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. Jefferson Davis, of San Diego, for appellant.

Arthur T. French, of San Diego, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment rendered against it upon the sustaining of a demurrer to its complaint. The sole question in the case is as to whether or not the facts stated in the complaint make out a cause of action. The facts are:

The plaintiff is a corporation formed for benevolent purposes, and has for some years owned and operated a hospital for the treatment of those afflicted with tuberculosis. The hospital is located in the city of East San Diego, a small municipality adjoining the city of San Diego proper, and the defendants are the municipality and certain of its officials. On July 8, 1919, the city trustees passed an ordinance, declaring every hospital for the treatment of persons afflicted with contagious or infectious diseases to be a nuisance, making the maintenance of any such hospital within the limits of the city a misdemeanor, making its maintenance a separate offense for each day it was maintained, and providing for punishment by fine or imprisonment for every offense. After the passage of the ordinance, the city authorities commenced a series of criminal prosecutions against the plaintiff, and threatened to arrest and prosecute its officers and employees and to keep on arresting and prosecuting them until the plaintiff should be compelled to close the hospital. Upon the grounds that the ordinance is invalid and that the plaintiff would be irreparably injured in its property right to maintain and conduct the hospital and had no other adequate means of relief, an injunction was asked enjoining the defendants from attempting to enforce the ordinance.

[1] Two questions are presented: First, is the ordinance invalid? and, second, even if it is, can its enforcement by the city officials be enjoined? The answer to both of these questions seems to us plain.

The ordinance can be justified only as an exercise of the city's police power. This power is, of course, very broad, but it is not without limitation. One limitation enforced in numerous cases is that an ordinance purporting to be an exercise of the city's police power "may not be arbitrary or unreasonable. The exercise of the police power cannot be made a mere cloak for the arbitrary interference with or suppression of a lawful business." Laurel Hill Cemetery v. San Francisco, 152 Cal. 464, 93 Pac. 70. See, also, Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 32 Pac. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152; Los Angeles County v. Hollywood Cemetery Association, 124 Cal. 344, 57 Pac. 153, 71 Am. St. Rep. 75; In re Smith, 143 Cal. 368, 77 Pac. 180; Abbey Land Co. v. San Mateo, 167 Cal. 434, 139 Pac. 1068, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 408, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 804; Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 14 Sup. Ct. 499, 38 L. Ed. 385; Holden v. Hardy, 169 U. S. 366, 18 Sup. Ct. 383, 42 L. Ed. 780.

Such being the law, was the present ordinance a reasonable one in its essential feature, that of prohibiting within the city any hospital for the treatment of contagious or infectious diseases? Such prohibition is very different from regulation, and can be justified only on the ground that such a hospital, no matter how well conducted, is a menace to the public peace, morals, health, or comfort. That a well-conducted, modern hospital, even one for the treatment of contagious and infectious diseases, is not such a menace, but, on the contrary, one of the most beneficent of institutions needs no argument. There is not the slightest danger of the spread of disease from it, and this is the only possible ground on which objection could be made to it. We have no hesitation in holding an ordinance prohibiting the maintenance anywhere within a city of an institution so necessary in our modern life and so beneficent to be wholly unreasonable and invalid. For closely analogous cases see Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 32 Pac. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152, and Abbey Land Co. v. San Mateo, 167 Cal. 434, 139 Pac. 1068, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 408, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 804.

"The doctrine that an action will lie to enjoin the enforcement of an [invalid] municipal ordinance in cases where such enforcement will cause substantial and irreparable injury to private property or private property rights, and in which there is no adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law, is now too well settled to require discussion. The doctrine is stated and the cases supporting it are cited in 2 McQuillin on Municipal Corporations, § 805. See, also, Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 241, 49 L. Ed. 169, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 18; Davis, etc., Co. v. Los Angeles, 189 U. S. 218, 47 L. Ed. 778, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 498; Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 146, 14 Ann. Cas. 764, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 932, 52 L. Ed. 714, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 441; Philadelphia v. Stimson, 223 U. S. 621, 56 L. Ed. 570, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 340; Savage v. Jones, 225 U. S. 521, 56 L. Ed. 1182, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 715."

It is evident in the present case that the enforcement of the ordinance would cause substantial and irreparable injury to the plaintiff's property, and that against the threat of its enforcement by the repeated prosecutions which the ordinance permits the plaintiff has no adequate remedy. The case, therefore, comes within the rule stated in Abbey Land Co. v. San Mateo, and upon the facts alleged in the complaint the plaintiff was entitled to have the enforcement of the ordinance enjoined.

Judgment reversed.

CITY OF OAKLAND v. GREAT WESTERN POWER CO. (two cases.)
(S. F. 9274, 9275.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 28, 1921.)

1. Electricity ⚡—4—Constitutional franchise not invalidated by acceptance of franchise from city.

Where an electric company furnished electricity for lighting under a constitutional franchise under Const. art. 11, § 19, it did not surrender that franchise by becoming a bidder for and accepting a franchise under Oakland City Charter, art. 20, and a provision of the latter franchise for payment to the city of a percentage of the gross receipts is invalid as far as concerns revenues from electricity furnished for lighting purposes.

2. Electricity ⚡—4—Acceptance of a franchise from a city held not to invalidate a prior franchise.

The acceptance of a franchise to furnish electricity for heat and power, sold to the highest bidder, under Oakland City Charter, did not invalidate a former franchise granted the same company under St. 1905, p. 777, so as to require payment of the percentage of the receipts prescribed in the later franchise.

3. Electricity ⚡—10—Franchise payments held not payable on electrical energy delivered outside city limits, though meter within city; "delivery."

Where an electric company was bound by its franchise to pay a percentage of its receipts on all electrical energy sold within the city limits, the city cannot collect for energy delivered to a corporation outside the city limits, even if the meters are within the limits, since "delivery" takes place at the junction of the wires of the customer and of the wires of the seller and not at the meter.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Deliver—Delivery.]

4. Electricity ⚡—10—Franchise held not to apply to electrical energy redelivered within the city by customer outside the city limits.

Where, by franchise, the city was to get a certain percentage on sale of electrical energy within the city limits, the fact that a customer of the franchise owner outside the city limits redelivered electrical energy for use within the city limits does not authorize the city to collect a percentage on the energy so redelivered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

Action by the City of Oakland against Great Western Power Company, a corporation. From judgment partly in favor of plaintiff and partly in favor of defendant, both plaintiff and defendant appeal. Reversed, with instructions.

H. L. Hagan, City Atty., and John Jewett Earle, Asst. City Atty., both of Oakland, for appellant.

Guy C. Earl and W. H. Spaulding, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. We adopt as correct the statement of facts and of the issues prepared by Mr. Justice Richards in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, First District, First Division, as follows:

"This action was instituted by the city of Oakland to recover from the Great Western Power Company, a public service corporation, certain moneys alleged to be due the plaintiff under and by virtue of a certain franchise awarded by it to the defendant in the year 1913, after due proceedings for its advertisement and sale. Under the terms of said franchise the defendant was permitted to occupy and use the streets of said municipality for the transmission and distribution of electricity for furnishing light, heat, and power, and for any and all other uses to which electricity may or can be put; and said franchise provided that for the exercise of the rights and privileges granted thereunder the grantee thereof was to pay to the grantor certain graduated percentages of its gross annual receipts resulting from the sale of electricity under said franchise and during the life thereof within the limits of the municipality.

"Upon the trial of the action, certain stipulations were entered into between the parties as to the specific quantities of electric energy involved during the period covered by the plaintiff's claim for light and heat and power respectively; and also as to the gross annual receipts of the defendant from the sale of these respective forms of electric energy, which stipulations remove these matters from controversy. The issues in dispute between the parties were thus narrowed to the question as to how much of the entire gross annual receipts of the defendant from its sales of electric energy in these several forms within said municipality was received by it for electricity distributed by it under said franchise, and upon which it was bound to pay the percentages to recover which this action was brought.

"The claim of the defendant with respect to this question was at the trial, and is here, that a large portion of its gross annual receipts were derived by it under and by virtue of its possession of certain earlier franchises for the distribution of electricity within said city, which did not provide for the payment of the percentage which the plaintiff here sought to recover; and the defendant made and makes the further claim that as to a certain quantum of electricity sold by it to a particular customer it was not sold or delivered within said city, and hence upon that particular transaction no percentages were due.

"These claims on the part of said defendant were based upon the following facts: In the year 1908, the defendant having been organized as a corporation for the purpose of the distribution of electric energy * * * [installed] a distributing system for the purpose of furnishing electric light to the said city and its inhabitants by virtue of its right to do so under the provisions of section 19 of article 11 of the state Constitution, and, having installed such system, proceeded to furnish said city and its people electricity for lighting purposes under its said constitutional franchise; in the year 1909 the said defendant applied to said municipality for a further franchise for the supply and sale of electric energy in the forms of heat and power within its limits. This application was made under the so-called Broughton Act (Stats. 1905, p. 777), which expressly provided for the granting by municipalities of franchises for the distribution of electric energy for heat and power; and the same was granted by said city. The franchise thereupon issued provided, in accordance with the terms of said act as it read at the time of said grant, that work under the franchise must be completed within 3 years. * * * The term of this franchise was 50 years, and it provided for the payment by its grantees of 2 per cent. of the gross annual receipts derived under its exercise, commencing five years after the date of the franchise and continuing at said rate thereafter during its life. The defendant began operations under this franchise, using in the main the same distributing system employed by it under its constitutional franchise for furnishing light within said city. In the year 1911 section 19 of article 11 of the state Constitution was so amended as to eliminate the so-called constitutional franchise provision thereof, and to commit to municipalities the power to establish and operate their own public works for supplying light, water, power, heat, etc., to their inhabitants, or of granting franchises to private persons or corporations so to do under such conditions as might be prescribed in their organic law. Following this amendment to the Constitution the serious question arose as to whether the constitutional franchise or privilege, which was in the course of exercise by many public service corporations in most of the municipalities of this state, had not been thereby terminated, at least in so far as any future extension of their distributing systems established and in use thereunder was concerned. This controversy came before the Supreme Court of this state in the Matter of Russell, on Habeas Corpus, 163 Cal. 668, 126 Pac. 875, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 152, wherein it was decided that the constitutional privilege to occupy the streets of municipalities, exercised under the provisions of the original section of the Constitution, could not be held to cover or permit extensions of a distributing system in operation thereunder after said amendment, and to streets not occupied and used for such purposes prior to the taking effect of such amendment. The decision of our Supreme Court to this effect was handed down in September, 1912. The matter was thereupon taken before the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of error for final determination, and was determined by it in the case entitled Russell v. Sebastian, 233 U. S. 195, 34 Sup. Ct. 517, 58 L. Ed. 712, L. R. A. 1918E, 882, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1282, decided April 6, 1914, in which decision the latter court disapproved the conclusion of the Supreme Court of this state, and in so doing decided that the amendment to the Constitution of California above referred to, and the ordinance of the city of Los Angeles passed subsequent thereto, could not be permitted to in any wise impair constitutional franchises in course of exercise prior to such amendment, and under which the holders thereof were entitled to hold, maintain, and extend their distributing system established and in operation prior to such amendment.

"The trial court in the instant case took cognizance of the matters involved in these two decisions, and made an express finding to the effect that during the pendency of the Matter of Russell in the Supreme Court of this state and in the Supreme Court of the United States during the years 1912, 1913, and 1914, the defendant herein took an active part in the presentation of said matter on behalf of said Russell and with a view to having his contentions sustained. By this finding the trial court placed the defendant herein in the attitude, during the years above mentioned, of actively and strenuously contending for the full validity of its constitutional privilege or franchise for supplying electric light to the city of Oakland and its inhabitants which it had been exercising prior to said amendment to the Constitution, and of its full right to make extensions of its distributing system within said city for lighting purposes under said franchise and notwithstanding said amendment. The significance of this finding of the trial court consists in the fact that during the year 1913, and specifically upon the 22d day of March of that year, the said defendant made and filed an application before the city council of the city of Oakland, expressing the desire of the defendant to acquire a municipal franchise from said city for the transmission and supply of electricity for use in the forms of light, heat, and power, and for all other uses to which electricity may or can be put, and for the erection, construction, and maintenance and operation of such a distributing system within said city as would enable it so to do; and said defendant in its said application requested said official body to take such legal steps as would be proper to enable the applicant to acquire such franchise. This application was accompanied with a form of ordinance suggested for adoption, embodying the form of the desired franchise, and providing for such advertisement and sale thereof as was required by law. The city council of said city acted upon said application favorably by adopting the proper ordinance for the advertisement and sale of said franchise substantially in the form suggested by the defendant, and said franchise was thereafter duly offered for sale. The only bidder therefor was the defendant, and its bid conformed to the terms of the proposed franchise in respect to the percentages of gross annual receipts of the successful bidder therefor arising from its exercise. On the 8th day of June, 1913, the said city council, by an ordinance regularly adopted, duly awarded to the defendant said franchise, and the said defendant then and there duly accepted and received and has ever since possessed and owned the same.

"The trial court, having found substantially the foregoing facts, made and filed its conclusions of law thereon, and in so doing held in effect as follows: As to the gross annual receipts of the defendant derived through its distributing system from the sale and supply of electric light to the city of Oakland and its inhabitants, the court held that these receipts of the defendant were derived by it through its ownership, possession, and exercise of its constitutional right, privilege, or franchise for supplying electric light to said city and its people, and that constitutional right, privilege, or franchise was not waived or surrendered or withdrawn by said defendant through its application for or by the grant to it of the municipal franchise of 1913; and hence that none of said gross annual receipts of the defendant derived from the sale and supply of light to said city or its people were derived from or through the exercise of said last-named franchise, and that the city of Oakland, the plaintiff herein, was therefore not entitled to collect or receive any portion of defendant's annual receipts derived from its sale and supply of electric light within said city. The trial court further held that as to the municipal franchise for the sale and supply of electric energy in the form of heat and power granted to said defendant by said city on the 25th day of October, 1909, and under which it had thereafter engaged in such sale and supply of electric heat and power in said city, the said exercise of such franchise and its operation thereunder ceased by virtue of the grant to an exercise by said defendant of the franchise sold and granted to it on the 9th day of June, 1913, and that said defendant had not since said last-named date sold or delivered any electric energy for heat and power within said city under said franchise of 1909, but that all of its sales and deliveries of electric heat and power within said city had been made under and by virtue of the franchise of June 9, 1913, and that all of the defendant's gross annual receipts derived from the sale and supply of heat and power within said city were received by it under and by virtue of the exercise of the said franchise of 1913, and hence that the said plaintiff was entitled to have and recover from said defendant the percentage of said gross annual receipts derived by it from this last-named source. Judgment was therefore ordered in favor of the plaintiff for the aggregate amount of said percentages. The trial court further held that as to certain sales and deliveries of electric energy for use otherwise than for lighting purposes to the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, and designated as the 'Moraga' sales, such electric energy was delivered to said last-named corporation within the limits of the city of Oakland, and hence that the plaintiff was entitled to receive the percentages stipulated in its franchise of 1913 upon the gross annual receipts of said defendant derived from such so-called 'Moraga' sales; and ordered and entered judgment accordingly for the accumulated sum of such percentages.

"From the judgment of the trial court in plaintiff's favor as above set forth the defendant has appealed; while from that portion of said judgment which is in the defendant's favor, in so far as the court has denied to said plaintiff the right to collect any percentages upon the gross annual receipts of the defendant derived from the sale and supply of electric light within said city, the plaintiff has also taken an appeal. The record in these two appeals has been by stipulation of the parties presented in one transcript, and it is agreed that they may be heard and determined together.

"The sole question presented upon the plaintiff's appeal is that relating to the correctness of the ruling of the trial court upholding the validity and vitality of the defendant's so-called constitutional franchise, and declaring the defendant's sales and deliveries of electric light within the city of Oakland to have been wholly made thereunder and not under or by virtue of the franchise of 1913. There are two contentions of the defendant upon its appeal; the first being that the trial court was in error in its holding that the defendant's deliveries of electric energy in the forms of heat and power to the city of Oakland and its inhabitants were made under the franchise of 1913, and its second contention being that as to the 'Moraga' deliveries the uncontradicted evidence showed that these were made outside of the limits of the city of Oakland, and that said defendant was therefore not liable to pay any percentages upon its gross annual receipts derived from that source."

The Gross Receipts from Electricity Furnished for Lighting Purposes.

[1] It is admitted that under the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Russell v. Sebastian, supra, the Great Western Power Company at all times after 1908 had a franchise which enabled it to furnish electricity for lighting throughout the whole city of Oakland. The contention of the city is that by the application for the franchise in 1913 and by the acceptance of a franchise which covered the whole city (with the exception of a certain district), the defendant thereby surrendered its constitutional franchise in lieu of the franchise granted in 1913. Whatever justification there might be for this theory, if the granting of the franchise of 1913 had been a result of mutual bargaining between the parties, assuming that they stood on the same basis as private persons negotiating for similar rights and entering into a new contract with relation to those rights, there is absolutely no justification for the extension of this theory to the facts involved in this case, where the grant of the franchise of 1913 as well as that of 1909 was required to be to the highest bidder at public auction. The applications of the defendant to the council of the city of Oakland to offer for sale at public auction the form of franchise, if he bids at the sale, proposed by it, merely set in operation the machinery provided in the charter act for the sale of franchises. Charter of Oakland, art. 20 (Stat. 1911, p. 1628). The applicant for such a franchise stands upon no different footing from any other individual in the community who may be a prospective buyer of the franchise.

The charter in effect at the time of the sale of the 1913 franchise provided that the franchise should be sold to the "bidder offering to pay to the city during the life of the franchise, permit or privilege, the highest percentage of the gross annual receipts received from the use, operation, or possession of the franchise, permit or privilege; provided, that such percentage shall not be less than two per cent. of said gross annual receipts the first five years," etc. Section 146, subd. 2, art. 20, of the Charter (Stat. 1911, p. 1629).

It is difficult to see upon what theory the purchase by the defendant of this franchise, either directly from the city, or from some purchaser of the franchise at public auction, could in any wise affect a right which it theretofore owned. There is no provision in the franchise requiring the surrender to the city of other franchises. There was no agreement in the application or at any other time on the part of the defendant to surrender such franchise, and the charter does not require such surrender. We cannot understand how the purchase of such franchise by the defendant can be justly made a basis for a claim that it thereby agreed to pay 2 per cent. of the gross returns from the operation of the properties and franchises theretofore owned and operated by the purchaser. On the contrary, the charter required that the bidding should be on the basis of the annual receipts derived from the possession of the franchise so purchased (subdivision 2, supra), and not from the possession of prior franchises. Neither the franchise granted by the city nor that granted by the Constitution were exclusive. The ordinance granting the franchise expressly provided that it was not an exclusive privilege. If the franchise offered for sale had been purchased by some competitor of the defendant, there was no reason why the defendant could not continue to operate under its constitutional franchise and no legal reason why it could not again apply to the council to advertise a new blanket franchise covering the city. The whole scheme for the sale of franchises at auction upon competitive bidding is opposed to the theory that the purchaser of the franchise surrenders any right it theretofore had, merely by purchase at such sale. It is not contended that the defendant surrendered its rights by the application for the franchise, nor would it be contended that it surrendered its rights to some other bidder for the franchise if it had been unsuccessful in the competition. At what point, then, can it be said that the defendant surrendered its constitutional franchise to the city?

The answer presented by the city is, "At the time it acquired the new franchise," but this answer ignores the fundamental requirement of competitive bidding for all franchises.

The city makes the point that certain sections of the ordinance granting the franchise of 1913 show an intention to substitute the new franchise for the old. For instance, the franchise of 1913 contains an agreement by which the grantee obligates itself to sell to the city, for cash, all property used in the enjoyment of the franchise. Section 16. This provision of the franchise was required by the charter to be inserted in every ordinance granting a franchise. Charter of Oakland, § 145, art. 20, supra.

This point is answered by the fact that the ordinance granting a franchise is not the result of mutual bargaining, from which it might well be inferred that the defendant was agreeing to sell all its property to the city, but is a general proviso applicable alike to all prospective purchasers, and therefore to be construed only as applicable to property used in the exercise of the particular rights granted by the franchise and not otherwise owned or acquired. To require a purchaser owning a perpetual franchise to distribute electricity for light and another to distribute electricity for power and heat to agree to sell that system at the end of 35 years, long before its rights to so distribute electricity for light, heat, and power terminated under its other franchise, as a condition of bidding for the new 1913 franchise, would be obviously putting such a purchaser at a great disadvantage as compared with other bidders owning no system and no rights, and would require a consideration from it wholly out of proportion to that tendered by other bidders. The contention that the defendant, by bidding in this franchise, in effect agreed to surrender a perpetual franchise, and a 50-year franchise, and agreed to sell its property in 35 years, and that the agreement so to do is a consideration for the new franchise, if sustained, shows that the city was requiring from this bidder a consideration it had no right to require or to exact, for the only consideration the city was authorized to accept in such competitive bidding was a percentage of the gross receipts to be derived from the franchise sold. The basis upon which the percentage was to be computed is the same in the case of each bidder. This contention of the city cannot be sustained if the fundamental principle of equal competitive bidding for franchises be conceded, as it must be in the light of the express requirements of the charter. Section 140, subd. 5, art. 20, supra. Furthermore, as its bid of percentages would cover the receipts from its plant and distributing system already installed, which amount the city is seeking to recover in this action, while another competitor would be compelled to pay only on the revenue from its plant subsequently installed, it is apparent that a bid of 2 per cent. from a corporation with a larger business already developed would be vastly greater in proportion than that of a similar percentage from a bidder that might take years to develop its system to the point already attained by its competitive bidder.

On the other hand, suppose that the defendant's constitutional franchise required an annual payment to the city of 5 per cent. of the gross returns, would it be contended that the defendant, by bidding in a blanket franchise requiring no payment for three years, and 2 per cent. thereafter, would thereby be released from the payments due under its original franchise where it continuously occupied the streets with its poles and wires and conducted its business? Assuredly not. If it did not terminate its duties under the old franchise, it is equally clear that the mere bidding in of such a blanket franchise did not terminate its rights thereunder.

Other points of the city based upon an analysis of the terms of the franchise of 1913 are met by the same considerations, and therefore need not be considered in detail.

There is no basis whatever, in law or in fact, for the contention that the defendant's rights and duties under its old franchise terminated by the acceptance of the new. The customers of the defendant were entitled to be served under the terms of the old franchise, a right derived by them from the Constitution, and the people in the district not yet served by the defendant were entitled to the same privilege. Russell v. Sebastian, supra. These mutual rights and duties should not be deemed impaired or terminated by mere inferences derived from circumstances that defendant applied for and subsequently bid in a new franchise duplicating in part rights it already enjoyed and was entitled to continue to exercise. The situation presented by the record is simply this:

The defendant at all times since 1908 has had the right, by an express grant to it by the Constitution of the state, to serve the inhabitants of the city of Oakland with electricity for lighting purposes.

All revenues derived from the sale of electricity for light are revenues derived by the corporation by reason of its constitutional franchise and not by reason of the franchises subsequently obtained from the city for the distribution of electricity for lighting purposes.

If it should be held that the franchise of 1913 had any effect upon the prior right of the bidders, it would follow that there could be no equal and competitive bidding.

The charter expressly provides that franchises shall be so framed that there shall be no direct or indirect restriction upon free and open competition in bidding therefor. Article 20, § 140, subd. 5, supra.

The Great Western Power Company, if compelled by its bid to surrender its perpetual franchise for the distribution of electricity for lighting purposes, could not afford to bid as much for the franchise as some other bidder who had no such interest at stake, and the same would be true with reference to any other owner of a franchise which would be included in the blanket rights covered by the franchise of 1913. Hence no such surrender can be implied.

The city relies very strongly upon the case of Hanford v. Hanford Gas, etc., Co., 169 Cal. 749, 147 Pac. 969, while the defendant relies with equal assurance upon the decision in the Town of Suisan City v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 35 Cal. App. 380, 170 Pac. 1078. We will refer to the former as to the Hanford and to the latter as the Suisan Case. The question involved in the Hanford Case is altogether different from that involved in the case at bar. In that case suit was brought by the city to recover from the holder of a franchise for heat, light, and power the 2 per cent. of the gross annual receipts arising from the use of the franchise. The defendant demurred to the complaint, making no issue upon the allegation of the complaint, that the receipts sought to be recovered were derived from the franchise, but claiming that by reason of its holding a constitutional franchise it had the right to distribute heat and power as well as light. This contention was determined against the defendant, and it was held that the franchise gave the right for heat and power distribution, something which the company did not possess under the Constitution. The question answered in that case is thus stated in the decision: "Did the defendant, in accepting this franchise from the city of Hanford, acquire anything of value?" Instead of supporting the contention of the plaintiff it is apparent from the decision, taken as a whole, that the court considered that there was no inconsistency between the grant for light, already owned by the gas company, and the right to distribute gas for light and power purposes, covered by the new franchise.

The Suisan Case was an action similar to the one at bar brought by the city to recover a percentage of the gross receipts from a franchise granted by the board of trustees of Suisan for light and power purposes to one Prior, who had theretofore been distributing electricity for lighting purposes under the constitutional franchise. It was held that the grant by the city for lighting purposes was void and in conflict with the constitutional franchise, and that the obligation to pay 2 per cent. did not arise on the electricity distributed for lighting purposes. A petition for hearing in this court was denied in the Suisan Case. The only distinction between that case and the one at bar favorable to the contention of the plaintiff is that subsequent to the grant of the franchise in the Suisan Case the Constitution of the state was amended. Const. art. 11, § 19. On the other hand, it is urged that the city of Oakland was not by such amendment vested with authority to grant franchises for the distribution of electricity for lighting purposes, and therefore that the rule in the Suisan Case is still applicable. In view of our conclusion that the defendant has the right to furnish electricity for lighting purposes under its constitutional franchise, and is not required to pay 2 per cent. of its gross return therefrom, we deem it unnecessary to further discuss the authoritative force of either the decision in the Hanford or the Suisan Case. Neither of these cases is opposed to the conclusion reached by us.

Rights to a Percentage of the Gross Receipts under the Franchise of 1909.

[2] The question is whether the franchise granted the defendant in 1909 by sale at public auction in accordance with the Broughton Act (Stat. 1905, p. 777) is still in effect, or whether the acceptance of the franchise of 1913 operated to supersede the prior franchise.

What we have said with reference to the effect of the grant of the franchise of 1913, upon the constitutional franchise theretofore owned by the defendant is largely determinative of the question here involved. The franchise of 1909 was for a 50-year period and for the distribution of electrical energy for heat and power purposes only. It was believed by the defendant that the right to continue construction under this franchise terminated in 3 years. The new franchise, so far as the distribution of electricity for heat and power was concerned, was desired to cover those districts in the city not theretofore occupied by the power lines of the defendant, in view of the termination of the right to continue construction under the franchise of 1909. There is no dispute as to the amount which would be due on the theory that the ordinance of 1909 remained in full force and effect as these amounts were stipulated before the trial court. What we have said with reference to competitive bidding applies with equal force to the rights of the defendant under the franchise of 1909, although the Broughton Act differs somewhat from the charter. If, as a condition of bidding, or as a result of the acceptance of the new franchise, the rights of the defendant under the old franchise of 1909 were thereby surrendered or lost, then it would follow that the bidding was not competitive. The defendant could only bid at the hazard of losing rights it already possessed, while other persons or corporations could bid without such hazard. There is no inconsistency in the ownership by the defendant of rights under several distinct franchises. The parties have been able to stipulate in dollars and cents the return to the city from the respective franchises, if all are still in existence, and there is nothing in the nature of such franchises to justify the conclusion that the acceptance of the later franchise was a surrender of the earlier franchise. The only difference between the defendant as a purchaser of the franchise and any other bidder is that the acceptance of the franchise by the defendant enables it to furnish the heat and power to customers and in districts not theretofore served under the franchise of 1909 without duplicating poles and wires in the districts theretofore served.

The conclusion of the trial court was erroneous upon this branch of the case. This conclusion is fortified by the fact that the franchise of 1913 made no reference to existing construction, but was framed upon the theory of additional and new construction to be commenced within four months of the date of the granting of the franchise, and therefore had no application to rights under a previous franchise and construction already erected thereunder.

[3] As to the percentage upon deliveries to the Pacific Gas & Electric corporation at Moraga. It appears from the evidence without question that the defendant corporation sold electric energy to the Pacific Gas & Electric Company. A portion of this power was delivered from the power lines of the defendant company to the power lines of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company at a point named Moraga, outside of the city limits of the city of Oakland. Under both the franchises of 1909 and 1913 the payment of a percentage by the defendant to plaintiff was only "upon the gross annual receipts resulting from the sale of electric energy delivered within the limits of the city of Oakland." The contract between the defendant and the Pacific Gas & Electric Company provided for a delivery "at the junction of the power company's main electric transmission lines and the main electric transmission lines of the consumer, about eight miles southeasterly from said Ridge station." This point is known as Moraga. It was also provided that the meters and measuring instruments for measuring the power delivered at Moraga should be installed in the power company's electric substation in said Alameda county known as its "Fourth Avenue substation." It is clear, however, that so long as the electricity remained on the power lines of the defendant it was not delivered to its customer, the Pacific Gas & Electric Company. Obviously, the point of delivery was the junction of the lines of the two systems, as was expressly provided in the contract between them. The fact that there was power line loss between the measuring station and the point of delivery is of no significance whatever. Such loss is a known quantity, and the amount of electricity delivered at the point of intersection of the two power lines could be as accurately determined by a meter several miles away as by a meter at the point of delivery. Both the contract and the physical facts demonstrate that the point of delivery was outside the city of Oakland and consequently not within the terms of the franchise.

[4] A point is made by the plaintiff that some portion of the power delivered by the defendant to the Pacific Gas & Electric corporation is subsequently returned by that corporation and distributed within the limits of the city of Oakland. Obviously, the defendant is not concerned with the distribution of power by its consumer, and such deliveries by the consumer are not deliveries within the meaning of the franchises held by the defendant. It may be said, however, in connection with this point, that the 12,000 kilowatt hours delivered by the defendant to the Pacific Gas & Electric Company is mingled with the other current flowing in the wires of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company derived from independent sources of power, and that only about 500 kilowatt hours of the total of 25,000 kilowatt hours in the lines of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company are subsequently used within the city of Oakland. This quantity, however, is immaterial to any point involved in this litigation. The court was in error in holding the defendant liable for a percentage of the gross annual returns upon the power delivered at Moraga.

In the event that it was decided that the defendant owns and holds its constitutional light franchise and its franchise of 1909 and 1913, and that the sales of electricity delivered at Moraga are not to be considered in determining the gross earnings of the defendant company, the proper amount of the judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant was stipulated.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to the trial court to enter judgment in accordance with the stipulation of the parties as to the amounts due under the law as determined by this court.

GRAY et al. v. JANSS INV. CO. et al.

1. Brokers ⚡86(1)—Evidence held to show defendant brokers agreed to negotiate exchange of properties listed with them and plaintiff brokers and divide commissions.

In an action by brokers against a realty company to recover half the commission paid the latter by both parties to an exchange of realty, evidence held sufficient to support a finding that plaintiffs and defendants agreed to co-operate in negotiating the exchange, which agreement was modified to permit defendants to negotiate the exchange alone and collect commissions from both parties for the joint benefit of plaintiffs and defendants.

2. Appeal and error ⚡1071(1)—Variance of agreement as found by trial court from that pleaded not reversible error, where both arose out of same transaction.

In an action by real estate brokers to recover half the commissions paid to a realty company, to which they intrusted the negotiation of an exchange of their principal's property for property listed with such company, under an agreement that defendants would collect the commissions from both principals and divide the same with plaintiffs, though the trial court found that the agreement was that each should receive the commission coming from their respective principals, such variance from the pleaded agreement could not have so misled or surprised defendants as to place them at a disadvantage, and thus warrant the reversal of the judgment for plaintiffs; both agreements relating to and arising out of the same transaction.

3. Appeal and error ⚡171(3)—Where case tried without objection on theory other than that raised by pleadings, neither party may urge such error on appeal.

Where an action between real estate brokers for the recovery by plaintiffs of half the commission paid to defendants by their respective principals on an exchange of properties, the negotiation of which was intrusted to defendants alone under an agreement that they should collect the commission from both principals and divide the same with plaintiffs, was tried, with the acquiescence of both parties, on the theory that the agreement was that each should receive the commission coming from their principal, such variance from the pleaded agreement was not fatal to the judgment for plaintiffs; the rule being that, where the court and the parties try the action on a theory not strictly in accord with the issues raised by the pleadings, and the court on evidence adduced to that issue and received without objection on the ground of variance finds in accordance therewith and on the theory that it was addressed to a material issue in the case, neither of the parties will be heard to say on appeal for the first time that there was no such issue.

4. Brokers ⚡43(2)—Oral agreement to exchange principals' properties and divide commissions not within statute.

An oral agreement between real estate brokers to co-operate in exchange of properties of their principals and divide commissions, as subsequently modified to permit one only to negotiate the exchange, collect commissions from both principals and divide them is not within the statute of frauds (Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6), neither party undertaking to pay the other a commission, but merely to divide the commission earned.

5. Brokers ⚡66—May recover commission paid by principal to other brokers to whom negotiation of exchange was intrusted regardless of whether they could have collected same from such principal.

Where plaintiff brokers, to promote exchange of principal's property, confided to defendant brokers the privilege of conducting negotiations for exchange for property listed with defendants, the latter became the agent of the former in negotiating plaintiff's end of the exchange, and the commission received by them from plaintiff's principal was received for and belonged to plaintiffs, who could recover same whether or not, in the absence of a valid agreement of employment between them and their principal, they would have been entitled to such commission had they conducted the exchange alone.

6. Brokers ⚡66—Partnership ⚡15—Defendant broker, agreeing to pay another broker commission received from latter's principal on exchange of properties, must convey land accepted as commission, or value thereof; agreement held to create partnership.

Where plaintiff brokers intrusted to defendant brokers negotiation of an exchange of properties of their principals, under agreement that defendants should collect commissions from both principals and pay to plaintiffs commission collected from their principal, and defendants accepted from plaintiff's principal, as commission, a conveyance of part of the land, plaintiffs were entitled to a conveyance of the land so received by defendants, or, if the latter were without unincumbered title, to the value thereof, and the agreement, though it covered but a single transaction, created a partnership between plaintiffs and defendants.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by E. A. Gray and others against the Janss Investment Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Lloyd W. Moultrie, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

James E. Kelby and Kemp & Clewett, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. In this action the plaintiffs, real estate brokers, sued the defendants, also real estate brokers, pursuant to the terms of an alleged oral agreement, for the recovery of one-half of a commission alleged to have been paid to the defendants by both parties to an exchange of real properties.

The plaintiffs' complaint alleged, among other things, that, as a result of several conferences between the plaintiffs and defendants concerning the exchange of the said real properties, an agreement was entered into between plaintiffs and defendants whereby any commission or compensation which should be earned and paid should be equally divided between the plaintiffs and defendants. Subsequently, and as the result of further conferences and negotiations between the plaintiffs and the defendants, it was agreed between them, so the complaint alleged, that for the purpose of more effectively promoting an exchange of said real properties the plaintiffs would not actively participate in the exchange negotiations, and that the same should be conducted solely by the defendants, who thereupon and in consideration thereof promised and agreed with the plaintiffs to charge and collect, upon the consummation of the contemplated exchange, a commission from both owners and to divide the same with plaintiffs. Thereupon and thereafter, the plaintiffs confided the entire management and control of the negotiations for the exchange of the said properties to said defendants. In short plaintiffs' complaint proceeded upon the theory that the agreement between plaintiffs and defendants as formulated and made was, in effect, one of copartnership in the promotion of the proposed exchange and a division of the commissions between the plaintiffs and the defendants which were to be collected by the defendants alone from both principals. The defendants consummated an exchange of the said properties and collected from each of the respective owners of the said real properties a large commission and compensation.

The complaint further alleged that defendants concealed from plaintiffs the character, extent, and amount of the commissions so received by them from both owners of the said real properties, and that although plaintiffs demanded an accounting therefor the defendants refused to acknowledge plaintiffs' claim of an interest in any part of said commissions so received.

The facts adduced in support of plaintiffs' case are substantially these: The defendants, the Janss Investment Company, doing business as real estate brokers in the city of Los Angeles, were the agents for the owners of certain lands in the states of Idaho and Utah, who were desirous of exchanging the same for income property situate in the city of Los Angeles, and accordingly listed said lands with the defendants for such an exchange. At about the same time, the owners of a certain apartment house in the city of Los Angeles, known as the Bowers Hotel, listed the same with the plaintiffs for exchange, and one of the plaintiffs, accompanied by the owner of the Bowers Hotel, inspected the same for the purpose of acquiring data to be used in negotiating an exchange of said property. Subsequently, and prior to the time of plaintiffs entering into negotiations with the defendant Janss Investment Company, the plaintiffs made several separate endeavors to sell or exchange the Bowers Hotel property, and with that end in view said property was shown to several prospective purchasers. Some time in the month of June, 1917, after the Bowers Hotel property had been listed with the plaintiffs, a Mr. Shiffer, a real estate broker operating in the city of Los Angeles, inquired of the plaintiffs if they had listed with them and could submit for exchange for Idaho and Utah lands income business property in the city of Los Angeles. Plaintiffs replied that they had listed with them several such properties, including the Bowers Hotel property. Thereupon Mr. Shiffer stated that he was making inquiries for Mr. Kendall of the Janss Investment Company, and upon the following day he brought Mr. Kendall to the office of the plaintiffs, who then and there submitted to Mr. Kendall, for exchange, a list of several properties situated in the city of Los Angeles, including the Bowers Hotel property. Kendall mentioned the Idaho and Utah lands, and, after giving a description of the same to plaintiffs, said: "I think that that Bowers Hotel will interest my party." Plaintiffs thereupon prepared and presented to Mr. Kendall for the defendant Janss Investment Company a typewritten detailed description of the Bowers Hotel property, and thereafter were in frequent communication with Mr. Kendall concerning the details of the proposed exchange. The plaintiffs and defendants had several conferences for the purpose of getting their principals together on a proposition for an exchange of their respective properties. These conferences, conducted by the plaintiffs and the defendant Kendall as agent of the Janss Investment Company, culminated in a proposal from Kendall, accepted by plaintiffs, that plaintiffs and defendants work together in negotiating an exchange of the properties of their respective principals. At that time, and as a part of these conferences, the defendant Janss Investment Company, through their agent Kendall, furnished plaintiffs with a description and list of the properties in Idaho and Utah which were to be exchanged for the property of the plaintiffs' principal situated in the city of Los Angeles. Thereupon the plaintiffs presented the proposition of exchange to their principal, the owner of the Bowers Hotel in Los Angeles. It was understood and agreed between plaintiffs and defendants in the first instance that the plaintiffs for their commission would look to their principal, the owner of the Bowers Hotel, and that the defendants for their commission would look to their principals, the owners of the Idaho and Utah lands.

While the exchange negotiations were pending, and prior to the time that the said Idaho and Utah landowners examined the Bowers Hotel property, the defendant Kendall, as agent for the Janss Investment Company, stated to the plaintiffs that complications would be avoided if the Janss Investment Company handled the deal alone, and for that reason requested that the plaintiffs permit the Janss Investment Company to handle the whole of said deal alone, and then and there stated to the plaintiffs that such an arrangement would make no difference to the plaintiffs in so far as their compensation was concerned, and, in effect, said further that the defendant Janss Investment Company would protect the plaintiffs in the adjustment and collection of their commission from the owners of the Bowers Hotel property. The plaintiffs acceded to Kendall's proposition in this behalf, and he thereupon requested, and the plaintiffs thereupon consented, that he alone be permitted to show the Bowers Hotel property to his principals.

After the consummation of the exchange, the defendant the Janss Investment Company, in lieu of a cash commission of $3,500 from the owner of the Bowers Hotel property, accepted, so the defendant Kendall testified, with said owner's consent and concurrence, from the Idaho and Utah landowners, a conveyance of 160 acres of land, admittedly worth $30 an acre. It is a fair inference from the evidence adduced upon the whole case that said 160 acres of land would otherwise have been conveyed to the owner of the Bowers Hotel property as a part of the lands given in exchange for his said property. The defendant Janss Investment Company, received the sum of $720 in cash from the Idaho and Utah landowners as reimbursement for expenditures made in negotiating the exchange, and for their commission, in negotiating the Idaho and Utah landowners' end of the exchange, received from said owners a conveyance of 35 acres of land situated in the state of Utah, presumably of the same value as the 160 acres agreed to be conveyed to said defendants as a commission from the Bowers Hotel end of the exchange. In addition to said 35 acres, the said defendants entered into an agreement with Idaho and Utah landowners, whereby, as further compensation and in lieu of a cash commission for making said exchange, defendants were to receive from said Idaho and Utah landowners, on demand, a conveyance of an additional 135 acres of land in the same location, and presumably of the same value as the 35 acres already conveyed to said defendant.

The defendant Janss Investment Company did not then nor thereafter communicate to the plaintiffs the fact that they had adjusted said commissions earned in making said exchange, and on the demand for a statement from the said plaintiffs as to the amount of commissions collected from the owners of the Bowers Hotel property refused to disclose to plaintiffs the amount or character of the commissions earned by them.

Kendall, the agent of the Janss Investment Company, among other things, testified to the arrangement he had made with plaintiffs concerning their commission, to the effect that it was the original agreement with the plaintiffs that they should receive their commission from the owner of the Bowers Hotel, and that the Janss Investment Company should receive its commission from the owners of the Idaho and Utah lands. Kendall also testified that at the inception of the exchange negotiations and for some little time thereafter he considered that the plaintiffs had an interest in whatever commissions might be earned and collected for making the exchange, but that immediately before the deal was closed he concluded, by a process of deduction all his own, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any consideration at all in the matter of the sharing of commissions as originally agreed upon.

From these among other facts, the trial court made its findings to the effect that the agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendants was that the defendants alone should conduct the negotiations for the exchange; that the plaintiffs should receive whatever sum was paid as a commission by the owners of the Bowers Hotel property; that the defendant Janss Investment Company should receive whatever sum was paid as a commission by the Idaho and Utah landowners; and that the said defendant was to make arrangements for the payment of the commission of the plaintiffs in accordance with said agreement.

The trial court also found the value of said 160 acres of land, which by agreement were to be conveyed to the Janss Investment Company as a commission from the Bowers Hotel end of the exchange, was the sum of $3,500. No further question is raised in the case, and none is involved upon the record before us, of the validity of the agreement to divide the commissions being void upon the grounds of public policy because made secretly and without the knowledge of either or both principals.

[1, 2] Clearly, the evidence adduced in behalf of the plaintiffs' case, as hereinbefore epitomized, not only supports the finding of the trial court to the effect that the plaintiffs and defendants entered into an agreement whereby they would co-operate in an endeavor to negotiate an exchange of the properties of their respective principals, but warrants as well the further finding that such an agreement was subsequently modified to the extent of permitting the defendant to negotiate the exchange alone and collect the commissions therefor from both parties for the joint benefit of both plaintiffs and defendants. Strictly construed, the trial court's finding that the agreement of the parties was that the plaintiffs should receive the commission coming from the Bowers Hotel end of the exchange, and that the defendants should receive the commission coming from the Idaho and Utah landowners, is nonresponsive to the issue raised by the pleadings that the agreement of the parties was that the defendants would collect the commission from both principals to the exchange and divide the same with the plaintiffs.

[3] This variance, however, is not found in the proof of a totally dissimilar and independent agreement from that pleaded in the plaintiffs' complaint. The most that can be said is that the agreement found varies in its terms from the pleaded agreement, but the fact remains that both agreements were related to and arose out of the same transaction. Consequently, the variance could not have so misled or surprised the defendants as to have placed them at a disadvantage, and, that being so, the variance cannot be held to warrant the reversal of the judgment. Geiger v. Kiser, 47 Colo. 297, 107 Pac. 267. In any event, this variance cannot be held to be fatal to the judgment when measured by the fact that, apparently, the case was tried by the trial court with the acquiescence of counsel for both parties, upon the theory that the agreement of the plaintiffs and defendants was the agreement found by the trial court, rather than the precise agreement pleaded in the plaintiffs' complaint. Conceding, therefore, a variance between the pleaded agreement and the proven and found agreement, still the defendants will not be heard to complain of the same after judgment, for it is the rule that where the trial court and the parties to the action proceed, as the record shows was done in the instant case, to a trial of the action upon a theory not strictly in accord with the issues raised by the pleadings, and the trial court, upon evidence adduced to that issue, and received without objection upon the ground of variance, finds in accordance with that evidence and upon the theory that it was addressed to a material issue in the case, neither of the parties will be heard to say on appeal for the first time that there was no such issue. Clark v. Allen, 125 Cal. 276, 57 Pac. 985; Schroeder v. Mauzy, 16 Cal. App. 443, 118 Pac. 459; Frear v. Sweet, 118 N. Y. 454, 23 N. E. 910; Kaufman v. Bloch, 5 Misc. Rep. 404, 25 N. Y. Supp. 758.

[4] There is no merit in the contention that the agreement between the plaintiffs and defendants is void because not in writing. The agreement is not one to pay a commission for the sale or exchange of real property. None of the parties to the agreement undertook to pay the other a commission. They obligated themselves in the first instance to do no more than co-operate in the exchange and divide the commissions earned therefor, and the subsequent modification of the original agreement, whether as pleaded in the plaintiffs' complaint or as found by the trial court upon the issue raised by the evidence, left it still a co-operation agreement between broker and broker to divide commissions, and consequently does not fall within the inhibition of subdivision 6 of section 1624 of the Civil Code. Gorham v. Helman, 90 Cal. 346, 27 Pac. 289; Casey v. Richards, 10 Cal. App. 57, 101 Pac. 36; Johnston v. Porter, 21 Cal. App. 97, 131 Pac. 69; Sellers v. Solway Land Co., 31 Cal. App. 259, 160 Pac. 175; Baker v. Thompson, 14 Cal. App. 175, 111 Pac. 373.

[5] Plaintiffs having confided to the defendants at the latter's request and for the purpose of more effectively promoting the exchange the privilege of exclusively conducting the exchange negotiations, the defendants thereby became the agent of the plaintiffs in negotiating the Bowers Hotel end of the exchange. Therefore, as between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the commission received by the defendants from the Bowers Hotel end of the exchange was received for and belonged to the plaintiffs (Kohn v. Jacobs, 4 Misc. Rep. 265, 23 N. Y. Supp. 1033), and, having been received by the defendants, was recoverable from them, regardless of whether or not, in the absence of a valid agreement of employment between the plaintiffs and the owner of the Bowers Hotel property, the plaintiffs would have been entitled to a commission from said owner had they alone conducted the Bowers Hotel end of the exchange. Dearing v. Sears, 50 Hun, 604, 3 N. Y. Supp. 31; Kohn v. Jacobs, supra; Kaufman v. Bloch, supra; Johnston v. Porter, supra.

[6] It is contended that, granting, as we find, that the plaintiffs have a cause of action upon the pleaded and proven facts, still the judgment in their favor should have been only for a recovery of the land received by the defendant the Janss Investment Company as a commission from the Bowers Hotel end of the deal, rather than a money judgment to the extent of the value of said land. This contention, we think, must be sustained. The agreement in suit, although it covered but a single transaction, in effect, created a partnership between plaintiffs and defendants, and therefore in this action for an accounting the plaintiffs' judgment in strictness, upon principle, and in keeping with the agreement found by the trial court, should have directed the defendants to make a conveyance to the plaintiffs of the land received as a commission from the Bowers Hotel end of the deal or pay to plaintiffs the value thereof.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment upon the findings as made, that the defendant Janss Investment Company convey to plaintiffs the land received by said defendant as a commission from the Bowers Hotel end of the deal; and for the purpose of having an effective judgment, the court below, before modifying the judgment, as now directed, is directed to take evidence for the purpose of determining whether or not the said defendant still retains an unincumbered title to said land and is in a position to convey it to the plaintiffs, and if upon the taking of such evidence the court finds to the contrary, then the judgment shall be for the plaintiffs for the value of the land as originally found.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; SLOANE, J.; SHAW, J.; LAWLOR, J.; SHURTLEFF, J.

PER CURIAM. The judgment in the above-entitled cause having been in effect affirmed in all of its essential features, and having been reversed with directions for certain modifications in a minor particular, not seriously urged by the appellant as a ground for reversal, it is ordered that the appellants do not recover their costs on appeal.

FONNER v. MARTENS. (S. F. 9276.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 6, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 907(4)—Recitation that omitted judgment roll was introduced compels assumption that findings were correct.

Where the bill of exceptions did not include a judgment roll in a partition suit related to the present suit, but contained a recitation that the judgment roll was presented in evidence at the trial, the court assumes that the evidence introduced in the judgment roll supports findings of the trial court.

2. Partition $\hookrightarrow$ 17(2)—The judgment is conclusive between the same parties in a subsequent suit over same property.

Where plaintiff, after suit by his wife for divorce, conveyed land to defendant, and on a subsequent suit by his divorced wife against him for partition of the land the defendant and G., who also had an interest in the land, were parties, since the rights of all parties in the title were directly in issue, under Code Civ. Proc. § 759, the judgment in the partition suit in favor of defendant was conclusive that the deed from plaintiff was an absolute conveyance of plaintiff's title, under section 766, making partition judgments binding upon all parties to the suit who then had an interest in the premises.

3. Estoppel $\hookrightarrow$ 3(3), 69—Sworn answer and testimony as witness in partition suit disclaiming title precluded defendant from having a conveyance declared a mortgage.

Where a husband conveyed to another to defraud his wife, who had sued for divorce, and in a partition suit by wife against husband and grantee, brought after she had secured an award of property in the divorce suit, the husband by sworn answer and oath as witness disclaimed title, and thus enabled grantee to secure decree quieting title in him, the husband was estopped to have the conveyance declared a mortgage as against grantee, and contention of husband that he was entitled to relief because grantee induced him to disclaim, and a confidential relation existed between them, was of no avail since he disclaimed to defeat his wife and secure a secret interest, and not to aid grantee.

4. Mortgages $\hookrightarrow$ 32(6)—Grantor, estopped by disclaimer from having deed declared a mortgage, held not reinvested with a title which he could assert in action to declare deed a mortgage.

Where, after conveying land to defendant to defraud his wife, who had sued for divorce, plaintiff by sworn answer and on oath as a witness in a partition suit by wife of the decree in divorce suit, disclaimed title and thus enabled defendant to obtain judgment, fact that plaintiff remained in possession of the land and received loans without giving security to defendant, unless the land was security, did not reinvest plaintiff with a title which he could assert in action to declare the deed a mortgage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Suit by H. C. Fonner against Henry Martens, also called Henri Martens. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. M. Rea and A. A. Caldwell, both of San Jose, for appellant.

Owen D. Richardson, of San Jose, and Monroe Thomas, of Palo Alto, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. The plaintiff brought this action to have his conveyance to defendant of certain real property by deed, absolute in form, declared a mortgage, and to quiet his title thereto. The trial court found upon sufficient evidence, if it was admissible, that the deed was given to secure advances of money made and to be made by defendant for the plaintiff, subject to certain payments due for money advanced on the mortgage security. This appeal from the judgment turns upon the question of various matters operating by way of estoppel against the respondent and res adjudicata, to bar the relief granted.

The record presents a complicated story, but we think the case must be decided upon certain considerations presented by the findings, and which are alleged to be inconsistent with the judgment. At the time this deed in dispute was executed the land in question was in litigation between the plaintiff Fonner, who then owned it, and his wife. The wife had sued him for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, and for an allotment of the property to her as community property. Pending this controversy, and after his pendens was filed in the divorce proceedings, plaintiff here, who will be hereafter referred to as respondent, executed the deed in controversy to Martens, the appellant.

Subsequently, one Gopcevic obtained judgment against respondent for $563.73, and levied upon and sold respondent's interest in this land at sheriff's sale. Gopcevic became the purchaser and received a sheriff's certificate of sale. After the deed from respondent to appellant and the levy and sale under the Gopcevic judgment, Mrs. Fonner obtained judgment in her divorce suit, and on the strength of the judgment, allotting her a half interest in the land, commenced an action in partition to which respondent, appellant, and Gopcevic were made parties defendant.

The rights of each of the parties were put in issue in this action, and the court by its decree determined the title to be vested entirely in Martens and Gopcevic, to the exclusion of both respondent and his wife. Appellant, in his answer in this case, pleaded this judgment as res adjudicata in his favor upon the status of this title.

[1] The bill of exceptions on this appeal does not include the judgment roll in the partition suit, but it recites that it was introduced in evidence on the trial, and we are therefore bound to assume that the showing made thereunder supports the findings of the trial court. Western Cal. Land Co. v. Welch, 41 Cal. App. 435, 183 Pac. 169.

[2] The findings pertinent to the partition judgment are substantially as follows:

That on the 30th day of December, A. D. 1908, Susie L. Fonner filed that certain action for the partition of said property entitled in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Santa Clara, Susie L. Fonner, plaintiff, v. M. C. Fonner, Henry Martens, John Doe and Richard Roe, defendants, said action being numbered 17917 of the files of the office of the clerk of the above-entitled court; that in and by the complaint filed by said Susie L. Fonner it was alleged that the real property referred to in plaintiff's complaint herein was owned by said Susie L. Fonner and H. C. Fonner, share and share alike, and that said deed made by H. C. Fonner to Henry Martens (the appellant) on the 20th day of February, A. D. 1908, was executed in pursuance of a conspiracy and for the purpose of cheating and defrauding plaintiff from enjoying the use and occupation of the property referred to in plaintiff's complaint, and to defeat the operation of said divorce decree entered in said divorce proceeding, and that said deed made by H. C. Fonner to Henry Martens was void and of no effect, and asking for the partition of said real property between said Susie L. Fonner and H. C. Fonner; that Mylos Gopcevic, on December 4, 1909, appeared in said action by answer to the said complaint setting up his right, title, and interest to said property under sheriff's certificate of sale, and thereafter, by amendment, setting up that, no redemption from said sale having been made, the sheriff's deed was executed conveying said property to defendant; that in said proceeding H. C. Fonner (the respondent), answering the complaint of said Susie L. Fonner in said action, denied that he had any right, title, or interest in and to said real property described in plaintiff's complaint, and denied that Susie L. Fonner had any right, title, or interest in said real property, and alleged in said answer that said Henry Martens was the owner in fee simple of said real property described in plaintiff's complaint, and that in the month of February, A. D. 1908, he made, executed, and delivered a deed of the whole of said premises to the said defendant, Henry Martens, by which deed he conveyed the said premises in fee simple to said defendant, Henry Martens, for and in consideration of the sum of $3,000, which said sum of money was paid to him; and denied that said deed of February 20, 1908, or any deed made by him, is "wholly or otherwise fraudulent or void, or that it was made with the intention on his part to defraud the rights, or any rights, of said Susie L. Fonner in and to the real estate described in said deed or any part thereof;" and further denied that the judgment or the lien of the execution issued in the case of Gopcevic against him or the certificate of sale of said premises is subsequent to or subject to the rights, or any rights or interest, of said Susie L. Fonner in said real estate, or any part thereof.

Said defendant Martens filed his answer to said complaint, and denied that the said Susie L. Fonner and H. C. Fonner were the owners of or had any right, title or interest whatever in said premises; denied any conspiracy for the purpose of defeating the rights of Susie L. Fonner in said property, and alleged that in the month of February, 1908, H. C. Fonner executed and delivered to him, Henry Martens, a deed whereby said H. C. Fonner conveyed to him the whole of the premises mentioned and described in said complaint for and in consideration of the sum of $3,000, which said sum was paid to H. C. Fonner by said defendant.

It is further found by the trial court here that said partition case was thereafter brought to trial, and upon said trial Henry Martens testified under oath, in the presence of the plaintiff herein, H. C. Fonner, that he (Henry Martens) had purchased the property described in the complaint for the sum of $3,000 on the 20th day of February, 1908; that he had received a deed to the property from H. C. Fonner; that said plaintiff, H. C. Fonner, was a witness and testified at the said trial, and made no denial of the said testimony of the defendant Martens, and that thereafter judgment was rendered in said suit and by said judgment it was declared that Henry Martens and one Mylos Gopcevic were the owners of said real property described in plaintiff's complaint in that action, which was the same property described in paragraph 1 of plaintiff's complaint herein, and that the said Susie L. Fonner had no right, title, or interest in and to said real property, or any part thereof; that the judgment of the court in said action was made awarding the said property to the said Mylos Gopcevic and Henry Martens, and declaring that Susie L. Fonner had no right, title or interest therein, and was based entirely on the answer of the defendant herein in that action, and upon the answer of the said Henry Martens in that action, and on the answer of said Mylos Gopcevic in said action, and upon the testimony of Henry Martens and the testimony of Mylos Gopcevic; that said judgment is still in full force and effect, and never has been appealed from, and the time has now passed when an appeal could be taken therefrom.

Upon what theory it was found that Mrs. Fonner had no interest in the property, in view of the evidence appearing in the record that notice of pendency of the action against her husband in which she was awarded a one-half interest therein was on file and of record prior to the transactions by which appellant and Gopcevic acquired their interests, does not appear. The findings of the court make no reference to the lis pendens. However, that is a matter which does not immediately concern this action. No appeal was taken by either of the parties, and the judgment in the partition suit became final. It decreed title to this property, and the whole of it, in appellant and Gopcevic. This was done in pursuance of respondent's verified answer disclaiming any interest in the premises, and affirming the validity and good faith of his transfer of an absolute title to appellant, and upon a trial which not only afforded to respondent every opportunity, but which called upon him in the exercise of good faith, both to his divorced wife and the court, to proclaim his interest, if he had not parted with his title. The validity and effect of this very deed was one of the main issues before the court.

The rights of all the parties in this title were directly in issue in that action (Code Civ. Proc. § 759), and the judgment is conclusive and binding upon all the parties to the suit who had at the time any interest in the premises (Code Civ. Proc. § 766; De Uprey v. De Uprey, 27 Cal. 329, 87 Am. Dec. 81; Bartlett v. Mackey, 130 Cal. 182, 62 Pac. 482; Adams v. Hopkins, 144 Cal. 29, 77 Pac. 712; Kuns v. Dias, 32 Cal. App. 651, 658, 163 Pac. 1052).

We see no escape from the conclusion that the partition judgment is res adjudicata as to the nature and effect of the deed in controversy here, in determining it to have been an absolute conveyance of respondent's title, unless it is shown that appellant was in some way estopped from taking advantage of it on the present trial.

[3] It is well settled that the mere fact that the judgment was procured by misrepresentations and false testimony in matters intrinsic to the action cannot afford the respondent any relief, even if he had not himself been a party to the fraud (Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 25 Pac. 970, 27 Pac. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159; Fealey v. Fealey, 104 Cal. 354, 38 Pac. 49, 43 Am. St. Rep. 111; Sohler v. Sohler, 135 Cal. 323, 67 Pac. 282, 87 Am. St. Rep. 98; Hanley v. Hanley, 114 Cal. 690, 46 Pac. 736), and a judgment which the parties themselves have obtained by fraudulent collusion is not open to attack by either party.

It is said in Bancroft v. Bancroft, 178 Cal. 359, 173 Pac. 579, L. R. A. 1918F, 1029, that:

"Courts of equity will not interfere to relieve a party to an action from a judgment which has been procured through a collusive agreement between the parties to the effect that either of said parties shall commence the action and obtain by the connivance or consent of the other a judgment to which he would not otherwise be entitled."

Much less can a party who has disclaimed any rights in the premises, and pleaded by his answer the very facts upon which the judgment is based, and has done this for the purpose of defrauding another party to the action, as the findings show was the situation here, be permitted to stultify the action of the courts, and by declaring his iniquity avoid the judgment obtained through his own connivance.

It is claimed by respondent, and was found by the court, on the trial of this action, that respondent was induced to disclaim his own interest and concede the title of appellant in the partition action by persuasion, misrepresentation, and undue influence of the appellant. We discover no evidence in the record to support such a finding. The relations of the parties were not confidential; they were dealing at arm's length. It is true that respondent trusted the appellant, but not to a degree or under circumstances to bring their dealings within the rule of confidential relations. If he falsely disclaimed any title to this property it was for the purpose of defeating his wife's claim and protecting his own secret interest. There is no doubt, if we accept the findings of the trial court, that there was connivance between these two throughout the entire transaction to enable respondent to avoid the claim of his wife to a half interest in this land, but respondent was at all times an active and responsible mover in the matter, and, as he supposed, was to benefit by it.

If the appellant was playing a double purpose, that of saving the property from the demands of respondent's wife, only that he might acquire it for himself, it in no wise relieves respondent from the onus of his share in the deceit. But we may not lose sight of the fact that the decree in the partition suit closes the door upon the alleged fraud of appellant as having induced respondent to vest absolute title in him to this land, on the representation that it would be treated as a mortgage, unless some extrinsic fraud on the part of appellant estops him from taking advantage of such judgment.

The judgment did not, as suggested by counsel for respondent, purport to merge an interest created as a mortgage into a title in fee, but it was a conclusive adjudication, made at the instance of respondent himself, that the instrument in question never was a mortgage, but was from the time of its execution an absolute conveyance. And it is such an adjudication as the courts can only annul or avoid on a showing of some extrinsic or collateral fraud or mistake in its procurement.

When counsel argue that to permit appellant to use this judgment for the purpose of defrauding respondent is a use that equity will not permit, they are begging the question. Precisely what the partition judgment determined was that it was not a fraud to treat this instrument as an absolute deed, and not a mortgage, since it was intended between the parties as a deed.

If the partition judgment in Martens' favor had been procured in furtherance of an honest purpose, then, under the representations of appellant that he would continue to hold the title subject to a previous agreement that it should have the effect of a mortgage, the title thus established by such judgment might properly be declared a trust in favor of respondent. But his connivance in obtaining the judgment for a fraudulent purpose estops him from such relief.

It is in this respect that this judgment is distinguishable from that in the case of Bradley Co. v. Bradley, 165 Cal. 237, 131 Pac. 750, cited by respondent. In that case the grantor had conveyed title to land by grant deed to enable the grantee to effect a loan thereon in plaintiff's favor. In order to make the land satisfactory security, a decree was obtained in the name of the grantee under the McEnerney Act (St. 1906 [Ex. Sess.] p. 78), confirming title in the grantee. This was done in good faith between the parties, and with the understanding that the title thus established in fee in the grantee was still to be held in trust for the grantor. In sustaining the rights of the grantor as against such decree this court said:

"And, finally, upon this subject it may be added, that relief is not here sought against a judgment fraudulently obtained. The relief is sought against the fraudulent use of a judgment obtained through understanding between the parties and in furtherance of a trust relationship which existed between them. That such relief may be secured against the fraudulent use of a judgment not fraudulently obtained is well recognized in equity."

The respondent here cannot be permitted to create a trust in his favor out of a transaction thus tainted with his own fraud and deceit.

[4] There has been much in the relations of the parties since the partition judgment to indicate that appellant had, as is claimed, and found by the trial court, given respondent assurances that this property would be restored to him on the repayment of moneys advanced by appellant on account of the land. Considerable sums of money have been advanced to respondent by appellant, without security, unless it was understood that respondent retained an interest in the property. The Gopcevic mortgage title was conveyed to appellant in consideration of money advanced to Gopcevic by appellant, and charged to respondent's account. Respondent has at all times remained in possession of the premises and claimed title thereto.

It cannot be said, however, under the pleadings in this case, in view of the final adjudication of title in appellant in the partition matter, that any of the subsequent transactions or oral promises are such as to reinvest respondent with a title which he can assert or quiet in this form of proceeding. As to what extent they might serve as a defense to an action by appellant to recover money advanced, or for possession of the premises, or in an action for affirmative relief upon pleadings based upon adverse possession, we express no opinion.

We have not discussed the relation of the Gopcevic execution sale to this title, for the reason that it is, in view of our holding as to the effect of the partition judgment, immaterial. If it could be held that respondent's deed to appellant was a mortgage, it would then be necessary to determine whether appellant had obtained an independent title through the sheriff's deed and the conveyance of Gopcevic. As held by the District Court of Appeal, from which this case comes to us on rehearing, we might have denied respondent relief under the well-established rule that one must come into a court of equity with clean hands; but if it were properly established here that appellant was attempting to hold this property under a deed executed to him as a mortgage, and that it was procured by fraudulent connivance with the respondent to defeat the claim of respondent's divorced wife, we should hesitate, in view of such double fraud by the appellant, to permit, as between the two offenders, the appellant to remain the beneficiary of the fraud.

As we view the facts and law of the case, we think respondent is barred in this action by the former judgment in the partition suit.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by Fred A. Heilbron and others against Charles E. Sumner and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

S. J. Higgins and A. F. H. Wright, both of San Diego, for appellants.

Heskett & Sample, Charles E. Sumner, and Heskett, Sample & Harden, all of San Diego, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment given in the court below upon an agreed case submitted to it, as provided by sections 1138, 1139, and 1140 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The plaintiffs are members of the common council of the city of San Diego, and the defendants are the members of the board of water commissioners of said city.

The matter submitted for decision was the question whether the common council of the city, or the board of water commissioners of the city, is empowered to expend a certain fund in the city treasury obtained by the sale of bonds issued by the city, pursuant to an election authorizing the same, to raise funds for the acquisition, construction, and completion of a dam on Cottonwood river at a place known as Barrett dam site, in the county of San Diego, but outside of the city of San Diego. The dam was to be made for the purpose of impounding water. Apparently the city is carrying on a system of waterworks for the distribution of water within the city for municipal, domestic, and other uses, and the said dam is to constitute a part of that system. The case is argued by both parties on that theory, and we will assume it to be true, although the agreed statement does not so declare.

[1] We are of the opinion that the power to erect said dam or contract for the erection thereof and expend the said sum for so doing is lodged in the common council of the city, and not in the board of water commissioners. The bonds were issued under the provisions of the bonding act of 1901. Stats. 1901, p. 27. This act provides a method of procedure for the calling of an election to submit the question of the issuance of the bonds to popular approval and authorizes the issue thereof in case the election is favorable thereto. Section 9 of the act, as amended in 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 611), provides that—

"In cities, towns, or municipalities operating under a charter, heretofore or hereafter framed under section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution and providing for a board of public works all the matters and things required in this section to be done and performed by the legislative branch of the municipality shall be done and performed by the board of public works of such city, town or municipality, and, in case such charter also prescribes the manner of letting and entering into contracts for the furnishing of labor, materials or supplies for the constructing or completion of public works or improvements, the contracts therefor shall be let and entered into in conformity with such charter."

[2] The city of San Diego in 1919 amended its charter, so as to come under section 6, article 11, of the Constitution, as amended in 1914, authorizing cities having a freeholders' charter to empower themselves to make and enforce laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations in their charters. Section 1, c. 2, art. 2, subd. 54, p. 1532, Stats. 1919. As a result thereof the city is not subject to general laws in matters concerning municipal affairs, except as the charter itself may provide. Civic Center Ass'n v. R. R. Com., 175 Cal. 448, 166 Pac. 351; Morgan v. Los Angeles, 187 Pac. 1052. Section 52 of the same section, amended at the same time, provides that—

"The common council shall have charge, superintendence and control of all public works of every kind, where not otherwise provided for in this charter, to be done for the city, or for any board or department thereof, and also of the furnishing of all labor, work, materials, and supplies for said city. This charge, superintendence and control of public work shall be subject, however, to such ordinances as the common council may from time to time adopt."

No ordinance has been adopted in regard to the matter here in controversy transferring any power to the board of water commissioners, and therefore the powers of the common council remain as stated in subdivision 52. This subdivision was a re-enactment of the provision as it previously stood in that section of the charter. It is obvious that the matter of erecting a dam for the purpose of impounding water for use in the public water system carried on by the city of San Diego for the benefit of itself and its inhabitants is exclusively a municipal affair. Consequently, since the charter provides that the council shall have charge thereof, the provisions of the act of 1901 and the amendment thereto in 1907, providing that in cities which have a board of public works that board shall have charge of the expenditures of money raised by the issuance of bonds under that act, is rendered nugatory by the provision of the charter. The charter prevails over the general law in regard to all municipal affairs concerning which the charter speaks. The question is therefore to be determined with reference solely to the provisions of the charter itself, for the general law aforesaid is not applicable. Furthermore, it is to be observed that the charter of the city of San Diego does not provide for any board of public works, and hence it does not come within the terms of the proviso in section 9 of the bonding act aforesaid.

Other provisions of the charter confirm the proposition that the matter is committed to the common council. Subdivision 29 of section 1 aforesaid of the charter provides that the council shall have power "to adopt, enter into and carry out means for securing a supply of water for the use of the city, or its inhabitants, or for irrigating purposes therein, and along the line of its water supply." This provision confers upon the common council power to use all means necessary for securing a supply of water. It would therefore include the power to contract for the construction of a dam, and to use the money of the city and supervise its expenditure for such construction, to impound the water necessary for the city use.

We find nothing in the charter which has the effect of transferring this power to the board of water commissioners. In 1919 the charter was further amended by adding a new chapter to article 5 thereof, numbered I, providing for a "water development board." This chapter created the board of water commissioners, the defendant herein, and confers upon it all the power that it has. Section 4 provides that said board "shall have exclusive charge and supervision of the conservation and impounding of water by said city and of the water, water rights, waterworks, water impounding system, and other properties of said city used in the development of said water impounding system." It is under this provision that the board of water commissioners claims the authority to have exclusive charge of the construction of the said dam and of the expenditure of the bond money for that purpose. But, in view of the other provisions of the charter, we think the proper construction of this section is that the board shall have charge of the operation and preservation of said system after it is constructed and that it was not the intention to confer upon the board exclusive power to provide for and construct the waterworks of which it is to have supervision. The several provisions of the charter should be harmonized as far as possible.

If the contention in behalf of the board as to the effect of section 4 is correct, the result would be that the two provisions we have referred to are in direct conflict; one giving the power to the common council and the other giving the same power to the board of water commissioners, both provisions being adopted at the same time. It is reasonable to believe that the intention was to charge the common council with the duty of providing the waterworks, and charge the board of water commissioners with the duty of taking charge and supervision of the system after it is provided. This is indicated, also, by the fact that in chapter I aforesaid, relating to the water development department, section 7 creates a "water development fund," which is to consist of "not less than twenty-five per centum of the gross receipts derived from the sale of water by the city of San Diego, and of such other moneys as may be transferred into said fund. Said fund shall be used for the management, maintenance and development of the water development system." This obviously refers to a water development system already constructed, and it indicates that the board of water commissioners is to use one-fourth of the revenue from the sale of water, obtained by it in its supervision of the system, for the upkeep and further development of the system, so far as may be possible with said fund. The matter of transferring other money to said fund is, by other provisions of the charter, left wholly within the power of the common council. Consequently no portion of the fund can be transferred to the water development fund unless the council shall so determine. All this furnishes additional reason for holding that the power to construct the works and control the expenditure of the money therefor is lodged in the council.

[3] Another provision of the charter (sections 12 and 13, c. 2, art. 6) provides that the common council must not contract debts or liabilities exceeding the income and revenue for any year without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters of the city voting at an election on the subject, and that the proceedings taken for raising the money "shall be in accordance with the provisions of the general law in force at the time such proceedings are taken." Section 12 also provides that the council must not contract a debt in excess of the above limit, except after the election therein specified, and that in incurring such indebtedness the council must "proceed in accordance with the general law" in force at the time. These provisions do not, in our opinion, apply to a liability or indebtedness incurred in entering into a contract for the construction of the works to be constructed with the bond money, but refers to the liability incurred by the issuance and sale of the bonds and the procurement of the money to be used in the erection of the works; that is, the liability for such bonded indebtedness. None of these provisions takes away or affects the power given to the common council by the charter provisions first above mentioned. The conclusion is that the power in question is not in the board of water commissioners, but is vested in the common council.

In re BOSSE'S ESTATE. (S. F. 9565.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 17, 1921.)

1. Courts ⇨202(5)—Presumption favors jurisdiction of probate court.

On appeal points made by appellant must be considered in the light of the provision that orders and decrees made by the superior court in probate proceedings need not recite the existence of facts or the performance of acts on which jurisdiction depends, but that the decrees need only contain the matters ordered or adjudged except as otherwise provided, Code Civ. Proc. § 1704, and the rule that every intentment is in favor of the decree.

2. War ⇨12—Constitutional rights of enemy corporation not invaded by turning over its property to Alien Property Custodian.

As Trading with the Enemy Act, as amended (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115½a-3115½j), was expressly excepted from the operation of the joint resolution terminating war-time acts adopted March 3, 1921, and the former act itself provides that it shall remain in force until the end of the war, and the war not having been declared ended at the time of a probate decree declaring property to belong to a German corporation, no constitutional rights were violated by decree turning over the property to the Alien Property Custodian.

3. War ⇨12—Demand and notice presumed in favor of decree giving property to Alien Property Custodian.

Where the enemy alien character of the appellant corporation is apparent on the face of the decree, in view of the fact that every intentment in favor of the probate decree distributing the property of appellant to the Alien Property Custodian, it must be presumed that such Custodian, shown by the decree to have been represented by counsel when the distribution was ordered, had regularly appeared and made any and all demands and given all notice essential under the Trading with the Enemy Act, as amended (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115½a-3115½j), in the manner provided by the act.

4. War ⇨12—Probate decree giving Alien Property Custodian full control of property decreed to belong to alien enemy corporation held required by act.

The provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Act, as amended (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115½a-3115½j), particularly section 7, subd. "c," relating to requirements of the President as to conveyance to the Alien Property Custodian, and section 12, providing that money received by the Custodian shall be deposited to the Treasurer of the United States to be administered with other property by him as a common-law trustee, required the superior court in the distribution of property decreed to belong to an alien enemy corporation to assign the same to the Alien Property Custodian, in view of demand made and notice given by him, to be held and accounted for by him as provided in the act, properly guarding in the decree all the rights of appellant corporation.

5. War ⇨12—Superior court sitting in probate might distribute property decreed to Alien Property Custodian.

Notwithstanding the limited function of superior courts in probate matters under our statutes, the superior court had the right, in decreeing property to belong to an alien enemy corporation, to provide for its distribution to the United States Alien Property Custodian, since any distribution which did not regard the interest of the United States would be in substantial violation of the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Act, as amended (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115½a-3115½j).

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thomas C. Denny, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of C. Bosse, deceased. From a portion of a decree of final distribution decreeing property to the appellant, but distributing it to Francis P. Garvan, as Alien Property Custodian of the United States, to be accounted for by him, the Reichsausschuss der Kriegsbeschädigten und Kriegshinterbliebenenfürsorge appeals. Decree affirmed.

Gustav Gutsch, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John S. Partridge, Garret W. McEnerney, and H. D. Lempke, all of San Francisco (John K. M. Ewing, of Washington, D. C., and V. K. Butler, Jr., of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from a part of the decree of final distribution in the matter of the estate of C. Bosse, deceased, which was given and made May 7, 1920. By this decree Marie Bosse, mother and sole heir at law of the deceased, a resident of Bremen, Germany, and a public corporation named the Reichsausschuss der Kriegsbeschädigten und Kriegshinterbliebenenfürsorge, organized for the purpose of dispensing funds for war sufferers and having its principal place of business at Berlin, Germany, were adjudged to be entitled to the whole of the residue of the estate, consisting entirely of personal property, the respective interests being fully defined and specified, subject to the rights of Francis P. Garvan, as Alien Property Custodian, under and by virtue of the terms of an act of Congress known as the Trading with the Enemy Act, approved October 6, 1917 (40 U. S. Stat. 411), as amended November 4, 1918 (40 Stat. 1020 [U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115½a-3115½j]). This appeal is taken by such public corporation from the further portion of said decree which is as follows:

"And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that all the money and property to which the said Marie Bosse and the said" public corporation "are entitled under the terms of this decree be, and the same are hereby, distributed to the said Francis P. Garvan as such Alien Property Custodian, to be held, administered, and accounted for by said Alien Property Custodian as provided by law and as provided for by this decree defining the interests of the said Marie Bosse and the said" public corporation "therein, and that the said executor be and he is hereby ordered and directed to deliver to said Alien Property Custodian the estate so distributed."

It is claimed that this portion of the decree was unauthorized. The record on appeal brought here by appellant consists solely of the decree and the notice of appeal.

[1, 2] We must consider the points made by appellant in the light of the statutory provisions that orders and decrees made by the court in probate proceedings "need not recite the existence of facts, or the performance of acts, upon which the jurisdiction of the court or judge may depend, but it shall only be necessary that they contain the matters ordered or adjudged, except as otherwise provided" (section 1704, Code Civ. Proc.), and of the rule that every intendment is in favor of the decree. It must now be taken as settled, in view of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court (see Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & W. Co., 251 U. S. 146, 40 Sup. Ct. 106, 64 L. Ed. 194), that at the time this decree was made a state of war still existed between this country and Germany, notwithstanding the cessation of actual hostilities, and that, at least in so far as any provision thereof material here is concerned, the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Act were still in force and effect. It should be noted that, among other acts of Congress, "the act known as the Trading with the Enemy Act * * * and all amendments thereto," and all proclamations issued under the authority conferred by such act, were expressly excepted from the effect and operation of the joint resolution terminating war-time acts adopted by Congress March 3, 1921. The act itself provided that it shall remain in full force until "the end of the war," which is defined in the act to mean "the date of proclamation of exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace, unless the President shall, by proclamation, declare a prior date." We see no force whatever in the suggestion that any constitutional right of appellant is infringed by the enforcement of the Trading with the Enemy Act according to its terms, at any time prior to the ratification of a treaty of peace, notwithstanding the actual cessation of hostilities. The courts may not lawfully refrain from enforcing the registered will of the legislative and executive departments of the government in this matter, if such departments have not exceeded the power conferred upon them by the Constitution.

[3] The enemy alien character of appellant is apparent on the face of the decree. Upon the record, in view of the fact that every intendment is in favor of the decree, it must be presumed that the Alien Property Custodian, who, the decree shows, was represented by counsel when distribution was ordered, had regularly appeared in the proceeding and made any or all demands and given all the notice essential under the Trading with the Enemy Act in the manner provided by the act.

[4] We have seen that the decree as given fully adjudicated and defined the right of appellant with regard to the property to which it was entitled, subject to the rights of the Alien Property Custodian under the Trading with the Enemy Act, with the result that in any subsequent proceeding on the part of appellant for accounting and delivery of the property appellant's rights as absolute owner, subject only to the provisions of the act, stand judicially declared. As to this no complaint is made. The claim of error is solely as to the subsequent portion of the decree which "distributes" such property to which appellant is so entitled to such Alien Property Custodian to be held, administered, and accounted for by him as provided by law and as provided by the decree defining appellant's interest. It appears plain to us that this portion of the decree is in substantial accord with the requirements of that act and the proclamation of the President thereunder. The act provides (section 6) for an Alien Property Custodian, "who shall be empowered to receive all money and property in the United States belonging to an enemy, * * * which may be paid, conveyed, transferred, assigned or delivered to said custodian under" its provision. By section 7, subd. "c," it is provided that, "if the President shall so require," any money or property belonging to or held for an enemy not holding a license granted by the president under the act "shall be conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered or paid over to such Custodian, or may be seized by him, to be held, administered and disposed of as provided in the act." By section 12 it is provided that all moneys received by such Custodian shall be deposited in the treasury of the United States, and that all other property so received shall be held and administered by him as a common-law trustee, and that after the end of the war any claim of an enemy to any money or property so received and held shall be settled as Congress may direct. By executive order of October 12, 1917, the President vested in the Alien Property Custodian the executive administration of all the provisions of section 7, subd. "c," including the power and authority conferred upon him to require the conveyance, transfer, assignment, etc., of any money or property belonging to or held for any enemy. By executive order of February 26, 1918, it was provided that such Custodian might make demand for any such conveyance, etc., and that, when such demand is made and notice given as provided, "such demand and notice shall forthwith vest in the Alien Property Custodian such right, title, interest, and estate in and to and possession of the money or other property demanded, and such power or authority thereafter as may be included within the demand." The plain effect of these provisions was to require the superior court, in any distribution of appellant's interest that it might make, to assign the same to the Alien Property Custodian, in view of the demand made and notice given, which we must assume, to be held and accounted for by him as provided in the act, properly guarding within the decree all the right of the appellant in relation thereto. This appears to be recognized by all the authorities to which our attention has been called. See In re Kelly, 101 Misc. Rep. 495, 167 N. Y. Supp. 256; Estate of Gregg, 266 Pa. 189, 109 Atl. 777; Matter of Schaefer, 112 Misc. Rep. 308, 182 N. Y. Supp. 732; Keppelmann v. Palmer (N. J.) 108 Atl. 432. In Youghiogheny, etc., Co. v. Lasevich, 171 Wis. 347, 176 N. W. 855, involving awards by the State Industrial Commission in favor of alien enemies in which the Commission ordered the awards paid to the Alien Property Custodian, the court said:

"We cannot doubt * * * that the Alien Property Custodian, under his appointment by the President, became vested with an interest and qualified title to the moneys and property so acquired and invested him with substantial rights and interest to the exclusion of the enemy."

We think the right of the Alien Property Custodian to such a disposition of the property on distribution as will give him full control of the property for the purposes of the act is fully recognized by what is said in Estate of Henrichs, 180 Cal. 175, 181, 179 Pac. 883.

[5] We are of the opinion that there is no substantial force in the claim that, in view of our statute, the superior court was without power to incorporate this provision in its decree. The contention to the contrary is based upon the theory as to the limited function of superior courts in probate matters, under our state statutes. It is claimed that thereunder the court on distribution is limited to an ascertainment of the heirs, legatees, and devisees, and a distribution to them, or to other persons to whom such heirs, legatees, or devisees may have conveyed their interests. The provision is, in substance, but a recognition of the interest of the representative of the government in the property under the terms of the Trading with the Enemy Act, which interest gives to him the right of possession for the purposes of the act, accompanied by a direction that such possession be given. The objection of appellant is based upon the theory of a special and limited jurisdiction vested by our state law in superior courts in the transaction of probate business. The provision complained of is in substance but an award of the possession of the property otherwise adjudged by the court to belong to the appellant to the proper representative of the government for the purposes of the Trading with the Enemy Act, and, in our opinion, was such a provision as the court was required by such act to make if it undertook to then finally distribute the property of the estate. Any distribution which did not guard the interest of the United States in the matter would be in substantial violation of the provisions of that act. See Estate of Henrichs, 180 Cal. 175, 181, 179 Pac. 883. The decree as made fully recognized and adjudged the rights of appellant as required by our statute and the award of the possession of the property in the hands of the executor to the Alien Property Custodian for the purposes of the Trading with the Enemy Act was simply in conformity with requirements of an act of Congress adopted in the valid exercise of its war power, to which all courts in the land, state as well as federal, must conform. This view is fully sustained by the authorities hereinbefore cited.

The decree is affirmed.

PALADINI v. MUNICIPAL MARKETS CO.
(L. A. 6556.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 18, 1921.)

1. Judgment ☞595—Suit for portion of single account bars subsequent suit for balance.

Where the items of a claim arose upon the same running account, and the entire amount was due when a suit was begun for a portion only of the items, the judgment in that suit would be a bar to a subsequent suit on the remaining items of the account, since a party cannot split up a single cause of action and make it the basis of several suits.

2. Judgment ☞951(1)—Burden is on defendant to establish that former judgment was for portion of same account.

In an action for goods sold and delivered, the burden is on the defendant to prove his asserted defense that goods for which recovery is sought were purchased on the same account as goods for which recovery had been had in a prior action.

3. Judgment ☞595—Accounts from separately operated branch houses of same proprietor are separate.

Where a proprietor of several branch houses operated each branch separately, a purchase of goods by the same customer from two different branches creates two separate accounts, so that a recovery for the goods purchased from one branch would not bar a subsequent action for the price of goods purchased from another.

4. Judgment ☞951(4) — Evidence of purchase from separate branch houses held to rebut presumption of single account.

Even though proof that all the items covered by the two accounts separately sued on were for fish sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant within two years prior to the first suit is sufficient prima facie showing that both claims arose on one open account, such showing is rebutted by proof that plaintiff was operating two branch houses, and that the goods formerly sued for were purchased at a different branch from those involved in the case at bar, though the plaintiff's evidence that the branches were separately operated was not conclusive.

5. Appeal and error ☞934(2) —Presumption in favor of judgment held not to sustain plea in abatement.

The rule that every presumption should be most strongly applied in support of the judgment is not to be pressed too far on a purely technical defense by plea in abatement so as to defeat recovery for the price of goods admittedly received, especially where the expression of the court at the trial indicated that, because of an erroneous view of the law, the evidence determining the validity of the plea in abatement was considered immaterial.

6. Pleading ☞34(4), 111—Pleas in abatement are not favored.

Pleas in abatement are not favored, and should be subjected to strict construction both as to pleading and evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by A. Paladini against the Municipal Markets Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wm. M. Morse, Jr., and Samuel B. Dannis, both of Los Angeles, and Hoefler, Cook & Snyder, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Fred. W. Heatherly, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. The plaintiff in this action was engaged in the wholesale trade of selling fish. He had branch establishments operating such business in various cities of California, one of which was at San Francisco, and one at Monterey. Within two years prior to June 29, 1917, he had sold fish and fish products to the defendant, a dealer in Los Angeles, to the amount of $1,043.75. While all of said amount was due and owing, plaintiff brought suit in the justices' court of Los Angeles against the defendant and obtained judgment therein on an account for $231.82, for part of the goods which went to make up the total indebtedness of $1,043.75. The present action was brought subsequently in the superior court of Los Angeles county on an account for $811.93, the remaining sum of said total indebtedness. Judgment was for the defendant.

It is the defendant's contention that all the items aggregating the total amount constituted a single, open, and running account between the parties.

The defendant set up as its sole defense, and the trial court found:

"That each and every and all items constituting the account mentioned in the amended complaint on file herein, and each and every and all the items constituting the amount sued upon and mentioned in said action in said justices' court, constituted, and do now constitute, a part and parcel of said open and running account existing between plaintiff and defendant prior to said 29th day of June, 1917, and were, by reason thereof, necessarily involved in said former action," —and further:

"That by reason of the said premises this action" is barred by the adjudication and judgment in the justices' court.

It is upon the correctness of this finding and conclusion of the court that the judgment appealed from depends.

[1] Appellant does not dispute that, if the items of this entire claim arose upon the same running account, and that the entire amount was due and owing when the suit in the justices' court was begun, the failure to prosecute the entire claim in one action would be a bar to the subsequent suit on the remaining items of the account. It is clearly established that a party may not split up a single cause of action and make it the basis of several suits, and in such case the first action may be pleaded in abatement of any subsequent suit on the same claim. 15 R. C. L. Judgments, § 440; Van Horne v. Treadwell, 164 Cal. 620, 130 Pac. 5; Bingham v. Kearney, 136 Cal. 175, 68 Pac. 597; Bolen Coal Co. v. Whittaker Brick Co., 52 Kan. 747, 35 Pac. 810.

[2] It is appellant's contention that the evidence does not sustain the finding that there was but a single account involved in both suits. The defense was an affirmative one, and the burden was on the defendant to establish it. The only evidence supporting this defense was the showing that all of the items covered by the entire claim were for fish sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant within two years prior to the first suit. Conceding that this was sufficient as a prima facie showing that both claims arose on one open and running account, was it rebutted by the undisputed fact that plaintiff was carrying on his business in separate establishments, one at San Francisco and one at Monterey, and that the suit brought in the justices' court was for fish bought and delivered from the Monterey branch, and the present action was for fish bought and delivered from the San Francisco house?

[3] We think there can be no question that where a single proprietor is conducting the same line of business in different towns and localities, operating them independently so far as dealing with customers is concerned, and keeping separate accounts as between the several branches of the business, that the liability of purchasers from one or the other constitutes a separate account, even though the same customer buys from more than one of the branches. This must necessarily be so to keep any systematic check on the various branches of the business, and it would be an intolerable hardship on the proprietor to have to marshal the accounts of all his branch houses before he could press to judgment any one of them. In the absence of controlling authority to the contrary, we should be constrained to hold as a matter of business policy that for purposes of all dealings with his customers the proprietor is entitled to operate his branch houses as separate and independent establishments, and our attention has been called to no authority to the contrary. The citations in support of this contention, so far as they go, tend to uphold the doctrine.

The principle governing this matter is well illustrated in Secor v. Sturgis, 16 N. Y. 548, in which the same defense in abatement of a second action upon a single and indivisible claim was interposed. The plaintiff was a copartnership carrying on the business of ship carpenters and ship chandlers. The two branches of the business were operated in the same building, but separately, one or more members of the firm conducting the carpenter business, and another the ship-chandler business. They rendered services and furnished materials to the ship of defendant at the same time. It was held that there were two accounts which could be sued separately. The principle stated is that where the several items have their origin in one contract, as on an agreement to sell and deliver goods or perform services or advance money, it is a single cause of action, and that in the case of a running account it may be fairly implied that it is in pursuance of an agreement that an account may be opened and continued either for a period or at the pleasure of one of the parties. But there must be an express contract, or the circumstances must be such as to raise an implied contract, embracing all the items where they arise at different times in order to make a single demand or cause of action. The court in its opinion says:

"Applying this test to the present case, it is very clear that the two accounts did not constitute an entire claim; but, on the contrary, that they were several, and formed two several causes of action. The business of the plaintiffs consisted of two branches, which were designed to be and were kept entirely distinct, in each of which one of the accounts was made. * * * Here was no express contract connecting the two accounts; and the facts, instead of warranting the presumption of such a contract, show that separate agreements only, one in regard to each account, were intended."

That the distinction here made was not based upon the different classes of service carried on in the two branches of the business is shown by the comment of the opinion upon another decision, where it is said:

"In Colvin v. Corwin [15 John, 432], two suits were brought for lottery tickets sold the defendant. On the trial of the first the defendant admitted he had bought the tickets alleged to have been sold to him, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff. The judgment was set up as bar in the second suit, and on the trial it appeared that the tickets claimed in the suits were delivered to the defendant by two different agents of the plaintiff, at different offices occupied by them, at different times, and it was held by the Supreme Court that the previous judgment was a bar to a recovery. It is manifest that this decision rests on no sound principle, and is not law. A plainer case of distinct independent causes of action could hardly be presented."

Other authorities cited, recognizing the distinction here stated, are: Borngegger v. Harrison, 12 Wis. 544, 78 Am. Dec. 757; Johnson v. Pirtle, 1 Swan (Tenn.) 262; 1 Corp. Juris, 1113; 23 Cyc. 1178; Cook v. Conners, 215 N. Y. 175, 109 N. E. 78, L. R. A. 1916A, 1074, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 248.

The rule is laid down in Hall v. Susskind, 109 Cal. 203, 41 Pac. 1012, that—"It is only where a claim is founded upon one entire contract, or upon one single or continuous tortious act, that it cannot be divided into distinct demands, and be made the subject of separate actions."

The difficulty in this case is that the evidence as to the manner in which the branches of plaintiff's business at San Francisco and Monterey were conducted, and their relations to each other, is very meagre and unsatisfactory. Plaintiff's counsel made several attempts to show affirmatively that the accounts were kept separately, and that the branch establishments were conducted independently of each other, but the evidence given to that effect was stricken out by the court as a statement of the conclusion of the witness. No exception is taken to the rulings of the court in excluding this evidence.

[4] We are inclined to the opinion, however, that the undisputed fact that plaintiff was operating these two branch houses, and that the account sued on in the justices' court was ordered and delivered from the Monterey branch, and the account sued on in the present action was ordered and delivered from the San Francisco branch negatives any presumption of a single running account that might have arisen from the mere fact that the entire indebtedness was to a single creditor for the same line of goods throughout.

[5, 6] The account sued for was admittedly owing and unpaid, and the rule that every presumption should be most strongly applied in support of the judgment ought not to be pressed too far on a purely technical defense. Pleas in abatement are not favored, and should be subjected to strict construction both as to pleading and evidence. Thompson v. Lyon, 14 Cal. 39; Cal. Sav. & L. Soc. v. Harris, 111 Cal. 133, 43 Pac. 525; Reed & Co. v. Harshall, 12 Cal. App. 697, 108 Pac. 719. This is particularly true here in view of the fact that the court made no finding to indicate its attitude upon the effect of the separate branch houses upon the unity of the account. In fact, it may be inferred from the ruling upon the admission of evidence that the court did not attach any significance to the question as to whether the plaintiff was conducting separate branches of his business, or made part of the sales from one establishment and part from another. In sustaining an objection to a question by plaintiff's counsel to the treasurer of the defendant company in which he was asked if he did not know that plaintiff had different branches in different parts of the state, the court remarked that—

"It doesn't make any difference. They are all his, and he is bound to know what goes on in every one of them."

The court of appeal in affirming the judgment of the trial court evidently took the same position, disposing of this part of the evidence by the statement that—

"The goods were all ordered from plaintiff, and the fact that he had different branches of his business from which a part of the goods were shipped in filling the defendant's orders is immaterial."

It is with this view of the law that we differ, and, in the light of the fact that the subject-matter of these separate suits arose on sales from different branches of the business at different localities, we hold that there could be no controlling presumption that they constituted but one account.

The judgment is reversed.

1. Wills $\Leftarrow$ 14—Bequest to city for pleasure pier must be made 30 days before decease of testator, city not being a "state institution" and the use not being "for use or benefit of state."

Under Civ. Code, § 1313, as amended by St. 1917, p. 272, providing that no estate shall be bequeathed or devised to any charitable or benevolent society or corporation or to any person in trust for charitable uses, except done by will executed 30 days before decease of testator, but that bequest or devise to the state or to any "state institution" or "for use or benefit of the state" or any state institution are excepted, a bequest to municipality of fund to build a pleasure pier is not excepted; the municipality not being a "state institution," and the use not being "for use or benefit of state."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, State Institution.]

2. Charities $\Leftarrow$ 38—City receiving gift by will held not entitled to sequester fund before performance of condition.

Under a will directing trustee to pay the city such a sum up to $100,000 as is necessary to build a pleasure pier on condition that city raise a like fund and that bequest should fall into residue if condition was not performed, the city, without performing or guaranteeing the condition, may not sue the trustee to sequester the $100,000 fund for use of the city.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of George W. Houk, deceased. Action by the City of Oceanside against Margaret Houk Moody and others, to sequester a fund bequeathed by George W. Houk, deceased. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. L. Richardson, of San Diego, for appellant.

Donald Barker and Meserve & Meserve, all of Los Angeles (Wm. H. Neblett, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

SLOANE, J. The city of Oceanside is attempting by this action to have a certain fund set aside to its use under the last will of one George W. Houk.

The will under which the plaintiff claims, after making certain personal bequests, gives, devises, and bequeaths the residue of the estate to a trustee "to have and to hold in trust for the uses and purposes and with the powers hereinafter stated." Among the subsequent provisions is the following:

"My said trustee shall, subject to the conditions hereinafter mentioned, pay to the city of Oceanside, county of San Diego, state of California, such sum that may be necessary, up to, but not in excess of, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000.00) providing said city of Oceanside donates a like sum, and providing further that said city builds within three years after my death with said money, a pleasure pier, the site to be selected by my trustee. Upon the failure of the said city to perform said conditions, then the said sum shall be distributed with the residue of the trust property."

Without having taken any steps to perform or guarantee the conditions imposed upon the municipality precedent to the enjoyment of this fund, the city of Oceanside brings this action to obtain an order of court distributing to the trustee for the purposes of this use the sum of $100,000. The appeal is from the order of court denying this application.

The grounds of objection interposed by the defendant, representing the estate, are: (1) That the attempted bequest is invalid under the provision of section 1313 of the Civil Code that "no estate, real or personal, shall be bequeathed or devised to any charitable or benevolent society or corporation, or to any person * * * in trust for charitable uses, except the same be done by will duly executed at least thirty days before the decease of the testator"; (2) that if valid in its creation the trust was not effective or operative for any purpose until the city of Oceanside had qualified to receive the benefits by providing a like fund as specified in the will; (3) that the bequest is void for uncertainty, in that it cannot be determined therefrom the amount necessary for the purpose designated; (4) that the trust is not one that is authorized under section 857 of the Civil Code or any other provision of said Code.

The testator died within 30 days of the execution of this will, and it is conceded by appellant that the trust declared is for a charitable use. Appellant, however, relies upon the amendment of section 1313 by the Legislature of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 272) to take this bequest out of the 30-day limitation of the statute. The provision of the amendment is:

"That bequests and devises to the state, or to any state institution, or for the use or benefit of the state or any state institution, are excepted from the restrictions of this section."

[1] It would require an unjustifiable exercise of construction by implication to extend this proviso to cover a bequest to the use of a municipality of the state for the erection of a purely municipal improvement. The city of Oceanside, or the city of San Francisco, or the city of Los Angeles, is not the state nor a state institution. It is true that cities and counties are agencies of the state, and for certain purposes branches of the state government, and they are state institutions in the general sense that they are organized by state authority and for state purposes. We have, however, agencies of the state for certain limited and specific purposes, such as prisons, hospitals, asylums, and similar establishments, which are officially known as state institutions, both under the Constitution and the statutes. Const. art. 10; art. 4, § 22; Pol. Code, tit. 5. In Chalfant v. State, 37 Ohio St. 60, state institutions are defined as institutions belonging to and owned by the state, and not such as might belong to particular municipalities. Municipalities are under the law classified by themselves, and we doubt if an instance can be found where a municipal corporation is defined or classified by statutory enactment or judicial construction under the term "state institution."

Counsel for appellant places special stress upon the clause of the amendment referring to bequests "for the use or benefit of the state." It cannot be disputed that anything in the way of municipal improvement which benefits the municipality benefits the state as a whole. This would be the case were the beneficiary of that aid a private hospital, or charity of any kind which helped to carry the public burden, but that is obviously not what is meant by this provision of section 1313. When it is read with its context it will be apparent that the words "state" and "state institution" are to be read in the clause referred to precisely in the sense used in the preceding clause as referring to bequests directly to the state or in trust for the benefit of the state; directly to, or in trust for the benefit of any state institution.

It may be admitted that every reason of public policy would seem to favor applying the same exception of the statute against this 30-day limitation to bequests to municipalities and municipal institutions as to the state and state institutions, but the very obviousness of this implication makes it unlikely that the Legislature, if it had any such purpose in mind, would have failed to put it in the language which would be so naturally suggested. It can hardly be imagined if the Legislature had intended to include municipalities in this amendment that it would have failed to say so, by the addition of the simple word "municipality," which would have fairly obtruded itself upon them in framing this statute.

[2] In any event, we see no escape from the second objection interposed by respondent, namely, the admitted fact that the city of Oceanside at the time of bringing this proceeding had taken no steps to perform the condition precedent to any claim on this bequest. Under the terms of the will the city could only become entitled to this fund or any part of it upon performance of the condition that it raise a like amount to be devoted to the same purpose. That the bequest was to fail entirely if this was not done is shown by the last clause of the provision fixing a time limit within which the bequest could be made available. It is provided that upon failure of the city to perform the conditions, then the sum shall be distributed with the residue of the trust property. This clearly indicates that it was not to be severed from the balance of the residuary estate left to the trustee, unless or until these conditions were met.

It could not even be determined what sum the appellant would be entitled to until it had in some way signified the amount it would subscribe to the building of a pier, and what amount would be necessary for that purpose. The trust fund provided by the will was not the fixed sum of $100,000, but an amount necessary for such construction not to exceed $100,000, and that, only to the extent that the city of Oceanside duplicated the amount claimed from the estate by its own contribution. While it is true the petitioner was not asking in this proceeding for a distribution of the fund to itself, but only that it be placed in the hands of the trustee subject to said use, we are satisfied that until some steps had been taken to fix the amount to which the city would be entitled, and to perform the conditions without which it would not be entitled to anything, that no right existed to require any sequestration of this fund in its behalf.

In view of the conclusions reached as to the points discussed, it is unnecessary to consider the other matters of defense presented by respondents.

The judgment is affirmed.

GENERAL ACCIDENT, FIRE & LIFE ASSUR. CORPORATION et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 9633.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1921.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 12, 1921.)

1. Master and servant — 417(7)—Findings on substantial evidence in compensation case conclusive.

The findings and conclusions of the Industrial Accident Commission on questions of fact are conclusive if supported by substantial evidence, and cannot be reviewed by the Supreme Court on certiorari, under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917, §§ 67(a), 67(c).

2. Master and servant — 373—Accidental shooting by employer held injury "arising out of and in course of employment" within Compensation Act.

A garage employee repairing tires when struck by a bullet from employer's gun intended for a stranger with whom the employer had a controversy over the purchase of gasoline, resulting in the shooting by the employer to defend his business, held to have sustained an injury "arising out of and in the course of the employment," within Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917, § 6(a), in view of section 69(a), though the accident was unusual, and was not anticipated nor peculiar to the employment.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceedings under Workmen's Compensation Act by Samuel ShROUT for compensation for injuries, opposed by Fred BARR, employer, and the General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation, insurer. Award by Industrial Accident Commission for employee, and the employer and the insurer bring certiorari. Affirmed.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, Warren H. Pillsbury, and H. C. Kelsey, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHURTLEFF, J. Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission granting compensation to Samuel ShROUT, an employee of one Fred Barr, who, with the General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation, are the petitioners, hereinafter called the defendants.

The following is a brief statement of the facts:

The petitioner, ShROUT, was employed as an automobile tire repairer by Barr in the latter's garage in San Francisco. During the noon hour of the day upon which ShROUT was injured two men, strangers to Barr as well as ShROUT, drove their automobile into Barr's garage and asked him to serve them gasoline. ShROUT at the time was repairing the tires on an automobile some 40 or 50 feet from the point where the altercation hereinafter mentioned occurred, which was the character of the work he was employed to perform. One of the men in the automobile, addressing Barr, said, "Can we have some gasoline?" to which Barr replied, "Yes; if I have any gas." The tank from which Barr had been serving gasoline proved to be empty, and he stepped over to connect with another tank, when one of the men "hollered" to hurry and give them the gas, to which Barr replied, "Don't talk to me like that or you get no gas at all," whereupon both men jumped out of their automobile and struck him. At this point one of Barr's mechanics returned from his lunch and immediately came to Barr's assistance. During the quarrel Barr stated he was going to "ring up the police" and started up the steps leading to his office, which was one floor above the main floor of the garage, and where, presumably, his telephone was located. One of the two men followed him, and as Barr entered his office he saw all of his money lying on his desk where he had left it when called to serve the two strangers and other customers who had immediately preceded them. Barr testified:

"I pushed it [money] to one side, and the gun was lying there, and I grabbed it, and when he saw me do that he started to run down stairs, and * * * I followed him right to the top of the stairs, and he jumped from the top to the main floor, and I fired the shot right after."

The bullet missed the fleeing man, struck the floor, and, glancing, hit ShROUT, who, as has been said, was repairing tires in another part of the garage, and inflicting the wound forming the basis of the award. So far as appears ShROUT, took no part whatsoever in the controversy.

Counsel for defendants, with considerable force, insist that the injury to ShROUT did not arise out of and in the course of the employment, and for that reason he is not entitled to compensation under the act upon which this proceeding is founded. It is true that in order to uphold the award the injury suffered by ShROUT must have been one "arising out of and in the course of the employment." Section 6 (a), Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917; Coronado Beach v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 682-684, 158 Pac. 212.

[1] The findings and conclusions of the Commission on questions of fact are conclusive and final, if supported by substantial evidence, and cannot be reviewed by this court. Act, § 67 (c); Western Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407-418, 156 Pac. 491. Our jurisdiction is expressly confined to inquiring into and determining the "lawfulness" of the award (Act, § 67 [a]), and if, therefore, it is supported by substantial evidence, it must be affirmed.

In this case the Commission found that—

"The applicant, Samuel ShROUT, * * * while employed * * * by defendant Fred Barr, * * * sustained an injury occurring in the course of and arising out of his employment as follows: The employer became involved in a controversy with certain customers, and in the course thereof shot at one of them and the bullet struck the applicant [ShROUT], * * * causing a severe wound and fracture of the leg."

That the accident occurred in the course of the employment is obvious and does not admit of discussion. It happened while ShROUT was actually engaged in performing work usual to and included in his employment.

The serious question presented, and which is debatable, is: Was the injury suffered by ShROUT one "arising out of the employment"? The act does not define this phrase and no court has attempted to do so. It seems to be universally conceded that no comprehensive definition or unerring guide can be formulated which will determine with certainty the accidents embraced within it, and that therefore each case must be decided conformably to the specific facts it presents.

[2] In the present case the injury is largely, if not wholly, traceable to the acts of the employer. The controversy in which it was received arose out of an incident which concerned his business, namely, an application to purchase gasoline. That it ultimately resulted in a personal difference, or that the accident was an unusual one, not likely to occur, does not deprive it of its business character or establish that it did not arise out of the employment. That would, indeed, be a severe rule to apply in a case where, as here, the injured employee was blameless, and at the time he was injured was in his accustomed place, pursuing his usual employment in the business of his employer.

It is equally true that the fact that the injury to ShROUT was not an anticipated one, nor peculiar to the employment in which he was then engaged, does not defeat his claim to compensation if otherwise it is within the provisions of the act.

In State ex rel. Duluth Brewing & M. Co. v. District Court, etc., 129 Minn. 176, 151 N. W. 912, Mr. Justice Holt, in discussing the phrase "accidental injury arising out of the employment," appearing in the Minnesota Workmen's Compensation Act, which is substantially similar to the words "arising out of * * * the employment" found in our act, said:

"The term cannot be restricted to injuries caused from anticipated risks of the service if the law is to be of the benefit intended."

The injury to ShROUT was not intentional, nor was it contemplated, which tends to place it in the category of an accident arising out of the employment, for, as stated by respondent, it can fairly be said that to some extent the risk of shooting, holdups, assaults, and the like has in recent years become so closely associated with the garage business that it may be said that employment in such an industry is hazardous.

It is said that—

"If there is an incidental or causal connection between the employment and the accident, the injury is deemed to have arisen out of the former, even when the connection is somewhat remote, and when the direct and immediate agency of injury is foreign." Archibald v. Workmen's Compensation Commissioner, 77 W. Va. 448, 451, 87 S. E. 791-793.

This language, and the rule it declares, is applicable here because there is no escaping the conviction that there is present a causal connection between the employment and the incident which resulted in the injury to ShROUT. Moreover, such construction, and the resultant rule, is in compliance with the express mandate laid upon the courts by the terms of the act:

"That * * * it shall be liberally construed * * * with the purpose of extending the benefits of the act for the protection of persons injured in the course of their employment." Act, § 69 (a).

We think it can be said that ShROUT was injured, not merely because he happened to be in the garage at the time of the shooting, but because he was there, regularly employed, and hence exposed to all the dangers which might arise in the conduct and transaction of the business of his employer, including the reasonable protection of the latter's property and right to transact his business in an orderly manner.

The facts of the cases cited by the respective counsel are easily differentiated from those presented here, and hence none of them is exactly in point. They are in conflict touching the application and scope of the phrase "arising out of the employment," and a review of them could serve no useful purpose.

What are termed the "horseplay" cases, and the rule in them announced, have no application here. The injury sustained by ShROUT was not due to skylarking or a frolic, but was received in the course of a series of incidents which had their initiative in a business transaction of his employer and while the latter was actively and justifiably engaged in defending his business. The significance of the presence of these conditions is not lessened by the fact that when the incident is scanned under calmer surroundings it might appear that the exigencies of the occasion did not warrant the snooting.

When BARR began shooting, he voluntarily exposed ShROUT as well as all other employees to the danger of being shot, and the fact that the injury which resulted was unintentional and purely accidental does not, in our opinion, prevent ShROUT from recovering.

The court has given the facts presented upon this review a careful examination and painstaking consideration, and, considering all of the circumstances of the case, we think the evidence and the findings sustain the award, and it is therefore affirmed.

MURPHY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO
CO et al. (Civ. 3885.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 26, 1921, as Modified by Order of June 24, 1921, Denying Rehearing.)

Criminal law — 576(2) — Failure to dismiss criminal actions for delay in prosecution held no error.

Under the federal and state Constitutions, requiring a speedy and public trial, and under Pen. Code, § 1382, subd. 2, requiring the court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, to dismiss the prosecution, if a trial which was not postponed on application of the defendant was not begun within 60 days after the finding of the indictment, or filing of the information, a refusal to dismiss prosecutions pending more than 60 days is not error where trials could not be had because of the congested condition of the court docket.

Application by Edmund Murphy for a writ of mandate, to be directed to the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, and Louis H. Ward, Judge thereof. Writ denied.

See, also, People v. Murphy, 200 Pac. 484.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Matthew Brady and Leo R. Friedman, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco to dismiss a number of criminal actions pending therein in which the petitioner in this proceeding is the defendant, on the ground that said actions were not brought to trial within 60 days after the finding of the indictment against the defendant.

The federal Constitution, and also that of this state, provide that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, and the Penal Code of this state also contains a provision (section 1382, subd. 2) that—

From the record herein it appears that in the month of December, 1920, six indictments for felony were found against the petitioner; that upon one of them he was tried and convicted in said superior court in the latter part of December, 1920, in consequence of which he is now serving a sentence of from 1 to 50 years. No trial has yet been had upon any of the remaining charges; but it is not seriously claimed that the 60 days within which the petitioner was entitled to be tried commenced to run until the 17th day of January, 1921. At that date, over the objection of petitioner, the court set the date upon which he should enter his plea to each of the pending indictments, to wit, March 12, 1921. The petition herein was filed April 15, 1921; and, while more than 60 days have elapsed since January 17th, still we think the petitioner is not entitled to have said indictments against him dismissed, for it appears from the return herein that the respondent was engaged practically all of the time between the finding of said indictments and March 25th in the trial of other causes, many of which had precedence over those in which the petitioner is defendant. The averment in the affidavit of the respondent in this behalf is as follows:

"That from the said 17th day of January, 1921, to and including said 12th day of March, 1921, there was no open day upon the calendar of said court upon which said petitioner could have been tried upon any one of said indictments, for the reason that there had prior to said 17th day of January, 1921, been set for trial 46 criminal actions wherein said defendants had entered their pleas, and said actions had been duly and regularly set for days certain for trial, which days extended from said 17th day of January, 1921, to and beyond said 12th day of March, 1921; that each and all of said 46 actions were of importance, and it was necessary in the interests of justice that said actions be forthwith tried; that of said 46 actions 30 thereof had been pending in said court a period longer than that of any of the aforesaid indictments against said petitioner; that, even though petitioner had been brought into court and allowed to plead to said indictments, such action could not have expedited his trial upon any of said indictments, nor could he have been tried upon any of said indictments prior to said 12th day of March, 1921."

Under the circumstances narrated, the petitioner was not entitled to have the indictments pending against him dismissed. People v. Vasalo, 120 Cal. 168, 52 Pac. 305; People v. Peter, 20 Cal. App. 151, 128 Pac. 415.

In its return the court has accounted for the delay up to the 25th day of March, 1921, the date when the motion to dismiss was made, and the petitioner has made no later motion to dismiss. It follows that the petition should be denied; and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. MURPHY. (Cr. 959.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 12, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 8, 1921.)

1. Rape $\S$ 51(4)—Evidence of lack of consent of woman held sufficient.

Evidence that the prosecutrix had been struck and beaten until unable to resist, and that sexual intercourse was against her consent and will, held sufficient to sustain a conviction of rape.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 372(1)—Admission of evidence of another crime, related to crime with which defendant was charged, held not error.

In a prosecution for rape, the admission of evidence that defendant and others had attempted to rape another woman at the same time of the offense charged against defendant held not erroneous, in view of evidence showing a conspiracy between defendant and others to rape both women.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 59(4)—Each conspirator liable for crime of the others committed in furtherance of conspiracy.

When a conspiracy to commit an offense of a certain class is shown, each conspirator is deemed guilty of every such crime committed in furtherance of the conspiracy by any of the conspirators.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 823(12)—Instruction as to credibility of witness held not erroneous in view of another instruction.

In a prosecution for rape, an instruction that the moral delinquency of the prosecutrix should not be considered as affecting her credibility was not erroneous, when given with instructions that the jury were sole judges of the weight and value of the evidence and the credibility of witnesses, in the absence of any evidence of unchastity or moral delinquency.

5. Rape $\S$ 40(1)—Witnesses $\S$ 340(3)—Evidence of unchastity, but not of moral delinquency, admissible.

On a trial for rape, evidence of the unchastity of the prosecutrix is admissible, as bearing on the question of consent, but evidence of her moral delinquency is inadmissible, as affecting her general credibility as a witness.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 1172(6)—Instruction held not prejudicial where omitted element appeared in evidence.

Where the evidence showed that defendant knew that he was suspected of crime, and tried to escape, an instruction that the flight was a circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining defendant's guilt was not prejudicial, though not stating that he must have had such knowledge.

7. Witnesses $\S$ 246(3)—Leading questions put to witness by court held not erroneous.

In a prosecution for rape, where the prosecutrix, through embarrassment, gave an ambiguous answer to a question, the asking of leading questions by the court in order to make the testimony certain was not erroneous.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 656(2)—Comment of court upon manner of witness held not error.

Where defendant's attorney asked that the record be made to show that a witness hesitated in answering a question, a comment of the court that the witness had not hesitated, and that some people hesitate so that they may be sure, was not an unfair comment on the evidence.

9. Courts $\S$ 113—Refusal to have record show that witness hesitated in answering a question not error.

The refusal of a trial judge to have the record show that a witness hesitated to answer a question was not error, since the hesitation was apparent to the jury, and the hesitation would not aid the appellate court in deciding questions of law.

10. Criminal law $\S$ 655(5)—Comment of court that counsel examining witness was "fishing" not misconduct.

The remark of the trial judge that defendant's counsel was on a "fishing excursion" in certain questioning is not misconduct, in the absence of a showing that defendant's cause was prejudiced thereby.

11. Criminal law $\S$ 1166 $\frac{1}{2}$ (12)—Statement by court concerning testimony held not prejudicial.

Where a witness made a statement concerning the identification of defendant, and later made a statement to the contrary, a remark of the court that the two statements amounted to the same thing was error; but, in view of the explanation by the witness that she did not recollect the circumstances when she answered the first question, and the fact that the variance in the answers was conceded, is not prejudicial.

12. Criminal law $\S$ 1170 $\frac{1}{2}$ (5) $\frac{1}{2}$ —Asking of questions by court held not to have harmed defendant.

The court's questions to a witness who was being cross-examined concerning her misidentification of a person, and his statements that he was not going to have the witness confused, etc., held not to have weakened the force of the misidentification, though the record did not show that the witness was confused, or needed any assistance or protection.

13. Criminal law $\S$ 649(1)—Refusal to postpone cross-examination of a witness held not error.

The refusal of the trial court to permit the cross-examination of a witness to be postponed is not error, in the absence of an attempt by defendant's counsel to recall the witness for further cross-examination at another time, and in absence of a showing of the subject of the proposed cross-examination.

14. Criminal law $\S$ 1170 $\frac{1}{2}$ (5) — Refusal to grant delay before cross-examination of witness held not prejudicial.

In the absence of a showing how the defense was prejudiced, the refusal of a delay until the next day before cross-examining a witness was not error, counsel having been granted 10 minutes in which to consult with his client.

15. Criminal law $\S$ 649(2)—Refusal of postponement not error.

When the trial had been in progress for only an hour, and it appeared that the defendant was seeking to delay the proceedings without good reason, the refusal to grant a continuance to enable defendant's counsel to examine his absent witnesses in a prearranged order was not error, especially where two of the absent witnesses subsequently testified, and the district attorney offered to stipulate that the other would testify as claimed.

16. Criminal law $\S$ 1035(3), 1037(2) — Misconduct of judge or district attorney must be called to attention of trial court.

In order to be considered on appeal, misconduct of the trial court or of the district attorney must be called to the attention of the trial court in order to give opportunity for its correction, and error must be assigned thereon.

KERRIGAN, J. Appeal of the defendant from a judgment of conviction of the crime of rape, and from the order denying motion for new trial.

The facts of the case are substantially as stated in the brief of the Attorney General as follows:

On Wednesday evening, November 24, 1920, Jessie Montgomery (whose marriage name is Matthias) was waiting on the corner of Sixteenth and Mission streets, San Francisco, for a car to take her to her home at 315 Fifth street. James Carey, whom she previously had met and danced with, drove by in an automobile. After recalling himself to her, he invited her and her chum, Miss Jean Stanley, into his car to be taken home. They were driven to Clark's Pool-room, on Mission street near Twentieth, and there were joined by Thomas Brady, a friend of Carey. The four then drove in Carey's car to the Stroller's Café, Ninth and Folsom streets, where each had one drink of sherry wine. Other drinks were served but they were consumed by the men; the girls did not partake of them.

While the four were in the café, defendant Murphy and Edward Kruvosky entered. There ensued a whispered conversation among the four men, the nature of which the girls do not know. But when the girls and their escorts left the premises by one door, Murphy, Kruvosky, and a third man, named Boyd, left by another door and jumped into the machine in which the four were seated. The car was driven to a shack on Howard street, and Murphy, Kruvosky, and Boyd alighted and entered the house, leaving the two girls and their escorts in the car. Upon one pretense and another Brady and Carey prevailed upon the girls to enter the Howard street place; they were admitted by Allan MacDonald, who locked the door after them. Carey and the two girls entered a front room, which was furnished with a table, chairs, and a mattress rolled up. Murphy had already gone out into the kitchen. Brady also went out into another room, and returned with MacDonald who brought in a round of drinks. The Stanley girl took none of them; the Montgomery girl took one-half of her own glass.

Kruvosky, in the meantime, had come in from the kitchen. With Brady holding one of her hands, Kruvosky put the glass to the Montgomery girl's lips, tilted her head back, and poured the liquor down her throat. Another drink was brought in, and the performance repeated. Brady next led the Montgomery girl into the kitchen, where Murphy and Kruvosky were. Murphy demanded that she sing, and, she refusing, insisted that she dance for them. Upon her refusal to dance Murphy struck her on the side of the jaw and felled her. Brady went up to her as she struggled to her feet, and said: "Go on; take off your clothes and dance for them," and upon her further refusal Murphy struck her to the floor a second time. This blow was so violent that she did not know what was going on; at times she did not know anything, and at other times she knew everything that was going on, but could not resist because her strength had failed her. The Montgomery girl screamed when she was hit, and the Stanley girl ran to her aid. Kruvosky hit the Stanley girl in the jaw, and Murphy hit her on the face, breaking her nose. Murphy then picked her up by the hips, held her on the floor, and "binged" her on the floor. Kruvosky then dragged the Montgomery girl, weakened as she was by the two fellings, into the bathroom adjoining, where he picked her up by the shoulders, threw her to the ground, and knocked her head against a washstand, pulled her to the floor, tore her dress from off her body, rolled her around upon the floor, soiling her underclothing, and finally ravished her. Murphy repeatedly thrust his head in the bathroom during this time and cried: "Hurry up, hurry up!" The girl knew nothing more until she found herself on the mattress in the front room. Here Murphy and Kruvosky pulled her clothes off her in the presence of Boyd, Carey, and Brady, and here Murphy, followed by the others in turn, violated her. These acts were done without her consent and against her will after she could not resist because her strength was gone, and she was absolutely powerless. She was never the wife of the defendant, and had never been married to him.

Carey had meanwhile led the Stanley girl into an adjoining bedroom and brought her a wet rag to bathe her bruised face. He left the room, and defendant entered. Defendant demanded that she submit to him. She refused, and he menacingly brandished a gun in her face. She persisted in her refusal. Defendant then picked her up and threw her on the couch, and held her legs; MacDonald seized her hands and Boyd her head, while Kruvosky, coatless, and with trousers unbuttoned, advanced to the attack. She struggled, begging them to kill her rather than to torture her like that, and finally all left the room save MacDonald. The Stanley girl then got MacDonald to leave the room. She broke the window and jumped out. About this time Carey came to the door of the room where the Montgomery girl was lying on a mattress and cried, "Hurry up, get your coats on; the cops are coming," and Murphy, Kruvosky, Carey, Brady, and Boyd left. The Stanley girl returned to the place with two police officers. Her face was all swollen, her eye blackened, and there was blood all over her clothes and upon her wrists.

Entrance to the Howard street premises was effected by one of the officers through the broken rear window. He opened the door for his fellow officer and the Stanley girl. They found Jessie Montgomery lying on a mattress in the front room doubled up like a jackknife, her face against the wall and her hands over her face; she was perfectly nude; she was in a very hysterical condition, and moaning that she had been raped. Kruvosky, who had returned, was standing behind the door, and MacDonald was sitting on a chair in the room. The Stanley girl dressed Miss Montgomery; the two were taken to the Central Emergency Hospital, where they were placed under the care of a physician and nurse. The doctor found the Montgomery girl's vulva to be reddened, and somewhat inflamed. The girls were removed before noon that morning to the San Francisco Hospital, where a physician examined the Montgomery girl, and found her suffering from bruises over the left eye and in the temple region, and considerable swelling over the malar bone, the bruises extending over onto the upper eyelid. There were bruises on the arms, mostly on the right elbow, a small discoloration on the left wrist, several bruises on the legs, the medial aspect of the right thigh just above the knee, and the left knee, on both lower legs, the tibial surfaces of the legs, and several scratches on the feet.

On Friday, November 26th, or Saturday, November 27th, Detective Sergeant Jackson, Detective Dorman, and Officer Darling went to defendant's residence to apprehend him, but received no answer to their ringing of the doorbell. Defendant was not apprehended until Tuesday, November 30th, though the police had constantly been looking for him since midnight of the 25th. The house in which he was finally located was covered by the police, two of whom rang the bell and knocked on the door of the premises. They received no response and broke in the door. Defendant ran out and was captured on the roof of an adjoining building. He admitted to the police officers that he was trying to escape, and that he had been hiding since the night of the 25th. Subsequently the defendant and Carey were brought before the girls at the San Francisco Hospital. There Miss Montgomery twice accused the defendant of having raped her. Once he denied it. The second time he stood mute. En route from the hospital to the hall of justice, while defendant and Carey were in the police automobile, there ensued a conversation between Carey and the defendant, wherein Carey commented on the fact that Miss Stanley had noticed his diamonds, and that she did not look to be 21 years old. He further remarked, "Those blondes are my jinx. The last time I got in trouble a blonde got me into that too;" to which the defendant rejoined, "She is a fighting bitch, all right." Later the defendant declared that the Montgomery girl came prepared for what she got, and that she got it.

[1] The first ground urged by the appellant in support of his appeal is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, in that it fails to show that Jessie Montgomery, the prosecuting witness, resisted any of the acts of the defendant, or that her resistance was overcome by force, or that she was in such a condition that she could not have resisted. In this behalf it appears from the evidence offered on behalf of the people, as already outlined, that because she refused to remove her clothes and sing and dance for the defendant and his companions, and persisted in such refusal, the defendant struck her on the head, knocking her down twice; that after the second blow she was unable to get up, whereupon Kruvosky dragged her into the bathroom, threw her down, hitting her on the head, pulled off her dress, rolled her on the floor, and finally had sexual intercourse with her. During this time the defendant every once in a while would stick his head in the room and say, "Hurry up, hurry up!" and that the girl knew nothing after Kruvosky had ravished her until she found herself on the mattress in the front room. Here the defendant and Kruvosky pulled her remaining clothes off, and the former engaged in an act of sexual intercourse with her. This evidence is ample to show that the prosecutrix did resist, and that her resistance was overcome by force and violence. It is to be noted that the defendant and Kruvosky had been following professional boxing as an occupation, and that their victim was a girl 17 years of age. Immediately before her rape by the defendant she had been subjected to the most brutal treatment, rendering her unconscious, and only came to a moment before the attack which it is now insisted that she did not sufficiently resist. She herself testified, "I could not resist, because my strength was all gone. I had absolutely no strength left." It is not claimed by the defendant's counsel that she consented, or was a willing victim; and it is hardly to be expected that a person upon whom had just been inflicted a brutal bodily attack could offer a more strenuous physical resistance, the degree of which must necessarily depend upon the circumstances surrounding the act at the time and the relative strength of the persons concerned. It is a just inference from the evidence that Jessie Montgomery resisted to the full extent of her capacity. People v. Bonzani, 24 Cal. App. 549, 141 Pac. 1062.

[2] Complaint is also made of the ruling of the court in admitting the testimony of Jean Stanley, over the defendant's objection, to the effect that the defendant and other persons attempted to commit rape upon her, in doing which the defendant threw her on a couch and held a gun in her face, threatening to kill her unless she would submit to an act of sexual intercourse. The argument is that this was evidence of a wholly distinct and collateral offense, involving a different person, and wholly irrelevant to the charge.

It is of course, the general rule that evidence of another crime is inadmissible; but where, as here, the evidence sufficiently established a conspiracy, evidence of all acts in furtherance of the common design by any or all of the conspirators is admissible. From the statement of the facts already given, enough appears to show that the defendant and his companions either expressly or tacitly formed the design to engage in acts of sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix and Jean Stanley, either with or without their consent. It is a fair inference from the conduct of the defendant and his codefendant that such a design was formed at the Stroller's Café. Reference has already been made to the whispered conversation out of the hearing of the two young women, to their leaving the café together, joining Carey and Brady immediately outside, and then riding with them and their intended victims to the Howard street shack. Here the girls and their original escorts entered by one door, while the defendant and Kruvosky entered by another, and shortly after they were all in the building they came together and proceeded jointly and severally with the attacks described which appear to have been well understood and designed.

[3] The established rule is that when a conspiracy to commit an offense of a certain class is shown each conspirator is deemed guilty of every such crime committed in furtherance of the conspiracy by any of the conspirators. People v. Eldridge, 147 Cal. 782, 82 Pac. 442; People v. Schmidt, 33 Cal. App. 426, 165 Pac. 555; People v. Ciulla, 187 Pac. 46.

[4, 5] The defendant assigns as error on the part of the trial court the giving of certain instructions to the jury, the first of which reads as follows:

"You are further instructed that the moral delinquency of the girl complainant, if there be any such moral delinquency, is not to be considered by you as affecting her credibility."

In this state, in cases of this character the rule is that evidence of the unchastity of the prosecutrix is admissible as bearing on the question of consent, but evidence of her moral delinquency is inadmissible as affecting her general credibility as a witness. People v. Johnson, 108 Cal. 289, 294, 39 Pac. 622; People v. Harlan, 133 Cal. 16, 65 Pac. 9; People v. Wilmot, 139 Cal. 103, 107, 72 Pac. 838. However, in this case no evidence was introduced for either purpose, and while therefore we are unable to lend our concurrence to the giving of this instruction, still we do not believe, when the instructions are read in their entirety, including those charging the jury in various forms that they were the sole judges of the weight and value of evidence and of the credibility of the witnesses, that the jury could have believed that they were not at liberty to consider the conduct of the prosecutrix on the night of the offense or during the trial as affecting the value and weight of her evidence.

[6] The second of such instructions is one on the subject of flight, and was in the following language:

"I instruct you that flight itself is not evidence of guilt, but is a circumstance which you may consider in determining the issues in the case; and if there is any explanation of the flight, if there was any evidence of flight, you can take such explanation into consideration; and unless you are convinced that the explanation is satisfactory to you, you may take such evidence of flight as an indication of guilt."

The defendant argues that this instruction omits the essential qualification that in order to make flight indicative of a guilty conscience the defendant must know that he is charged with crime. The evidence clearly shows without conflict that the defendant knew that he was charged with the crime, and that he tried to escape; therefore it is not considered that the defendant was in any manner prejudiced by the instruction.

[7] The appellant also seeks a reversal of the judgment on the ground of alleged misconduct of the court during the course of the trial. On one occasion, during the direct examination of the prosecutrix, the trial judge, over the defendant's objection, propounded leading questions to her. The witness had already testified, "Kruvosky used me," and it was to remove any ambiguity from this expression that the suggestive questions were asked, the court remarking in response to the objection:

"I have a lady on the stand, and she has already indicated that she is embarrassed by telling a story of this kind. * * * I am using my discretion, because it seems to me that this lady cannot tell the story without these questions being propounded to her."

The action of the court, it is clear, is subject to no unfavorable criticism.

[8, 9] Again during the cross-examination of this witness counsel for the defendant claimed that she hesitated in answering one of his questions, and he requested that the record show that she hesitated; upon which the court remarked that she had not hesitated; and a few minutes later, after discussion, the court said: "That is a matter of argument. Some people hesitate so they may be sure." The witness had testified that she had identified the defendant three or four days after the assault, and she was then asked if she would not swear that it was not five days afterwards. It was as to the last questions that the defendant claims the witness hesitated. We cannot conceive upon what ground the defendant's counsel desired that the record should show the alleged hesitation, since the fact, if it existed, was before the jury; and its record, if one were made, would be useless to the court, for whose benefit the record is prepared, since the length of time taken by a witness to consider what answer he should give to a question would not aid this court in deciding the questions of law presented to it upon an appeal; nor can we understand how the remark of the court, that persons sometimes hesitate in order to be sure—which is an obvious fact—prejudiced the defendant. It does not appear that the court was making an unfair comment upon the evidence, nor, as further claimed, that the remarks of the court were designed to enhance the credibility of the witness.

[10] At another point in the cross-examination of the same witness counsel for defendant, during a discussion of a question propounded by him, was told by the court that he was on a "fishing excursion." This expression often encountered in nisi prius trials, described accurately what defendant's counsel was engaged in. It was not used offensively, and the employment of the expression, while it might jar the sensibilities of counsel, is far from constituting misconduct, it not appearing that the defendant's rights were in some way prejudiced thereby. People v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 545, 140 Pac. 276.

[11] The next complaint is that the court declared two answers of this witness to amount to the same statement. At one place in her cross-examination the witness, respecting the identification of the defendant at the hospital where she and her companion were being treated, said that after the defendants had left the room she remarked (referring to Miss Stanley): "Well, I didn't hear her say anything about Murphy." A few minutes later she revised her testimony in this particular, and said that Miss Stanley had identified the defendant at the hospital as one of the men who had treated her so roughly in the Howard street shack. In a discussion upon the subject the court remarked, "It is the same statement."

In this respect the court was in error, but it amounted to nothing, for right then and there it was in effect conceded that the two answers were at variance, and the witness explained it by saying that when she first answered the question she had not recollected what had been said by Miss Stanley, but that a moment later, her memory being refreshed, she corrected her testimony. Statements by the court like this, if they exercise any influence upon the jury, help, rather than hurt, the defendant.

[12] Counsel for the defendant states that one of the worst instances of misconduct on the part of the court occurred during the cross-examination of Miss Stanley. It had been shown that both of the young women, a few days after the occurrences at the shack, had identified the brother of defendant, K. O. Kruvosky, known in the record as "Bevo" Kruvosky, as one of their assailants, and had afterwards admitted that they were mistaken in such identification. The part of the cross-examination in respect to which it is claimed that the court was guilty of misconduct, is as follows:

"Q. Did you identify any one as a party who was in this Howard street house upon this night and subsequently say that your identification was wrong? A. Yes.

"Q. Please relate that.

"The Court: Q. Who was it that you identified, Miss Stanley? A. K. O. Kruvosky.

"Mr. Spagnoli: Q. You identified K. O. Kruvosky, and you made a mistake; is that correct? A. Edward Kruvosky's brother.

"Q. I don't know who his brother is. Will you tell me his name? A. I don't know his first name.

"Q. Now, do you mean to tell me you misidentified K. O. Kruvosky; is that the idea?

"The Court: Now I am going to have this witness informed on that matter. I think she is entitled to it. The court knows from questions you have propounded to other witnesses here today that the man you have in mind is Bevo Kruvosky.

"Mr. Spagnoli: I have no one in mind, if your honor please.

"The Court: I am not going to have this witness confused.

"Mr. Spagnoli: I don't know who this witness misidentified.

"The Court: Q. Do you know the man who is in custody now—Kruvosky—Miss Stanley? A. Yes; I do.

"Q. Is that the man you identified, and subsequently said he was not the man? A. No.

"Q. Who is the man? A. It is Bevo Kruvosky."

By this excerpt from the record the witness appeared to be laboring under no confusion, and needed no assistance or protection; but in any event her misidentification of one of the defendants lost none of its force, it is clear, by the action of the court.

[13] Nor does it appear from the record, as claimed by the defendant, that his right of cross-examination of this witness was unduly curtailed. At one place in the cross-examination it does appear that counsel stated that he was taken by surprise as to a portion of the testimony of Miss Stanley; that he was tired from the long day and night sessions of the court, and asked permission to finish the cross-examination of the witness at another time. This request was denied, and he was asked if he had any further questions, to which he replied: "We have nothing further at this time." It does not appear on what subject he wished to further cross-examine her, nor did he subsequently recall this witness for further cross-examination, as the court intimated might be done upon a proper showing. We do not think that the defendant's complaint of undue curtailment of cross-examination can be predicated upon this state of the record.

[14] Complaint is next made that the court refused defendant a continuance in order to enable him to prepare for the cross-examination of Corporal Suttman, a witness for the people. At the conclusion of the direct testimony of this witness, defendant's counsel, addressing the court, said that he had been taken by surprise, and that he desired an opportunity to consult with his client before cross-examining the witness. The court permitted the witness to be withdrawn, and two other witnesses for the prosecution were called and examined, which concluded the case for the people, with the exception of one professional witness, who would, it was said, be in court the following morning. Thereupon the court directed counsel for the defendant to commence the defense, or proceed with the cross-examination of Suttman. Defendant declined to proceed with his defense until the case for the people was closed, and insisted that under all the circumstances of the case and the lateness of the hour he should not be required to proceed with the cross-examination of Suttman until the next day. The court finally accorded counsel for the defendant 10 minutes to consult his client, after which the cross-examination was taken up. There is no showing that the defendant was prejudiced in his defense by the refusal to grant further delay.

[15] Finally, the defendant complains of the refusal of the trial court to grant a continuance under the following circumstances: Having examined several witnesses his counsel desired to place upon the witness stand three others who, although subpoenaed, were not present in court. Two other of defendant's witnesses, however, were present, upon which showing the court refused defendant's request for a continuance, the sole ground of which apparently was his desire to examine his witnesses in a prearranged order, and he was given one minute in which to place his next witness upon the stand. He thereupon took the stand as a witness in his own behalf. Later, two of these three witnesses appeared in court and were examined. They both testified that, although they lived near the Howard street shack, they heard no screaming or outcry upon the night of the occurrences upon which the present charge is based. The third witness did not appear, and could not be produced; but upon counsel stating that he expected to prove by her that she had not heard any screams or outcry or noise of women on the night in question, the district attorney offered to stipulate that this witness, if produced, would so testify; but counsel for the defendant replied "we don't want any admissions. We want to prove it by the witness."

It does not appear that the refusal to postpone the case deprived the defendant of the benefit of any testimony, or that the disarrangement of the order planned for the calling of his witnesses resulted in any prejudice to the rights of the defendant. At the time of the requested continuance the court had been in session only a little over an hour. And here, as in many instances throughout the trial, it appears clear that the defendant sought to delay the progress of the trial without any very good reason in law therefor. The remarks of the court hereinabove referred to are typical of a number of others now claimed as misconduct for the first time in appellant's reply brief.

[16] None of the incidents, or all of them, upon which the charge of misconduct on the part of the trial court is laid, afford any sufficient foundation therefor; and this was probably the view taken by the defense at the time, for no assignment of error with respect to them was then made. It has long been the rule in this court that a claim of misconduct on the part of the district attorney or the trial judge will not ordinarily be considered on appeal unless the complaining party has promptly called the attention of the court to the alleged impropriety and assigned misconduct thereon. The reason for this rule is that the court should be given the opportunity to correct the irregularity or to prevent any prejudicial effect if that be possible. People v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 545, 551, 140 Pac. 256. Much of the trouble during the trial between the court and counsel for the defendant was occasioned by the manifest desire of the court on the one hand to expedite the trial of the defendant as much as possible, and by counsel on the other hand to gain delay, claiming at times that by reason of the long night and day sessions of the court he was exhausted, and at other times that he had not had sufficient opportunity to prepare for the direct and cross-examination of witnesses or to prepare proposed instructions for the jury. But assuming, as earnestly urged, that the court was impatient, and frequently unjustly rebuked counsel, still it is quite certain that we cannot hold, as claimed, that the court was hostile to counsel and the defense, and that the attitude of the court toward both was such as resulted in an unfair trial to the defendant.

No further questions are presented.

Judgment and order are affirmed.

(200 P.)

PEOPLE v. MacDONALD. (Cr. 974.)

1. Criminal law — § 619—Consolidation of indictments held not error.

Under Pen. Code, § 954, providing that the court may order consolidated for trial two or more charges of different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses, a consolidation of charges of rape and of the infamous crime against nature, where both offenses were committed on the same person, and both offenses are included in title 9, Pen. Code, as crimes against the person and public decency and good morals, was not error.

2. Criminal law — § 166(1)—Consolidation of charges held not prejudicial.

The consolidation of charges of rape and the infamous crime against nature was not prejudicial as admitting evidence of other crimes of rape which defendant claimed would have been excluded from the separate trial of the second offense, where the crimes were all committed as a part of a general orgy of crime.

3. Criminal law — § 372(1)—Admission of evidence of another crime committed by defendant held not error.

In a prosecution for rape and the infamous crime against nature, the admission of evidence of an attempt at rape by defendant on another woman at about the same time was not error, where the acts were so interrelated as to form a continuous series in which each act and offense was a part of the res gestæ as to all concerned in the commission of the crimes.

4. Criminal law — § 126(1)—Denial of motion for change of place of trial held not error.

It was not error to deny a motion for change of place of trial on account of prejudice against defendant in the mind of the public, where a panel of 12 qualified jurors was obtained from a full and fair voir dire examination of 36 persons, and where the court had before it information concerning the public mind from trials of the defendant's associates in connected crimes.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Allan MacDonald was convicted of rape and the infamous crime against nature, and appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph McInerney, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Matthew Brady, Asst. Dist. Atty., and Stanislaus A. Riley, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for the People.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction and from the order denying motion for a new trial of the defendant upon an indictment by the grand jury, of the city and county of San Francisco, returned on December 1, 1921, charging the defendant with the crime of rape, and also upon an indictment by said grand jury, returned December 29, 1921, charging said defendant with having violated section 286 of the Penal Code, defining the infamous crime against nature, both offenses being charged to have been committed against one Jessie Montgomery. On motion of the district attorney, and over the objection of the defendant, these two charges were consolidated, and thereafter came to trial on January 10, 1921. Upon the first trial thereon the jury disagreed, and was discharged. Thereafter, and on January 14, 1921, the defendant moved for a change of place of trial of the cause to another county, upon the ground that a fair and impartial trial could not be had in the city and county of San Francisco. This motion the trial court denied, and on January 17, 1921, the matter came on for retrial before a jury, which, at the conclusion of said second trial, found the defendant guilty of the offenses charged in said indictments. A motion for a new trial was denied, whereupon the defendant has prosecuted this appeal.

[1] The appellant's first contention is that the trial court erred in its order consolidating the two charges against the defendant for the purposes of the trial. The court in so doing relied upon the provisions of section 954 of the Penal Code, which reads in part as follows:

"The indictment or information may charge two or more different offenses connected together in their commission, or different statements of the same offense, or two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses, under separate counts, and if two or more indictments or informations are filed in such cases the court may order them to be consolidated."

We are of the opinion that the court committed no error in the consolidation of the charges embraced in these two indictments and of their trial together. The two offenses were charged in these separate indictments to have been committed upon the body of the same person. They belong, in our judgment, to the same class of offenses. They are crimes against the person and against public decency and good morals, included in title 9 of the Penal Code. People v. Warriner, 37 Cal. App. 107, 173 Pac. 489.

[2] The chief objection which the appellant urges against the consolidation of these two charges against the defendant, and of their trial together, is based not so much upon the substance of the indictments as upon the events of the trial, his contention being that the evidence adduced thereat showing the defendant to be guilty of having committed the infamous crime against nature discloses that such offense, if committed at all by him, was committed after the several crimes of rape which he was charged with having aided and abetted had been fully consummated; and that this being so, the evidence as to such other crimes would have been inadmissible against the defendant had the charge of the infamous crime against nature been separately tried. Upon the whole record, however, we cannot sustain this contention, since it sufficiently appears therefrom not only that the crimes of rape committed by the other persons upon the person of Jessie Montgomery, which this defendant was charged with having aided and abetted, were committed in the course of a general orgy of passion and lust in which the defendant took throughout a sufficiently guilty part, but that one of these very crimes of rape perpetrated by one of his associates in the general course of these bestial crimes was practically coincident in its commission with the particular crime against nature with which the defendant was charged. We can therefore see no material prejudice which the defendant sustained by the consolidation and trial together of the charges embraced in these two indictments.

[3] The next contention of the appellant is that the trial court committed prejudicial error in the admission of the testimony of one Jean Stanley as to an offense in the nature of an attempted rape committed by the defendant against her, and which was not embraced in either of said indictments. In the case of People v. Murphy, 200 Pac. 484, this day decided by this court, we have set forth with much of detail the evidence as to the occurrences at the place and on the occasion when the several offenses with which the defendant herein was charged in these two indictments were shown to have taken place. That the acts which the defendant himself committed and the acts which were done or attempted by his associates in the debaucheries of that night were so interrelated as to form a continuous series of offenses, in which each act and offense of each perpetrator was part of the res gestæ as to all concerned, we entertain no doubt, and, this being so, the testimony of Jean Stanley as to the defendant's brutal and libidinous approaches was admissible, not as proof of another and distinct crime, but as a part and parcel of the series of continuing offenses which went to make up the sordid tragedy in which this defendant played at times an active and at other times a sympathetic part.

[4] The appellant's next contention is that the trial court erred in denying his motion for a change of place of trial, supported, as it was, by affidavits showing an aroused state of public feeling over the commission of the offenses with which the defendant and his associates were charged. It does not appear that any counter showing was made on behalf of the prosecution, but it does appear that the trial court had before it, through reference in the defendant's showing, the records of the other recent trials of the defendant's associates in the perpetration of the outrages, as a result of which these two indictments against him were presented; and from these records it appeared that no particular difficulty had been experienced in procuring juries to try the defendants in those other cases; but a more significant and controlling state of facts going to show that the discretion of the trial court in the matter of granting or denying this motion was not abused, is to be found in the proceedings immediately following its denial; for it appears that a panel of 12 qualified jurors was actually obtained from a very fair and full voir dire examination of 36 persons, during the course of which the defendant found but two prospective jurors subject to challenge for cause, one of whom was dismissed upon such challenge, and which examination shows no undue state of either passion or prejudice pervading either the courtroom or the minds of those called for jury duty in the case. It is true that the defendant used all of his peremptory challenges before the final juror was obtained, but it does not appear, either from the examination of said final jurymen or of any other prior jurymen, that any cause existed for the exercise of any further peremptory challenges as to any of them, or that the 12 jurors finally accepted and sworn were not only entirely satisfactory to the defendant, but were not also in all respects qualified to afford him a fair and impartial trial. People v. Schafer, 161 Cal. 573, 119 Pac. 920; People v. Kromphold, 172 Cal. 512, 157 Pac. 599.

Under these conditions and in the light of these cases, we think that it has not been shown that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing the defendant a change of place of trial, or that the defendant was not afforded a fair and impartial trial before the trial court. Counsel for the appellant expressly disclaims any imputation of unfairness, prejudice, or partiality on the part of the trial judge, and, this being so, we feel that the appellant has suffered no prejudice through the denial of his motion for a change of place of trial. We do not deem any other points urged by the appellant worthy of serious or extended discussion.

Judgment and order are affirmed.

BURR v. GARDELLA et al. (Civ. 2304.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 30, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 29, 1921.)

1. States 101—Subcontractor's bond to be construed in light of contracts.

A bond of a subcontractor on a state job will be construed in arriving at the scope of the obligations by the light both of the agreement between the contractor and the subcontractor and the contract between the contractor and the state.

2. States 101—Subcontractor may be required to execute bond.

A subcontractor in cases of contracts for the performance of public work may be required by the contractor to execute to him the bond provided for in St. 1897, p. 201, as a matter of protection to his own bondsman, as well as to himself.

3. Principal and surety 97—Surety favored in law.

A surety is favored in law, and any act by the obligee in a bond which is injurious to his rights will operate as an exoneration of his obligations as such surety, under Civ. Code, § 2840, subd. 2, and section 2819.

4. Principal and surety 117—Premature payments to contractor release sureties only pro tanto.

Where premature payments are made to a contractor the effect thereof does not necessarily release the contractor's sureties from their obligations as such, but only from that part of the contractor's default that may be made up of such premature payments.

5. Principal and surety 117—Payments to contractor held not premature.

Under a contract expressly providing that claims of creditors of subcontractor must be paid when due and payable, and that contractor should retain 25 per cent. of amount earned by subcontractor, held that payments to the subcontractor for the purpose of satisfying creditors were not premature as to the subcontractor's surety, even though it was impossible to retain the 25 per cent. provided by the contract.

6. Principal and surety 161—Evidence held to show payments to contractor were not premature.

In an action by contractor against surety on bond of subcontractor, evidence held to show that payments made by contractor to subcontractor were not premature.

7. Principal and surety 193—All sureties entitled to security acquired by cosurety.

All the sureties on the bond of contractor are entitled to the benefit of any security for the performance of the principal obligation acquired by any of his cosureties at any time after they have entered into the contract of suretyship, under Civ. Code, § 2849.

8. Judgment 256(2)—Findings held insufficient to support judgment.

In an action by a contractor against subcontractor to recover for money advanced for rent of motortruck, a mere finding that defendant was adjudged a bankrupt pending the trial, considered in connection with concession of counsel that plaintiff was not, as matter of fact, included among the creditors of defendant in his petition, is wholly ineffectual for any purpose, and in no manner or measure adds any support to a judgment in favor of defendant.

9. Sales 456—Instrument held a conditional sale with characteristics of lease.

A transaction between a contractor and a subcontractor, evidenced by a written instrument, concerning a motortruck, held to constitute a conditional sale, possessing, however, the characteristic of a lease.

10. Sales 479(9)—Conditional seller of motortruck held entitled to compensation under conditional sale contract.

Where vendee under conditional sale contract failed to pay installments on a motortruck, and used the same for some time, held that seller was entitled, on retaking the truck to some compensation or damages for vendee's breach, and that the measure of compensation or damages is fixed by Civ. Code, § 3311, subd. 2.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.11. Principal and surety 81—Subcontractor's sureties liable for damages for breach of contract to pay installments on truck purchased from contractor under conditional sale contract.

Where subcontractor purchased a motortruck from contractor under a conditional sale contract, and failed to pay installments, and the truck was retaken by the seller, the seller was entitled to recover from sureties of the purchaser for the use of the truck the reasonable value of such use during the time purchaser was actually using it in the performance of the contract with the seller, and rental agreed on in the contract for sale of the truck was immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by P. L. Burr against L. Gardella and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

R. H. Countryman, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George F. Jones, of Oroville, for respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiff, in the month of June, 1914, entered into a contract with the state of California, through and by its department of engineering, whereby the former agreed to construct a portion of a state highway in Butte county "between Lindo Channel, one and one-half miles north of Chico, and the northerly county boundary—division 3, route 3, section D." On the 15th day of April, 1915, the plaintiff and the defendant

Keith made and entered into a written agreement, by the terms of which said Keith, for a certain specified consideration, was to haul and transport or carry from Cana, or "any other point on the line of the Southern Pacific Railroad or Northern Electric Railroad," where the State Highway Commission may deliver the same, certain materials (mineral aggregate) necessary to be used in the construction of said portion of said state highway by the plaintiff under his contract with the state of California. Among the provisions of the contract between plaintiff and Keith is the following, after specifically setting forth the sums to be paid to and received by said Keith for the transportation and delivery of said materials as provided therein:

"Said payment shall be made five days after said first party shall receive from said Highway Commission his respective payments according to the terms of said contract between said first party and said Highway Commission for deliveries of said mineral aggregate; provided, however, that at least twenty-five per cent. of said respective payments due said second party shall be retained by said first party for the period of thirty-five days after the completion of this contract."

The contract also provides for the retention by the first party of an amount in addition to the said 25 per cent. sufficient to meet any claims growing out of said contract as to which stop notices may be served either upon the party of the first part or the Highway Commission. It is also provided in said contract that if the second party shall fail to comply with the terms of said contract the first party may take entire charge of the work of delivering and distributing "said mineral aggregate, and charge the entire cost to said second party." The second party agreed to furnish all necessary equipment and labor to perform said work at his own cost and expense, and also to give a bond conditioned for the faithful and complete performance of the terms of said contract.

The sureties on the bond given by defendant Keith for the performance of said contract are the defendants L. Gardella, Ames Vaughan, and J. R. Vaughan. The sum to which said sureties bound themselves on said bond was $2,000, and the condition of the obligation was that the party of the second part would faithfully perform all the terms of the contract. The action here is against said Keith for $2,036 and against the sureties on said bond for $2,000, the sum in which the sureties became bound on their bond.

The complaint is in 4 counts, to wit: (1) That, in performing the contract between plaintiff and defendant Keith, the latter became indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $911.36, "as and for a balance due for and on account of work, labor done and performed, and materials furnished by this plaintiff to and for said defendant Keith, under said contract;" (2) that the defendant Keith, as principal, and the bondsmen on his surety bond, agreed to pay or secure the payment of all claims for labor, materials, and supplies furnished "for hauling and transporting from Cana or any other point on * * * said mineral aggregate to the points designated;" that, in performing the said contract between plaintiff and defendant, "said defendant F. M. Keith became indebted to this plaintiff in the sum of $1,125 for and on account of the agreed rental of a certain motor truck called a 'Knox' truck;" that "said motortruck was rented by said plaintiff to said defendant at the agreed or stipulated price of $250 per month; that said defendant used said motortruck for 4½ calendar months at said agreed rental of $250 per month, making a total sum of $1,125;" that "said truck was used by said Keith in the performance of said contract" between him and plaintiff; (3) that defendant Keith, in performing said contract between him and plaintiff, became indebted to the latter in the sum of $911.36 "for and on account of moneys paid, laid out, expended, loaned, and advanced to and for said defendant Keith by this plaintiff, at the special instance and request of said defendant Keith;" (4) that plaintiff rented the Knox motortruck above mentioned to defendant Keith, to be used in the performance of the said contract between Keith and plaintiff, that Keith so used said truck for the period of 4½ calendar months, and that "the reasonable value of the use of, and the reasonable rentals for said Knox truck is and are now, and during all of the times herein mentioned has and have been, the sum of $250 during each calendar month."

The complaint alleges that for a valuable consideration the said defendants, Gardella, the two Vaughans, and Keith, executed as sureties the bond in question here.

The defendants filed separate answers—that is, the defendant Keith filed an answer and the other defendants filed a joint answer as sureties on said bond. Keith's answer specifically denied that there was anything due plaintiff under the contract to which they were parties, and also, as to the claim of Burr, as alleged in his complaint, that said Keith was indebted to him in the aggregate sum of $1,125 as rental for the use of the Knox truck mentioned in the complaint, pleaded and set out in hæc verba a written agreement, dated May 24, 1915, whereby, so he averred, the plaintiff sold to him said truck for the sum of $1,500, said agreement being in the following language: "$1,500.00. Chico, Cal., May 24, 1915.

"For value received I promise to pay to the order of P. L. Burr the sum of fifteen hundred and no/100 dollars in installments of two hundred and fifty and no/100 dollars, each, due on the 25th day of each month, commencing on, and the first payment due June 25th, 1915, and a like amount due on the 25th day of each month thereafter until the principal sum is fully paid, all principal, to bear interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, payable monthly. Should the interest not be so paid, it shall become a part of the principal and thereafter bear interest at the same rate. Should default be made in payment of any installment of the principal or interest when due, then the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of this note. Principal and interest payable in gold coin of the United States at Chico, California. F. M. Keith.

"The consideration expressed in the foregoing promissory note, is the value of the following property leased and delivered to the maker thereof, by payee, to-wit: 1 Knox auto truck, truck No. 4337.

"Upon the payment of said note as provided, the lessors agree upon the receipt of one dollar, to sell, and to deliver a bill of sale of said property to said lessee, and until such payment, then the title and ownership thereof remain in the lessors and assigns. Upon failure to pay said note as provided, said lessors may take possession of said property without process of law, and the amount paid on said note shall be retained by them as and for the rent of said property. In the event of destruction of the property herein referred to lessee agrees to pay any balance remaining due upon the above note in full."

The answer alleges that—

The "defendant was not able to pay and made no payments of the installments of purchase price provided for in said agreement or promissory note, and that thereafter, and on or about the 1st day of September, 1915, plaintiff, exercising the option provided for in said agreement, took possession of said truck and ever since has had and now has possession thereof."

In their joint answer, the sureties, Gardella and Ames and J. R. Vaughan, admitted the execution of the bond by them and the execution of the subcontract between Burr and Keith, but denied, on want of information and belief, that there was anything due Burr from Keith under said bond or said subcontract. As to the claim of plaintiff of rental for the use of the 1 Knox truck, they set up as a defense thereto the agreement for the purchase of said truck, the allegations of their answer in that respect being the same as those contained in the answer of Keith. They set up the further special defense that the bond was drawn in compliance with the terms of the said subcontract, and executed for the purpose of guaranteeing or assuring the full and faithful performance by Keith of the terms of said subcontract, and alleged that the plaintiff violated the terms of said contract in that he paid to said Keith, or on his account, prior to the expiration of the period of 35 days after the completion of said contract, more than 75 per cent. of the payments due from him (plaintiff) to said Keith under said contract—

"and that the said P. L. Burr did not retain 25 per cent. of said respective payments for the period of 35 days after the completion of said contract, or for any part or portion of said period."

The court found that the special defenses set up in each answer were sustained by the proofs, and that there was nothing due from the defendant Keith under any of the counts of his complaint.

Besides the findings on the issues submitted by the pleadings the court made the following finding, the subject-matter thereof not having been pleaded or made an issue:

"That since the above-entitled action was commenced, the defendant, F. M. Keith, has been adjudged a bankrupt and discharged from the payment of his debts in the United States District Court in and for the Northern District of California; that the order declaring said F. M. Keith a bankrupt was made on the 11th day of January, 1918, and that a duly certified copy of said order is filed in this court."

As a conclusion from the findings the court adjudged that plaintiff was not entitled to judgment as against any of the defendants, and accordingly rendered judgment "that plaintiff take nothing by his action as against defendants or any of them," etc.

This appeal is brought here by the plaintiff from said judgment.

The bond executed to plaintiff by defendants contains this provision:

"The condition of this obligation is such that if the above-bounden F. M. Keith, * * * shall pay or satisfactorily secure the payment of all labor, materials, and supplies furnished for hauling and transporting * * * mineral aggregate to points designated, in connection with the contract of P. L. Burr in Butte county, Cal., in accordance with the terms and conditions of the contract, dated the 5th day of April, 1915, a copy of which is or may be hereto attached as forming a part hereof, and as required by the provisions of an act of the Legislature, approved March 27th, 1897, entitled 'An act to secure the payment of the claims of materialmen, mechanics, or laborers employed by contractors upon state, municipal or other public works,' and the acts amendatory thereof, and shall, in all things stand to and abide by, and well and truly keep and perform the covenants and agreements contained in the said contract and any alteration thereof made as therein provided, on part to be kept and performed, at the time and in the manner therein specified, and in all respects according to their true intent and meaning, and shall indemnify and save harmless the said P. L. Burr * * * as therein stipulated then this obligation shall become and be null and void; otherwise to remain in full force and virtue."

[1] The said bond and the scope of the obligations of the bondsmen thereunder must be considered and construed by the light both of the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant Keith, and the contract between the plaintiff and the state, and also in view of the law relating to such contracts.

The agreement between the plaintiff and Keith, immediately following a reference in the preamble to the contract between the plaintiff and the state, reads in part, as follows:

"Now, therefore, subject to the terms and provisions of said contract and pursuant to the terms and provisions thereof, and in order to comply therewith, it is agreed by and between the parties hereto as follows"

—and then follows a specification and description of the work to be done thereunder by Keith. The contract between plaintiff and the state, among other things, provides, as of course the law requires, that plaintiff—

"will pay all bills for labor, material and supplies contracted for by him, on account of the work herein contemplated, when same become due and payable," etc.

It is further provided in said contract that the state, by and through its engineering department, may at its option and at any time retain out of any amounts due the contractor sums sufficient to cover any unpaid claims arising against the contract by reason of the contract, and, furthermore, may at its option and at any time pay any such unpaid claims out of the amounts so retained, upon sworn statements of such claims filed with the engineering department.

Said contract also contains a provision to the effect that, unless the work called for thereby is in all respects finished or completed before the expiration of 250 consecutive days, Sundays excepted, from the date of approval of said contract by the Attorney General, damage will be sustained by the state of California, and that it is and will be difficult and impossible to ascertain and determine the actual damage which the state will sustain by reason of such delay, and it is therefore "agreed that said contractor will pay to the said Department of Engineering the sum of $50 per day for each and every day's delay beyond the time herein prescribed, in finishing the said work"; and it was further agreed by the contractor that the "Department of Engineering might deduct the aggregate amount of such penalty from any money due or that may become due said contractor under this contract."

It should be added that the agreement between the plaintiff and Keith contained the following among its other provisions and terms:

"Under no circumstances shall said second party remove any equipment from said work until he shall have fully performed all work to be done hereunder and fully performed all the terms hereof, and any and all equipment of said second party may be used by said first party free of cost in carrying out the terms and provisions hereof, and the work to be done hereunder."

As stated, the above provisions of the two contracts involved herein became and are essential parts and of the very essence of the obligation to which the sureties by their bond subscribed and so bound themselves.

From the answer of said sureties and the findings of the court it becomes readily manifest that the ground upon which the sureties claim to be exempt from liability upon their bond is that the plaintiff, in violation of the requirement of his contract in that particular, failed to retain for a period of 35 days after the completion of said contract 25 per cent. of all payments becoming due to Keith thereunder, it being the contention that the result of such failure was to impair the rights of said sureties as such.

[2] Under the authorities, there can be no doubt but that a subcontractor, in cases of contracts for the performance of public work, may be required by the contractor to execute to him the bond provided for in the statute of 1897. St. 1897, p. 201; French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 68 Pac. 92; Associated Oil Co. v. Commary-Peterson Co., 32 Cal. App. 589, 163 Pac. 702. This the contractor may require as a matter of protection to his own bondsmen, as well as to himself, and to the end that the work to be done by the subcontractor will be according to the plans, specifications, and conditions upon which the original contract was let and accepted.

[3] It is true that the rule is that a surety is favored in law, and that any act by the obligee which is injurious to his rights will operate as an exoneration of his obligations as such surety. Civ. Code, § 2840, subd. 2; Bateman Bros. v. Mapel, 145 Cal. 241, 78 Pac. 734; 3 Sutherland on Damages (3d Ed.) § 735; Dunne Inv. Co. v. Empire State S. Co., 27 Cal. App. 208, 214, 50 Pac. 405, 411. In other words:

"A surety may stand upon the strict letter of his bond, and * * * where the principal has, without the consent of the surety, materially violated the terms of the agreement for the performance of which the surety stands sponsor, the latter is exonerated from all liability upon his bond." Barrett-Hicks Co. v. Glas, 9 Cal. App. 491, 99 Pac. 856.

This rule is stated in section 2840, subd. 2, and section 2819 of our Civil Code. The section first named reads:

"A surety is exonerated—

"1. In like manner with a guarantor;

"2. To the extent to which he is prejudiced by any act of the creditor which would naturally prove injurious to the remedies of the surety or inconsistent with his rights, or which lessens his security."

Section 2819 reads:

"A guarantor is exonerated, except so far as he may be indemnified by the principal, if by any act of the creditor, without the consent of the guarantor, the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect, or the remedies or rights of the creditor against the principal, in respect thereto, are in any way impaired or suspended."

[4] It may first be observed that, if there were premature payments made by Burr, the effect thereof would not necessarily be to release the sureties from their entire obligation as such, but only from that part of the subcontractor's default that may be made up of such premature payments. Siegel v. Hechler and Southwestern Ins. Co., 181 Cal. 187, 183 Pac. 664. But we are unable to perceive from the evidence where premature payments were made by the plaintiff in this case. The subcontract provides that—

"As full compensation for all services rendered by said second party under the terms hereof, the said second party shall receive from said first party the sum of one and fifty one-hundredths dollars for each unit of said mineral aggregate sufficient to construct one concrete cubic yard. Said payment shall be made according to the estimates of the engineers of said Highway Commission."

The contract then provides, as we have already shown, that—

[5] It will be observed that the precise total amount to become due Keith could not be foretold or specified in the contract, for the reason that what that amount might be was contingent upon the amount of work that he performed under the contract. But it is undoubtedly true that what the contract intended to say with respect to the retention of the 25 per cent. was that that percentage of the payments made from time to time as they became due by plaintiff to defendant should be retained. Of course, it cannot be said that that provision does not involve a vital element of the agreement, the arbitrary or unnecessary violation of which would have the effect of producing a material deviation from the contract, either pro tanto, amounting only to a departure therefrom, or in toto, amounting to an alteration thereof, according to the extent of such violation; yet, a contract such as we have here, founded as it is upon the statute, is supposed always to intend, as the statute clearly contemplates, that claims accruing against the contractor in the performance of the contract must be paid whenever they fall due, and so become payable, whether prior or subsequent to the expiration of the 35 day period, after the completion of the contract. Indeed, the contracts involved herein, as we have shown, contain in express language such a provision, and the provision is only in harmony with the proposition that those that become the creditors of a contractor under such a contract as we have here are not bound by the contract, and cannot be compelled to postpone the enforcement of their claims beyond the time at which they may agree with the contractor that they shall be paid.

Of course, sureties upon a bond given for the proper execution of the terms of such a contract undertake their obligation with full knowledge of this proposition, and their obligation as such no less requires them to stand good for the faithful execution of the terms of the contract in that particular than for any other vital provision thereof. Therefore, where, as we think the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff shows to be so in this case, the payments made were according to the requirement of the contract as to when certain payments should be made, and were within the terms of the contract, and would consequently have to be made at some time, either by Keith or the plaintiff or, to the extent of their liability, by the sureties, we do not think the payments so made are, in fact, premature within the fair and reasonable contemplation of the statute and the contract. In other words, since the contract expressly provides that claims of the creditors must be paid when due and payable, it cannot be held that, if such payments are required to be made prior to the expiration of the 35 days after the completion of the contract, and it becomes necessary for the contractor to pay them, and it is impossible, from the extent of such obligations, to retain the 25 per cent. provided by the contract, the payment of them under such circumstances is such a violation of the terms of the contract as to affect or change or impair the rights of the sureties, either in whole or in part. Bateman Bros. v. Mapel, 145 Cal. 241, 243, 78 Pac. 734, supra; Hand Manuf. Co. v. Marks, 36 Or. 523, 52 Pac. 512, 53 Pac. 1072, 59 Pac. 549; Siegel v. Hechler et al., 181 Cal. 187, 183 Pac. 664, supra.

[6] The testimony respecting the payments by plaintiff and the times at which they were made comes entirely from him, and, while it is not altogether clear and satisfactory as to the time and extent of all the payments made, it sufficiently shows, we think, that payments or advancements made by him on the contract prior to the completion of the work, or while it was in progress, were not only within the terms of the contract, but were in extinguishment, by actual payment or by guaranteeing payment, of claims accruing against Keith in the performance of the contract. His testimony discloses this situation: That both the contract with the state and the subcontract were practically completed about the 1st day of December, 1915; that Keith, a short time prior to the completion of the subcontract (it is not made to appear precisely how long before) abandoned it, and that plaintiff, in pursuance of the stipulation to that effect in said contract, himself took charge of the work and completed the contract; that, while Keith was still actually engaged in the performance of the contract, it became necessary, in order that the performance of the contract might be proceeded with, for plaintiff to pay, and he did pay, certain claims arising against Keith in the performance of the contract amounting to the sum of $911.36 in excess of the total sum which became due to Keith under his contract.

The plaintiff filed and served a bill of particulars showing in detail or by items the sums aggregating the amount so paid, and the bill was introduced in evidence. This document upon its face shows that during the progress of the work, and long before the expiration of 35 days after the completion of the contract, a large number of bills were paid by plaintiff to Keith's creditors having claims of labor bestowed upon or materials and supplies furnished for use in the performance of the contract. The plaintiff, in giving this testimony, explained that, while some of the items set forth in the bill of particulars represented actual payments made by him to persons furnishing either labor or material or equipment necessary for the execution of the contract, there were other items incorporated therein that did not represent actual payments or advancements of money to Keith or his creditors, but merely notations of instances where he had previously obligated himself to the payment of certain claims of persons which had been contracted by Keith in the performance of the contract.

The plaintiff made an attempt, while testifying, to segregate and so point out the items representing actual payments and those representing his unexecuted personal obligations to pay to certain claimants money due from Keith for labor and materials furnished the latter for the performance of the contract, but the attempted segregation was not sufficiently specific and definite to make it clear how much of the aggregate amount of money so paid out by plaintiff was actually paid out or advanced prior to the completion of the contract, or how much of the amount due Keith, if any, he retained for a period of 35 days after the completion of the contract. As stated, the plaintiff testified that it was necessary for him to pay these claims or personally stand good for them in order that the work under the contract might be prosecuted and completed with the expedition required by the contract with the state. Plaintiff's testimony further shows that, but for his payment of such of the claims as he did actually pay, and the fact that he assumed personal liability for other claims, which, prior to the abandonment of the contract by Keith, became due and payable, but not then paid, a serious delay in the completion of the contract would have occurred. He further testified (and, as stated, nowhere is his testimony as to payments made by him contradicted) that claims against Keith, growing out of the contract, and aggregating the sum of $1,367.60, were not paid until after the completion by him of the contract. It does not appear from his testimony just how long after the completion of the contract some of said claims were paid, but it is thus made to appear that all said bills involved legitimate claims arising in the performance of the contract, being necessarily incurred in the proper execution of the terms thereof; and it likewise is further made to appear that some of said claims were not satisfied until after the lapse of a period of a year after the completion of the contract.

The sureties, as we have seen, bound themselves to stand for the faithful performance of the subcontract, not only according to its terms, but also according to the terms and conditions of the contract between plaintiff and the state. Time was of the essence of the latter contract. It had to be completed by the time designated therein, and as seen, default by the contractor (plaintiff) in so completing it meant the imposition upon him of a penalty of $50 for each day of the period during which his contract remained uncompleted after the time specified for its completion. It was therefore a duty required of him by his contract with the state, and a duty which the sureties bound themselves to stand sponsor for, to see that the subcontract was not so delayed in its completion as to result in the delay of the completion of the state's contract beyond the appointed time; and if it became necessary, as it appears from the testimony, to have become, to prevent delay in the completion of his contract with the state, that he should pay in full the claims against the subcontractor arising from the performance of the contract, and which were due and payable when made, and prior to the expiration of the period of 35 days after the completion of said contract, such course was not only legally proper, but was as much in the interest and to the benefit of the sureties as in his own interest and to his own benefit.

The conclusion following from the foregoing considerations is that the advancements made by the plaintiff for the purpose of paying legitimate claims growing out of the performance of the contract by Keith, whensoever such claims might have been paid, they all being within the terms of the contract, and due and payable when so paid, were in substantial pursuance of the contracts involved herein and therefore not at variance with the obligation undertaken by the sureties that the subcontract should be performed according to the terms and conditions of both contracts. It cannot, therefore, properly be declared that such payments or advancements constituted acts "which naturally prove injurious to the remedies of the surety or inconsistent with his rights, or which lessen his security."

The allegation of the complaint that the sureties entered into their undertaking for a valuable consideration, while not wholly sustained, was shown to be in part true. Moreover, it is a fair inference from the record that one of the sureties was responsible, through his own voluntary act, for the payment by plaintiff of one of the claims accruing against Keith and arising out of the performance of the subcontract, and also that the same surety was likewise responsible for delaying to some extent the completion of said contract.

It was admitted by one of the sureties, Ames Vaughan, that, during the progress of the work by Keith under the subcontract, he received from Keith two motortrucks which the latter was using at the time in the performance of the contract, and kept and used them for approximately 4 weeks. Although Ames declared that one of the trucks was turned over to him by Keith to secure a book account which the latter had with the former, he (Ames) admitted that he sold or traded in said truck for another, receiving or being allowed therefor the sum of $500, which amounted to $300 in excess of the total of said book account. He admitted at the trial that he still had that sum in his possession. He further admitted that the other truck was used by him in transporting goods or merchandise from one point to another, and that he derived therefrom considerable revenue. The exact amount does not appear. The plaintiff testified that the taking of these trucks from the work delayed the prosecution and completion thereof, and that he so informed the sureties by letter, and requested a return of the trucks to the possession of Keith, so that he might the better proceed with an expeditious execution of the terms of his contract. A copy of the letter referred to was addressed to and received by each of the sureties, and all said copies were introduced and received in evidence.

Said Vaughan further admitted that he authorized and gave his consent to the payment by plaintiff before the contract was completed of a claim against Keith for $457, arising out of the latter's performance of the contract.

[7] It thus plainly appears that the sureties, all of whom are entitled to the benefit of any security for the performance of the principal obligation acquired by any one of his cosureties at any time after they have entered into the contract of suretyship (Civ. Code, § 2849), had in their possession some security, and it is further clear that some delay in the prosecution of the contract to completion was occasioned by the act of Ames Vaughan in taking and so causing to be withheld from use for several weeks in the work required to be done by Keith under the contract the motortrucks referred to. Moreover, it will be observed that in permitting said Vaughan to remove the trucks referred to from the work required to be done under his contract Keith violated an express provision of said contract forbidding the removal of any equipment from said work until he should have performed the same, or all the terms of said contract. But, waiving all these matters, we repeat that for the other reasons hereinabove expressed there was not effected by the advancements or payments made by plaintiff under the subcontract, above considered, a departure therefrom, and much less an alteration thereof, within the purview of its provisions or the contemplation of the law regulating the performance of the terms of such agreements.

As to the defendant Keith, it is to be remarked that his testimony in rebuttal of that of the plaintiff to the effect that he (Keith) was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $911.36 in excess of the total amount earned by Keith under the contract seems to be pregnant with an admission that he is indebted to plaintiff in some amount. When asked by his attorney whether he owed plaintiff the sum mentioned as a result of the subcontract Keith replied: "No, sir; I don't think there was that due him." This was the only testimony offered by or received on behalf of the defendant upon that question, and it seems to us that his answer was tantamount to saying that, while the precise amount stated was not due plaintiff, there was, nevertheless, some amount still owing to plaintiff and arising out of the contract in question. At any rate, the answer of the witness does not rise to the dignity of an absolute or positive denial of some indebtedness. It would follow that the plaintiff was entitled to recover some amount from Keith, unless Keith, at the time of the trial, had been discharged from his debts, including any that he might owe to Burr, through due proceedings in bankruptcy, as the court found was the fact. Thus we are led to the consideration of the finding of the court that the defendant Keith had been so discharged at the time of the trial.

It appears from the record that there was pending at the time that the present action was called for trial another action between Burr as plaintiff and Keith as defendant, which action was numbered 7630. On the calling of this case for trial, counsel for defendants stated to the court that Keith had filed a petition in voluntary bankruptcy in the federal court for the Northern district of California, to which counsel for plaintiff replied: "I understand in the petition he does not recognize Mr. Burr as a creditor." Mr. Jones, attorney for the defendants, then stated that he did not have the petition or a copy thereof in his possession, and that, if the plaintiff was not included in the schedule in the petition naming the creditors of Keith, it was an oversight, whereupon counsel for the plaintiff said: "I suppose, as long as he is a bankrupt, a continuance is good." Thereupon the case of Burr v. Keith (No. 7630), was continued and the present case proceeded with. The trial of the present action commenced on the 26th day of October, 1917. The answer did not set up the alleged bankruptcy of Keith as a defense to this action.

There was therefore no issue upon that proposition submitted by the pleadings.

It appears, however, that on May 13, 1918, long after the trial of this action was concluded, and before findings were made and judgment rendered and entered, the defendants filed with the record of this action two certain papers, copies of which are incorporated into the record here. One of these papers purports to be an order of the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, made on the 11th day of January, 1918, upon a petition previously filed by the defendant Keith to be adjudged a bankrupt, referring the matter to Richard Belcher, Esq., United States commissioner at the city of Marysville, for such proceedings therein as are required by the acts of Congress relating to bankruptcy. The other paper purports to be a copy of an adjudication by said United States District Court that said Keith was a bankrupt, and that he be discharged from all debts and claims which were made provable against his estate under the bankruptcy acts which existed on the 16th day of October, 1917. These papers were not, as is manifest, regularly introduced in evidence in this case. It, however, appears to be the position of counsel for the defendants that, the certified record of the discharge of Keith from all debts and claims against his estate having been filed, with the record in the case, although subsequent to the trial, the court below was authorized thereupon to take judicial notice of such discharge. As has been shown, at first there seemed to be some doubt in the minds of counsel whether the debt which Burr claimed was due him from Keith was included in the schedule of liabilities as set forth in the petition of Keith to be adjudged a bankrupt. Later on, however, and during the progress of the trial of this action, counsel for the defendants practically conceded that Burr's claim was not included in said schedule; but he argued that, while Burr's claim was not so included, he nevertheless had actual knowledge of the pendency of the petition of Keith before the latter was adjudged a bankrupt and discharged from his debts.

Section 17 of the federal Bankruptcy Act, as it existed on the 11th day of January, 1917, provided as follows:

"A discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all of his provable debts except such as * * * (3) have not been duly scheduled in time for proof and allowance, with the name of the creditor if known to the bankrupt, unless such creditor had notice or actual knowledge of the proceedings in bankruptcy." U. S. Comp. St. § 9601.

[8] The counsel for the defendants declares that the failure to include the claim of Burr in the schedule of debts of Keith was due to the fact that Keith did not recognize himself as a debtor of Burr, or, in other words, that he did not consider that he was indebted to Burr in any sum whatsoever. There is no evidence in the record to support that statement. But, be that as it may, assuming, without deciding, that the court below was authorized to take judicial notice of the discharge in bankruptcy of Keith upon the record as it is presented here, and further assuming that it was true that Burr had actual knowledge of the filing of the petition of Keith to be declared a bankrupt prior to the time at which he was so adjudged and discharged from his indebtedness, the proposition remains that the court failed to find that Burr did have such actual knowledge, and therefore the mere finding that Keith was adjudged a bankrupt, considered in connection with the concession of counsel that Burr was not, as a matter of fact, included among the creditors of Keith in his petition, is wholly ineffectual for any purpose, and in no manner or measure adds any support to the judgment in favor of the defendant Keith.

[9, 10] We think that the plaintiff was entitled to some compensation for the Knox motortruck which he let the defendant Keith have to be used in the work to be done under the subcontract. There is some discussion in the briefs as to whether the instrument whereby said truck was transferred to the possession of Keith involved a conditional sale or only a lease of the property. Our own opinion is that the transaction, as evidenced by the written instrument, constituted a conditional sale, also possessing, however, the characteristic of a lease. The intention of the vendor undoubtedly was that it should be a sale to Keith, and to protect his rights in the transaction Burr caused to be inserted in the agreement a provision to the effect that, in the event that the installments provided for in the agreement were not all paid, the possession of the property, the title to which remained in him at all times, should be returned to or taken by him, and that any installments which might in the meantime have been paid should be treated as rentals for the use of the truck. But, whatever the proper technical characterization or the legal nature of the instrument may be, it is certainly true that, at least morally, the plaintiff was entitled to compensation for the use of the truck, and we know of no reason why he should not be legally entitled to such compensation. While the right to retain the installments, should any have been paid, was in the nature of a forfeiture, we nevertheless think that, since there was a breach of the agreement by the vendee in the matter of the payment of the installments, the plaintiff is entitled to some compensation or damages for such breach, and that in such case the measure of compensation or damages is as is fixed by section 3311, subd. 2, of the Civil Code. See Matteson v. Equitable Mining & Milling Co., 143 Cal. 436, 438, 77 Pac. 144. In Ruling Case Law, vol. 24, p. 785, the rule is stated as follows:

"Though the seller cannot, after retaking possession, maintain an action for the price, he may treat the default of the buyer as a breach of the contract of purchase, and maintain an action for damages, as in case of the breach of other executory contracts of sale by a buyer."

In the footnotes of said volume, page 786, a number of cases are cited supporting the text. Of course, it is true, as the defendant Keith contends, that in such a transaction the vendor is not entitled to both the return of the property conditionally sold and the full price at which it was agreed to be sold. But it does not follow from that proposition that where, as here, there has been a violation by the vendee of the provision for the payment of installments, the vendee having used the property to his own advantage and benefit, the vendor should not be entitled to compensation by way of damages for the breach of the agreement.

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [11] The petition for rehearing is denied.

We think it proper to say, in addition to what is said by the District Court in its discussion of the point last mentioned in its decision, that the compensation which Burr is entitled to recover of the sureties for the use of the truck in question is limited to the reasonable value of its use during the time Keith was actually using it in the performance of the subcontract, and that the rental agreed on in the contract between Burr and Keith for the sale of said truck is not the measure of the value of such use, and is wholly immaterial to the inquiry.

That contract was forfeited, and in effect rescinded. The value of the use is to be ascertained in the same manner as if Burr had loaned Keith the truck for use in performing the subcontract in consideration of the payment by Keith to Burr of the reasonable value of its use.

All concur.

MEER v. CERATI et al. (Civ. 2234.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 13, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 8, 1921.)

1. Pleading $\S$ 310—Defective allegation aided by lease annexed to complaint.

In an action by a landlord for the tenants' failure to sow the land with rice, as they had agreed, allegation of the complaint that defendant tenants did not cultivate the premises, and did not sow one-third thereof, or any part, to rice, as in the lease provided, the lease being expressly made a part of the complaint, and annexed thereto as an exhibit, was sufficiently aided by the lease itself to overcome the effect of the general demurrer, even if defective in form; when a written instrument is by sufficient reference in a pleading made a part thereof, such instrument becomes as much a part of the pleading as though it had been incorporated verbatim into the body of the pleading.

2. Pleading $\S$ 403(3)—Complaint of landlord aided by tenants' answer.

In an action by a landlord against his tenants for failure to cultivate and sow part of the land to rice as agreed, complaint, if wanting in sufficient facts, held expressly aided by defendants' answer as to breach of the lease by failure to cultivate and plant the lands as provided therein, etc.

3. Pleading $\S$ 428(3)—Defect in complaint cured by reception of evidence without objection.

In an action by a landlord against his tenants for their failure to cultivate part of the land and sow it to rice, as they had agreed, if the complaint was deficient in its failure to allege that defendant tenants agreed to plant the land to rice, or to any crop, such defect was cured by the reception in evidence at the trial without objection by defendants, and also the reception into the record without objection of testimony that defendant tenants had failed to comply with its covenants and terms.

4. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 331(3)—Landlord's action for tenants' breach by not planting crop not premature.

Where tenants agreed to cultivate part of the land and plant it to rice, the lease being for the crop season of 1919, commencing January 4, action for the tenants' breach brought July 5, 1919, a date which is, as matter of common knowledge, far beyond the time for seasonal planting of either rice or oats, did not effect a premature bringing of the action.

5. Landlord and tenant — 331(2)—Measure of landlord's damage from tenants' failure to crop stated.

Under Civ. Code, § 3300, the measure of damages to a landlord from his tenants' failure to crop the land is the amount which will compensate the landlord for all detriment proximately caused by the tenants' failure, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom.

6. Evidence — 520—Expert testimony of value of crops in action by landlord against tenants for failure to raise crop admissible.

In an action by a landlord for his tenants' failure to raise a crop of rice on part of the land, testimony given by experts as to the probable yield of rice on the lands in question for the year involved was competent.

7. Damages — 28—Prospective profits lost through breach of contract recoverable.

Where loss of prospective profits is the natural and direct consequence of a breach of contract, they may be recovered; and he who breaks a contract cannot wholly escape on account of the difficulty which his own wrong has produced of devising a perfect measure of damages.

8. Landlord and tenant — 331(2)—Lease held not to fix landlord's damages from tenants' breach by failing to raise crop.

Lease obligating the tenants to raise a crop on part of the land and giving the landlord a lien to the extent of $1,000 on the entire crop which might be produced, as security for his share of the crop until such share should be delivered to him as provided, held not to have fixed the damages to which the landlord would be entitled in case of failure of the tenants to execute the lease by raising a crop.

9. Evidence — 323(4)—Court justified in accepting tabulated statement of market price as tending to establish the actual price.

In a landlord's action for his tenants' breach by failure to raise a crop of rice on part of the land leased, trial court was justified in accepting, as tending to establish the market price of the rice at the point where defendants were required to deliver the landlord's share, a tabulated statement of prices at the point where defendant tenants were obligated to deliver.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by John H. Meer against C. M. Cerati and another, copartners. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Martin Stevens and A. Caminetti, Jr., both of San Francisco, for appellants.

J. M. Inman, of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. This action is by the plaintiff to recover damages in the sum of $2,500, alleged to have been suffered by him from the alleged breach by the defendants of a certain instrument in writing whereby the plaintiff let or leased certain premises for and during the crop season of the year 1919 to defendants.

The cause was tried by the court, sitting without a jury, and judgment for damages in the sum of $2,310 was awarded plaintiff. The defendants appeal from said judgment under the alternative method.

By the said instrument the plaintiff leased to the defendants certain land embraced within what is known as the Watt's Nicolaus Acres, Sutter county, and consisting of 98.98 acres, for the cropping season of the year 1919. The portions of the writing which are particularly pertinent to the inquiry here read as follows:

"That they (lessees) will in due and proper season sow said premises to approximately one-third or more to rice, and the remainder thereof to oats, and will harvest the same at their own cost, charge, and expense, as soon as the same is suitable for harvesting. That they will, immediately upon harvesting the same, as and for the yearly rental of said premises, deliver to said party of the first part at railroad station at East Nicolaus, one-third part of all oats crops and one-fourth part of all rice crops raised upon said demised premises. That the portion thereof sowed to rice shall be kept free from water grass and other noxious weeds; that said second parties shall furnish and pay for all water used, and pay all other expenses connected with the growing of all the crops on said premises. * * * And it is mutually covenanted and agreed that until such delivery shall be made as aforesaid, the party of the first part shall have a lien and charge upon the entire crop of grain to the amount of $1,000 gold coin, estimated and fixed, and for the purpose of securing said party of the first part for the use and rental of said premises yearly and every year, as the value thereof, the party of the first part reserves the right, to enter upon the premises at any time to make examination of the premises and crops. And if he shall at any time deem himself insecure and unsafe in the matter of the rental, he may take immediate possession of the leased premises to secure or harvest the crop and may dispose of the same by sale or otherwise, accounting to the parties of the second part for any excess realized by him over and above the rental or use of said premises; and all expenses incurred or paid to secure, harvest and make sale of the crop."

The complaint alleges:

"II. That on the 4th day of January, A. D. 1919, plaintiff and defendants entered into one certain lease, a copy of which lease is hereto annexed, marked 'Exhibit A.' and by reference made a part of this complaint.

"III. That pursuant to the terms of said lease, defendants entered into possession of the premises described therein, and are now, and at all the times herein mentioned have been, in continuous possession of said premises.

"IV. That defendants did not cultivate said premises and did not sow one-third thereof, or any part thereof, to rice as in said lease provided, and that defendants did not plant the remainder or any part of said premises to oats as in said lease provided, and did not plow or plant said premises or any part thereof to rice, oats, or to any other crop, and that the season for planting said crops or any of them has passed, and it is now too late to successfully put in any crop upon said premises.

"V. That by reason of the failure of defendants to conform to the terms of said lease by planting said crops as therein provided, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $2,500."

To the complaint the defendants interposed on the general ground a demurrer, which was overruled.

Answering the complaint, the defendants deny that they were at the date of the commencement of this action, or at any time before or since have been, in the possession of the lands and premises "in said complaint referred to, or any part or portion thereof"; admit that they did not cultivate said premises and did not plant any said lands to rice or oats, or to any crop whatsoever; but set up as an excuse for not so cultivating and planting said lands the fact that the plaintiff, having at the time of the making of said lease agreed with defendants to furnish and provide the demised premises with sufficient wells to irrigate the same for rice growing, wholly failed to keep or carry out said agreement, with the result, there being no other source or sources from which the necessary water could be obtained for irrigating the same for rice-growing purposes, that it was impossible to grow or produce any rice thereon; that upon said lands there was but one well, but it was totally inadequate, in the condition in which it was then, and at all times, properly to irrigate said lands or any material portion thereof; and—

"Plaintiff declined and refused to increase the capacity of said well or bore or dig any other wells, or in any way to provide a water supply for defendants in cropping said lands."

The answer states, by way of further excuse for the failure of defendants to cultivate and plant said lands as provided in the agreement of lease, that, although said lease bears date January 4, 1919, as a matter of fact it was not executed until about the middle of February, 1919, after which date the condition of the weather was such, due to rainstorms, that the said lands—

"could not be plowed or cropped until a date entirely too late to permit the growing thereon of any crop; as a result nothing was grown upon said lands but a crop of hay of approximately 35 tons, of which plaintiff received approximately 25 tons."

Upon these averments, the answer finally charges that the failure to grow a rice crop or any crop upon said lands during the term of said lease "was due wholly to the fault of plaintiff." The agreement of lease having been entered into at a time when it was too late to sow oats on the lands, the plaintiff at the trial waived all claim for damages for the failure of the defendants to plant the lands to oats.

The defendants claim that they are entitled to a reversal of the judgment for these reasons: (1) That the complaint does not state a cause of action because it fails to allege in the body thereof that the defendants agreed to plant the land to rice or to any crop; (2) that the evidence does not support the findings; (3) that the evidence adopted by the court as the basis for fixing the damages awarded is "too speculative, uncertain, and conjectural" to constitute a legal criterion for the damages allowed; (4) that the lease itself provides for and fixes the amount which shall be paid to plaintiff by defendants as rental for the land in case no crop was planted thereon; (5) that the action was prematurely brought; and (6) "that the decision is against law, and that the measure of damages adopted by the court was erroneous."

[1] 1. The order overruling the demurrer was not erroneous. The lease is by express averment in the complaint made a part thereof, and is annexed thereto as an exhibit. The pleading, as will be observed, then alleges that defendants "did not cultivate said premises, and did not sow one-third thereof, or any part thereof, to rice, as in said lease provided," etc. This allegation, even if defective in form, was sufficiently aided by the lease itself to overcome the effect of a general demurrer. The general rule is that when a written instrument upon which the plaintiff declares or the defendant bases his defense is by sufficient reference in the pleading made a part thereof, such instrument becomes as much a part of the pleading as though it had been, in hæc verba, incorporated into the body of the pleading. Lambert v. Haskell, 80 Cal. 612, 22 Pac. 327; Georges v. Kessler, 131 Cal. 183, 63 Pac. 466; Ward v. Clay, 82 Cal. 506, 23 Pac. 50, 227. See, also, the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Temple in Hibernia Sav., etc., Soc. v. Thornton, 127 Cal. 575, 60 Pac. 37; Santa Rosa Bank v. Paxton, 149 Cal. 195, 198, 86 Pac. 193. In the last-named case, Mr. Justice Shaw so states the rule in the following manner:

"The rule that a written instrument upon which a cause of action is founded may be pleaded either by setting forth its substance according to its legal effect, or by incorporating a copy in the body of the complaint, or by attaching thereto, by a proper reference, a copy of such instrument, as the pleader may choose, is thoroughly established in this state"—citing a number of cases, among which are those above cited.

The most that can be said of the complaint in this particular is that it is defective in form—that is, defective in the statement of the fact sought to be alleged. In Estate of Cook, 137 Cal. 184, 191, 69 Pac. 968, 971, it is said that "if the allegation be defective it may be aided by an express reference to an exhibit for that avowed purpose." We must construe the language of the complaint here making the lease a part thereof as making it a part of that pleading for all the purposes of a pleading.

The cases cited by the appellant—to wit, City of Los Angeles v. Signoret, 50 Cal. 298, Burkett v. Griffith, 90 Cal. 532, 541, 27 Pac. 527, 13 L. R. A. 707, 25 Am. St. Rep. 151, Ahlers v. Smiley, 11 Cal. App. 343, 104 Pac. 997, and Hayt v. Bentel, 164 Cal. 680, 130 Pac. 432—are different in the facts from this case.

In Los Angeles v. Signoret, the action was for the enforcement of a lien for an assessment on a lot in the city plaintiff levied for the construction of a sewer. The complaint merely alleged that the lien accrued in favor of plaintiff by reason of facts set out in a notice and claim of lien, recorded in a certain designated book in the recorder's office of Los Angeles. There were no averments in the complaint that the requisite jurisdictional steps under the statute had been taken by the governing body of the plaintiff to create and enforce a lien. The notice of lien, however, contained a recital of the various steps required for that purpose, and upon said notice and its recitals the pleader relied, having made the notice a part of the complaint. The court held that the jurisdictional facts should have been expressly pleaded in the complaint. The specific reason upon which the ruling was founded is not given in the opinion; but we can readily perceive why such strictness in pleading the facts in such a case should be required, since the action is virtually for the enforcement of the payment of a tax upon the property of an individual, and the proceedings culminating in the levy of the assessment and the lien are in invitum, and must therefore be affirmatively shown to have been followed in substantial strictness with the requirements of the statute authorizing the work and the levy of an assessment therefor upon the property affected.

In Burkett v. Griffith, the action was for damages against defendant for maliciously disparaging or slandering, by certain false statements, the plaintiff's title to certain property in Los Angeles county. The leases whereby the plaintiff acquired his interest in said property were attached to and by proper reference in the complaint made a part thereof. The complaint itself contained no allegations disclosing the nature or extent of plaintiff's leasehold interest, or the terms of his option to purchase—

"Or what were the covenants of his leases, or the nature of his rights thereunder, nor has he alleged that the covenants or the option are those which are contained in the exhibits."

It was held that, in the absence from the body of the complaint of those and certain other indicated allegations of fact, it could not be determined whether the plaintiff had in fact been damaged by the alleged defamatory statements relative to his title to whatever interest he had in the property supposed to be affected thereby. There is, however, some general language in the opinion in that case which might be regarded as lending support to the position of the appellant here; but we are justified in saying that, if by the use of the general language referred to it was the intention to hold that the rule as therein applied is to have general or indiscriminate application in cases where the contents of an exhibit attached to and made a part of the complaint are relied upon as stating some of the facts essential to the statement of a cause of action, the opinion in that case has not in that particular been followed by the subsequent cases dealing with a like question, some of which are cited above.

In Hayt v. Bentel, the action was to recover back certain installments paid by plaintiff to defendant under a contract for the sale of a certain lot, containing a provision that, on default by plaintiff in the payment of any installment, the defendant might, at his option, declare the whole of the purchase price due, re-enter and take possession, and retain as rent all moneys paid by plaintiff as installment payments on the purchase price. A defective title to the property was discovered which was at all times known to exist by defendant and unknown to plaintiff until just prior to the serving of a notice of rescission of the contract by plaintiff on defendant. The contract was annexed to the complaint, and by reference made a part thereof. The point was made by defendant that—

"Since, under the contract, the plaintiff was entitled to possession of the premises, her notice of rescission was ineffectual for want of an offer to restore such possession."

But to this point the court well replied that there was no allegation either in the complaint or answer that plaintiff ever did take or receive possession, and of course the contract itself could not show that fact.

In Ahlers v. Smiley, the action was for damages for the breach of a contract by which the defendants agreed to buy ice from plaintiffs for the term of two years at a price per ton stipulated in the contract. Previously to the institution of said action, plaintiffs brought suit and therein obtained judgment for an injunction enjoining defendants from purchasing ice from other persons than plaintiffs during the term of their contract. In the later action, plaintiffs alleged in their complaint the filing of the complaint, the answer thereto, the findings and judgment in the action for injunctive relief, and attached copies of all the papers constituting the judgment roll therein to his complaint for damages. The contract was not set out in the latter complaint, "nor was it therein alleged that the plaintiffs ever executed or made any contract whatsoever to supply defendants with ice." Obviously, under such circumstances, it could not well be said that the contract, even though a part of the judgment roll in the injunction suit, was pleaded in the later suit either directly or as an exhibit by proper reference.

[2] But there are two other answers to the point that the complaint, for the reason explained, is wanting in sufficient facts. The first of these is that the answer itself, as will be noted from the above reference to its contents, practically makes the question whether the defendants agreed to cultivate and plant the lands to the crops mentioned, as provided by the lease, an issue by directly admitting that "they did not sow one-third or any thereof (the premises described in the lease) to rice," and that they did not "plant any of said lands to oats, or to any crop whatsoever," following which admission was the statement of facts purporting to justify such failure. It is perfectly clear from the nature of the defense thus set up in the answer that the pleader, when drafting his answer, regarded the complaint as sufficiently clear and explicit to enable him to answer all the vital issues it sought to submit, as he seems to have had no difficulty in meeting both negatively and affirmatively every essentially issuable fact that could arise in the case in any state of the pleadings. See Dennis v. Crocker-Huffman Co., 6 Cal. App. 58, 61, 91 Pac. 425. Indeed, the answer, as to the breaching of the lease by failure to cultivate and plant the lands as provided therein, is, as above indicated, in the nature of a plea by way of confession and avoidance—that is, an admission of the obligation resting on defendants to so plant the lands, the breach of said obligation, and an asserted valid excuse for not executing it. Thus a case of "express aider" in pleading is presented. Cohen v. Knox, 90 Cal. 266, 275, 276, 27 Pac. 215, 13 L. R. A. 711; Donegan v. Houston, 5 Cal. App. 626, 632, 90 Pac. 1073.

[3] The second answer to the point is that, conceding the validity of the charge that the complaint is deficient in the respect pointed out by defendants, the same is cured by the reception in evidence at the trial, without objection by the defendants, of the lease, and also the reception into the record without such objection of testimony that the defendants had failed to comply with its covenants and terms. See Cohen v. Knox, 90 Cal. 266, 275, 276, 27 Pac. 215, 13 L. R. A. 711, supra; Slaughter v. Goldberg, Bowen & Co., 26 Cal. App. 318, 147 Pac. 90; Boyle v. Coast Imp.

[4] 2. The contention that this action was prematurely brought is without merit. The term of the lease, as expressly provided therein, was "for the crop season of 1919," commencing on the 4th day of January of that year. The words "crop season" must be construed with reference to the kind of crops to the growing of which on the lands the defendants were by the lease restricted, to wit, oats and rice. These were the crops for the special growing of which the plaintiff leased the lands to the defendants. The complaint was filed on July 5, 1919, which, as is known as a matter of common knowledge, was far beyond the time for the seasonal planting of either rice or oats. The "cropping season" of 1919, so far as the planting of such crops was concerned, was entirely at an end when the action was brought, and, the defendants having then already breached the covenant as to the planting and growing of rice, there then accrued to plaintiff, at least prima facie, a right of action for the breach.

3. The evidence, both as to damage and damages, consisted in the main of the opinions of persons who had had a number of years' experience in rice growing, a part of which was in the immediate vicinity of the premises in question. The evidence is practically without conflict upon the proposition that, in the immediate locality where the demised lands are situated, the first year's yield of rice upon land suitable to such production, when the season is of average propitiousness for such purpose, is or has been almost invariably greater in bulk or more extensive in quantity than are the yields of succeeding years. The explanation of this is in the fact that, from the use of the great amount of water required to make that cereal grow and thrive, there usually follows a heavy growth in the rice fields of grasses or weeds, indigenous to the soil, the effect of which is to prevent, in a disastrous measure, the proper growth and development of the rice plant. It is also believed that such condition is partly due to the fact that intermingled with the rice seed, in some instances, are seeds from which develops an exotic plant or weed, inimical to the growth of rice, and, like all useless things, prolifically spreads itself over the rice fields. The opinions of the witnesses were therefore based upon the theory that, since the lands had never been planted to rice prior to the year 1919, and were consequently not handicapped for rice growing by the unfavorable conditions referred to, they would probably have that year yielded a fair average crop—that is, such a crop as might confidently be expected from lands of the same quality and character under the conditions existing with reference to said lands in the year 1919.

It is not necessary to detail herein the testimony of the witnesses referred to. It will be sufficient merely to give herein a general summary of their testimony. They testified that they had been engaged in the growing of rice for five, four, and three years on lands situated in near proximity to the lands in question, and which, as to the character of the soil, both as to quality and contour, were in all respects substantially the same as the lands in question; that there had been in some years yields of rice on their lands varying in quantity from 32 to 60 or 70 100-pound sacks to the acre. Some had produced 32 such sacks only; others had obtained a yield of 60 sacks or more; and others had produced 40 and 50 sacks. The larger yields were in years when all conditions for rice production were fairly good. These same witnesses testified that they were well acquainted with plaintiff's lands, referred to in the lease, and with conditions generally thereabouts in the year 1919; that said lands were suitable for rice growing, and that, taking into consideration the climatic conditions in the year 1919, and what lands similarly situated under like conditions had produced, declared it to be their opinion that 33 acres of said lands, which constituted approximately one-third of those leased to the defendants, ought to have produced, if properly cultivated and planted to rice, from 40 to 50 100-pound sacks to the acre.

For the purpose of showing the prevailing market prices of rice in the year 1919, the plaintiff introduced in evidence a printed or typewritten tabulated statement, prepared by the Rice Growers' Association at Sacramento. This statement, the admission of which in evidence for the purpose stated was expressly consented to by counsel for defendants, subject, however, to an objection on the sole ground that, as applied to any yield of rice per acre which the court might determine the land would have returned, it would increase the amount beyond the sum of $1,000, which, as he contended, was the amount of damages to the recovery of which the plaintiff was limited by the lease itself in case of a failure to plant and grow the crops specified in the instrument, showed the varying market prices of rice for different qualities during the months of December, 1919, and January, February, March, and April for some year which is not specifically named in the table, but which we think we may assume was for the year 1920. The prices as so shown ranged, according to quality and time, from 6.45 cents to 7.50 cents per pound. This table, then, if not objectionable as evidence upon the single ground upon which defendants objected thereto, stood before the trial court as an element of the general criterion by which said court was to be guided in determining the extent of the damage and the consequent pecuniary loss suffered by plaintiff from the breach of the lease.

[5] The measure of damages in a case of this character "is the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all detriment proximately caused thereby, or which in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom." Civ. Code, § 3300.

[6, 7] Under all the authorities, the testimony given by the experts as to the probable yield of rice on the lands in question for the year 1919 was undoubtedly competent for that purpose. Indeed, the only and the very best character of evidence for the establishment of the fact of loss of future profits in a case such as the one here must of necessity, as a general rule, come from the testimony of experts or persons who, from long experience in the same line of business, have acquired such a knowledge of the results of the operations of such business as to enable them to state with at least approximate accuracy what, in the way of profits under given conditions, the future potentialities of the business may be. It is, of course, to be conceded that prospective profits, as damages, are incapable of being shown with that accuracy with which the ordinary questions of fact can be established. Expert testimony, especially that from which the court or jury must determine what will be the probable profits of the business in the future, is not always or even generally the most satisfactory. But, with all these disadvantages with respect to proof in cases of this character, it is still the law that prospective or future profits may be the basis of a recovery. Manifestly, to recover future profits as damages, it must be shown that the loss in that particular was the direct result of the act or omission of the party from whom recovery of damages therefor is sought. In other words, if the alleged future profits were entirely collateral to the subject-matter of the contract alleged to have been broken, and not consequences flowing in a direct line from the breach of such contract, they will be rejected as not constituting a proper basis for a recovery. But, as is said in Shoemaker v. Acker, 116 Cal. 239, 245, 48 Pac. 62:

"Where the prospective profits are the natural and direct consequences of the breach of the contract they may be recovered; and he who breaks the contract cannot wholly escape on account of the difficulty which his own wrong has produced of devising a perfect measure of damages."

See, also, Sutherland on Damages (2d Ed.) §§ 64, 72, 107, 120; Masterton v. Mayor, 7 Hill (N. Y.) 61, 42 Am. Dec. 38; United States v. Behan, 110 U. S. 344, 4 Sup. Ct. 81, 28 L. Ed. 168; Rice v. Whitmore, 74 Cal. 619, 16 Pac. 501, 5 Am. St. Rep. 479; Hale v. Trout, 35 Cal. 229; Stoddard v. Treadwell, 26 Cal. 308; Cederberg v. Robison, 100 Cal. 98, 99, 34 Pac. 625; Tahoe Ice Co. v. Union Ice Co., 109 Cal. 242, 41 Pac. 1020; Sacchi v. Bayside Lumber Co., 13 Cal. App. 72, 85, 108 Pac. 885; 8 Ruling Case Law, §§ 62 and 63, pp. 501, 503. Of course, the damages claimed in this case are based upon future profits which were the natural and direct consequences of the breach of the contract, and not collateral to the subject-matter thereof, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover such damages as the court below could justly find from the evidence taken before it, and of which we have given above a statement in substance, that he had suffered through the breach of the contract by the defendants. And we cannot say upon the record before us that the amount awarded is not a just admeasurement of the damages which the plaintiff actually sustained.

[8] 4. The claim that the lease itself fixes the damages to which the plaintiff would be entitled in case of the failure of the defendants to execute the terms of the instrument is devoid of force. The provision of the lease upon which the proposition is founded is that which gives to the plaintiff a lien to the extent of $1,000 upon the entire crop which might have been produced on the lands as security for his share of the crop until such share should be delivered to him as provided by the writing. Immediately following that provision in the lease is one whereby the plaintiff was authorized, as further security for his rights under the agreement, and in case he should deem himself "insecure and unsafe in the matter of rental," to take immediate possession of the premises, harvest the crops, and sell the same, accounting to the defendants for whatever they might be entitled to.

Reading these two provisions together, it is to our minds manifest that the provision for the $1,000 lien was not intended for the purpose of providing for liquidated damages for default in carrying out the terms of the lease, but was, in effect, intended only to operate as a mortgage to secure plaintiff for his share of whatever crops that might be grown on the lands. In other words, we do not think that, in inserting in the lease the provision for the lien, the fact of the probable failure of the defendants to cultivate and plant the crops as agreed was in the minds of the parties, or that the lien provided for should be referable to such an event. Indeed, the language of the provision in question does not square, either in language or effect, with section 1671 of the Civil Code, providing for agreements for liquidated damages for the breaking of contracts. Said section reads:

"The parties to a contract may agree therein upon an amount which shall be presumed to be the amount of damage sustained by a breach thereof, when, from the nature of the case, it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage."

There is, as is to be noted, no express reference in the provision of the lease as to the lien to a breach of the instrument. The section of the Code might be applicable to a case of this kind because there is, as we have shown, more or less difficulty to be encountered in such a case in fixing actual damages for a breach of the agreement; but when it is the intention to invoke and apply its provisions in a contract to which they may be pertinent, particularly to a contract (as the one here) damages for the breach of which are not altogether incapable of ascertainment, such intention should be disclosed by language which can leave in the mind little doubt thereof, lest the injured party might be foreclosed from showing a much greater amount of damage than the agreement would limit him to.

[9] 5. We cannot say from the record as it is presented to us that the amount allowed by the court as the value of the rice did not represent the then market price of East Nicolaus, at which point the defendants were obligated to deliver the plaintiff's one-fourth share of the crop. Under the lease the defendants were to plant, grow, and harvest the rice and deliver plaintiff's part thereof at the place just named, at their own expense, and, as also shown, the finding as to the value of the rice for the year 1919 was predicated upon the tabulated statement of prices above referred to. That statement did not show the particular market or markets where the prices therein given could be obtained; nor did the defendants show or attempt to show that fact; and, since they claimed as a deduction from the price allowed the cost of marketing the rice, we think it was, under the circumstances, incumbent upon them to do so. At any rate, as the only evidence made available to the court upon the question of the price or value of the rice was that afforded by the statement referred to, and, as that statement showed that rice was selling in the market at 7 cents per pound, we think the court was justified in accepting it as tending to establish the market price of the rice at the point where the defendants were, under their agreement, required to deliver it. Telander v. Tujunga Water & Power Co., 185 Pac. 504.

6. The last point to which attention may be given involves the proposition that it was the duty of the plaintiff to show by pleading and proof that he did not and could not rent the premises to be used for other purposes for the remainder of the year 1919 after the lease had been breached and it was too late to plant the land to rice. The point is made for the first time on this appeal, it not having been raised in the court below, as it could have been, either by demurrer or on a motion for a new trial, or by both. But we think a reply to the point lies in the fact that the answer expressly admitted the first part, and did not deny, which, in pleading, is the equivalent of admitting, the italicized part of the allegation:

"That the season for planting said crops or any of them has passed, and it is now too late to successfully put in any crop upon said premises."

But it is perhaps true that, since it may be assumed that the premises as they then stood were suitable only for agricultural purposes, they were of some value for pasturage purposes, and as to this it is to be said that the plaintiff, when testifying, admitted that he had rented them temporarily for the pasturing of sheep in the month of November, 1919, and after the defendants had surrendered possession of the lands, and that he received for such pasturage the sum of $25. It seems, though, that the sheep were largely "pastured" from a quantity of loose hay which had been cut by the defendants on the premises, the same having been left there by them as plaintiff's share thereof. But, even if it be answered that it was the duty of the court to reckon the $25 as in diminution of the judgment to that extent, yet, as that item is to be considered by this court in determining whether the judgment should be reversed, it may, when compared to the size of the judgment, justly be disregarded on the doctrine of de minimis non curat lex.

There are some other objections to certain findings, but they do not, in our view, merit special notice.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re SCHAEFFER'S ESTATE.

BARNETT et al. v. SCHAEFFER.

(Civ. 3854.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨631—Printing of record of trial court held not necessary.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a, 953c, providing that appellant may file a request for a transcript of the testimony offered and other proceedings at the trial, and that no transcript of the record need be printed, the clerk's type-written transcript on an appeal from a decree settling the final account of an administratrix and decreeing distribution, including the verified final account, report, and petition for distribution, written oppositions and exceptions thereto, and the order and decree settling the account, directing distribution, and setting out the findings of the court on the matter in controversy, is sufficient, and a printed record is unnecessary.

2. Limitation of actions ⇨41—Statute of limitation applies to settling off debt due ancestor by distributee of estate.

Where limitations had run against a debt due from distributee of the estate of the deceased, the debt may not be set off against the share of the distributee.

3. Limitation of actions ⇨165—Right created by statute of limitations to be protected by courts.

The statute of limitations creates a right which is to be protected as any other right, whenever it is invoked in a legal proceeding, though it pertains only to the remedy.

4. Limitation of actions ⇨36(1)—Statute of limitations applies both at law and in equity.

The statute of limitations applies equally in suits in equity and in actions at law.

5. Courts ⇨200—Court sitting in probate has only the jurisdiction conferred by statute.

The superior court, when sitting in probate, is vested only with the limited jurisdiction conferred upon it by statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Proceeding for distribution of the estate of Rebecca Schaeffer, deceased. From an order settling the final account and decreeing distribution favorably to Henry C. Schaeffer, Johanna Barnett, individually and as administratrix with the will annexed, and others, appeal. Affirmed.

W. E. Rode, of Oakland, for appellants.
Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. Certain of the heirs and devisees of Rebecca Schaeffer, deceased, and the administratrix, appeal on a question of law alone from the order and decree settling the final account of the administratrix, and decreeing distribution of the residue of the estate. The respondent makes a preliminary objection and seeks a dismissal in the absence of a printed record.

[1] The appeal is prosecuted under the alternative method. The transcript, prepared in the manner prescribed by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, is properly authenticated by the clerk. It includes, among other papers, the verified final account, report, and petition for distribution, the written opposition and exceptions thereto, the order and decree settling the account, and directing distribution, which sets out the findings of the court upon the matter in controversy. It was not necessary that the record be printed. The enumerated papers, constituting the ordinary judgment roll (Estate of Gamble, 166 Cal. 253, 255, 135 Pac. 970), are properly presented in the typewritten "Clerk's Transcript," (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a, 953c; Supreme Court rule 7 [32 Sup. Ct. vi]). The appellants have printed in full in the appendix to their brief, as required by the Code, the portions of the record which they desire to call to the attention of the court, in presenting the point to be considered on this appeal. Nothing more was required. The cases relied upon by the respondent to support his contention were rendered inapplicable by the amendment to section 953a, adopted by the Legislature in 1915. Silvers v. Grossman, 192 Pac. 534.

Rebecca Schaeffer died testate, leaving four children, who were made devisees under the will. When the estate was in condition to be closed, the administratrix with the will annexed filed the final account and report of her administration, together with a petition for final distribution. As shown by the account, the property to be distributed consisted of quite a large amount of cash, one United States Liberty Bond, two notes and mortgages, and a claim against Henry C. Schaeffer, this respondent, for $790, alleged to be due for rent. One of the notes secured by mortgage also represented an indebtedness of respondent. In the petition for distribution the administratrix asked that the total indebtedness of said Henry C. Schaeffer, including the claim for rent, be offset against and deducted from his distributive share of the estate, which was somewhat in excess of the estate's demand against him. The respondent filed written objections and exceptions to the account and petition for distribution, in which he denied that the sum of $790, or any amount, was due from him to the estate for rent, and interposed the bar of the statute of limitations against the claim. He resisted the prayer for a deduction of that amount from his distributive share of the estate.

At the hearing it was stipulated, and the decree settling the final account and of distribution recites, that in 1912 the respondent was indebted to Rebecca Schaeffer, the deceased, in the sum of $790 for rent, that the indebtedness has never been paid, that a written acknowledgment or promise to pay the same has never been given, and that the indebtedness was barred by the statute of limitations at the time Rebecca Schaeffer executed her will, and at the time of her death. The lower court sustained the position of the respondent. It distributed the assets of the estate to the persons entitled, but refused to deduct the indebtedness for rent from respondent's distributive share. It is from that portion of the order and decree that this appeal is prosecuted, presenting for our consideration, as the single question of law, the effect of the bar of the statute of limitations upon the right of the court, sitting in probate, to deduct an indebtedness from the distributive share of the debtor in his ancestor's estate.

[2] It is, of course, the well-settled general rule, with certain exceptions, that when the residue of the estate consists of money a debt due from a distributee to an estate, and forming a part of the assets of the estate, may be properly set off against the distributive share due such debtor, whenever it can be done without injustice to the parties. Estate of Gamble, supra, 166 Cal. 257, 135 Pac. 970; 18 Corp. Jur. pp. 383, 384; 11 R. C. L. § 276. As to debts barred by the statute of limitations, it is the rule in some jurisdictions that they may be deducted, and in others that they may not. 18 Corp. Jur. supra. The question has never been considered by the appellate courts of this state, so far as we can ascertain, but we incline to the side of those jurisdictions which hold that the interposition of the statute of limitations is as effective as a bar to any such action, in a proceeding in probate on distribution, as it would be in an ordinary legal action to recover the amount of the indebtedness alleged to be due. The authorities which hold to the contrary refuse, for the most part, upon broad equitable grounds, to accord the right and privilege to a distributee of an estate to interpose the bar of the statute of limitations on distribution, which he would have in an action brought against him by the testator, if living, or by the personal representative of the decedent's estate.

[3, 4] We see no just reason for making such a distinction. It was long ago held in this jurisdiction that the statute of limitations is to be regarded as one of repose, the benefit of which cannot be taken from one without his consent. McCarthy v. White, 21 Cal. 495, 502, 82 Am. Dec. 754. It avails in suits in equity equally with actions at law. Grattan v. Wiggins, 23 Cal. 16, 34; Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 267, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674. The defense of the statute is a privilege personal to the debtor, and whenever in any legal proceeding it is invoked by the debtor, the court is compelled to recognize it as a defense. Bates v. Gregory, 89 Cal. 387, 398, 26 Pac. 891. The right to invoke the bar of the statute is as much to be protected as any other right that a man has. The fact that the defense pertains to the remedy does not alter the case. Deprivation of a remedy is equivalent to a deprivation of the right which it is intended to vindicate. Board of Education v. Blodgett, 155 Ill. 441, 450, 40 N. E. 1025, 31 L. R. A. 70, 46 Am. St. Rep. 348.

[5] The lower court, sitting in probate in the instant case, was vested only with the limited jurisdiction conferred upon it by statute. Martinovich v. Marsicano, 137 Cal. 354, 356, 70 Pac. 459. It may not be seriously contended that it had any greater power in this matter than it would have possessed if in the exercise of its legal or equitable jurisdiction. The real purpose of the petition was, and its only effect, if granted, would be, to enforce collection of the debt in question. The proceeding was therefore clearly analogous to an action at law for the same purpose. It follows that, under the stipulated facts, the trial court properly held that the statute of limitations barred, not only the remedy of the appellants, as the heirs and personal representatives of the testatrix, but the right to collect the debt as well. It therefore properly refused to offset the amount against respondent's share of the estate. Hesley v. Shaw, 120 Ill. App. 92, 100; Boden v. Mier, 71 Neb. 191, 199, 98 N. W. 701; Allen v. Edwards, 136 Mass. 138; Milne's Appeal, 99 Pa. 483, 490; Richardson v. Keel, 77 Tenn. (9 Lea) 74, 78.

KLOKKE INV. CO. v. LISSNER et al.

1. Appeal and error ⌘909(4)—Decree of distribution to person raises presumption of legacy or sole heirship.

That a note and mortgage were distributed to a person by a decree of distribution raises a presumption that she was the decedent's sole heir, or the legatee of that portion of the estate.

2. Descent and distribution ⌘76—Wills ⌘733(1)—Legatee has title to note and mortgage of ancestor at latter's death subject to debts, etc., which becomes absolute on distribution.

Title to a note and mortgage vested in one who was either a legatee thereof or sole heir, at the death of the testator, subject to the payment of debts and expenses of administration, and the carrying out of the will, and when not needed for those purposes title became absolute on distribution.

3. Executors and administrators ⚡106—Release of mortgage by executrix of estate held valid.

Where a mortgage belonging to an estate was released by the executrix, upon giving another mortgage, which was distributed by the decree of distribution, the release of the first mortgage, although made without an order of the court, was binding on the executrix and, after distribution of the entire estate, was absolute and beyond attack.

4. Escrows ⚡8(1)—Holder of released mortgage delivered in escrow holds as agent of one paying mortgage.

Where a mortgage was released and delivered in escrow, to be held until certain parties gave another note and mortgage instead, after performance of these conditions, the holder had custody as agent of the parties who gave the mortgage and note to secure the release of the first mortgage, and not for the mortgagee.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by the Klokke Investment Company, a corporation, against Meyer Lissner and others to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for plaintiff, all defendants except one, R. Lewis, appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 39 Cal. App. 717, 179 Pac. 728.

Ray Howard and Joseph L. Lewinsohn, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Oscar Lawler and W. W. Butler, both of Los Angeles (John M. Hall, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by all the defendants except one, R. Lewis, from a judgment against the defendants for the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by the defendants Meyer Lissner and Ermine Lissner, his wife, on January 2, 1915, for the sum of $85,000, with interest. The mortgage was made to Johanna E. Klokke, executrix of the estate of Ernst F. C. Klokke, and was by her duly assigned to the plaintiff.

The only answer embraced in the record on appeal is that of Louis M. Lissner. The other answers were omitted upon a stipulation of all parties that the allegations of that answer present all the facts material to the defense of the other defendants.

The defense set up in said answer is that the mortgage and note sued on were given without any consideration. The facts upon which this defense rests are alleged to be as follows: On June 2, 1912, one C. B. Youngken and W. E. McVay executed to Ernst F. C. Klokke a note for $85,000 and a mortgage to secure the same on the property described in the complaint, due January 2, 1915. In the year 1914 Klokke died and Johanna E. Klokke was duly appointed executrix of his estate and she qualified as such executrix. After the said Youngken and McVay mortgage became due, Meyer Lissner and wife executed to Johanna E. Klokke, as executrix as aforesaid, the note and mortgage in suit, in consideration of the release and cancellation by said executrix of the said note and mortgage given by Youngken and McVay, as aforesaid. This, of course, was on its face an adequate and sufficient consideration for the note and mortgage of Lissner, if the release and cancellation of the previous note and mortgage were valid and effectual. The answer further avers that said executrix was not, by the will of Ernst F. C. Klokke, empowered to release said mortgage; that she never obtained any order of the court in probate empowering her, as executrix or otherwise, to release or cancel said mortgage; that she afterwards rendered her final account as executrix of the estate, in which she returned the Youngken and McVay note and mortgage as part of the assets of said estate; that the account was settled accordingly; that a decree of distribution of the estate was thereafter duly made, whereby said Youngken and McVay note and mortgage were distributed to her as legatee under said will; that said Youngken and McVay note and mortgage were never actually delivered up, surrendered or canceled; that said Johanna E. Klokke is still the owner and holder thereof; that she elected to and did retain the same and repudiated the said note and mortgage of Lissner and wife sued on herein; and that the prior mortgage of Youngken and McVay still remains a lien on the property in favor of said Johanna E. Klokke, to the prejudice of said defendant.

The findings below were to the effect that the consideration of the note and mortgage sued on was the satisfaction and cancellation of said Youngken and McVay note and mortgage; that a release thereof was executed by Johanna E. Klokke as executrix as aforesaid, and delivered by her to the Title Insurance & Trust Company in escrow, to be by them surrendered and canceled upon the execution and delivery of the note and mortgage sued on, and that this was done accordingly, but that the custody of the said Youngken and McVay mortgage was retained by said Trust Company, and that in November, 1915, said executrix filed her final account and petition for distribution in said estate; that said account did not show said note and mortgage sued on as an asset of said estate, but did include said Youngken and McVay note and mortgage as an asset thereof, but that the note and mortgage sued on was distributed to Johanna E. Klokke by the decree of distribution in said estate; that the Youngken and McVay note and mortgage had been previously satisfied and canceled as aforesaid and that the said account and said decree were erroneous in so far as they included the prior note and mortgage as assets of said estate, and that Johanna E. Klokke is not now, and was not when the action was begun, the owner or holder of said Youngken and McVay note and mortgage, or either of them, and that the same do not constitute a lien or incumbrance upon the property described therein. It should be added in explanation that it is conceded that both of the said mortgages covered the same property. It is also conceded that the will did not expressly authorize said executrix to satisfy or release said prior mortgage, nor did she as executrix obtain any order of court giving her such authority or approving the same.

The briefs of the parties are devoted mainly to the discussion of the question whether or not an executrix could lawfully extend the time on a note belonging to the estate, or take a new mortgage and note as consideration for the release of a mortgage belonging to the estate, where the new mortgage extends the time of payment beyond that given by the original mortgage, unless the will itself gives such authority, or authority is obtained from the court having jurisdiction of the estate in probate. We do not think these questions are necessary to the decision of the case.

[1-3] The fact that the note and mortgage sued on were distributed by the court below to said Johanna E. Klokke upon the decree of distribution of said estate raises the presumption that she was the sole heir of the decedent, or the legatee of that portion thereof. The decree itself is set forth in the bill of exceptions, and it shows that all the assets of the estate were distributed to her. The legal title to the Youngken and McVay mortgage therefore vested in Johanna E. Klokke at the time of the death of Ernst F. C. Klokke, subject to administration. This means that the complete title to said note and mortgage vested in her at his death, except so far as resort thereto was necessary for the payment of the debts and expenses of administration and for the carrying out of the provisions of the will. The result of the administration, as disclosed in the findings, shows that resort to said note and mortgage was not necessary for either of these purposes. Consequently her title became absolute upon such distribution. Under these circumstances, the release by Johanna E. Klokke of the original note and mortgage became binding upon her personally, whether binding upon the estate or not. When the administration was closed and the note and mortgage taken in satisfaction thereof were distributed to her, whatever title the estate may have had by reason of any defect in her power for the satisfaction of the original note and mortgage, passed to her as the sole successor to the estate. The result is that she is estopped from ever setting up or claiming any benefit whatever from the Youngken and McVay mortgage and from attempting in any way to enforce the same. By the facts found in this case the defendants are fully protected against any prejudice on account of any defect that may exist with respect to the release executed by Johanna E. Klokke as executrix of the estate of Ernst F. C. Klokke. The questions argued with respect to her power in the premises might have been of some importance if they had arisen and become applicable prior to the final settlement of said estate, but when upon such settlement she succeeded to the full ownership of all of the said estate, including any shadow of technical force left in the original note and mortgage, as well as the note and mortgage sued on, taken in lieu of the original, and thereupon assigned the new note and mortgage to the plaintiffs, she thereby ratified the release of the prior mortgage, and those questions ceased to be of any importance.

[4] The evidence makes it very clear that there is no merit in the defense pleaded. When the old mortgage was released it was delivered to the agent of Lissner in exchange for the new note and mortgage, and that agent thereafter held custody of the old note and mortgage as agent for Lissner, not for Mrs. Klokke. They were, in legal contemplation, delivered up to him. The note was not negotiable and it was not possible for any person to use it to the injury of Lissner or those interested under him. Upon the settlement of the estate and the distribution of everything to Mrs. Klokke, the satisfaction became absolute and beyond attack. The technical conditions which defendants now claim imperiled their rights and threatened them with a double payment of the debt had ceased to exist before this suit was begun, and the defendants would be presumed to have had notice thereof, since the facts were either within their knowledge, or matters of public record. The original debt has never been paid. If the defense were held good, the defendant would escape payment altogether.

We are not to be understood as intimating that, under the circumstances of this case as above shown, the release of the old note and mortgage and the surrender of the note would not have been binding upon the estate, even before the close of the administration, since it did not cause the estate any prejudice other than the extension of the time of payment, and the only persons interested consented thereto. Maddock v. Russell, 109 Cal., at pages 423, 424, 42 Pac. 139.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte GIRARD. (Cr. 2393.)

1. Licenses $\S$ 18½, New, vol. 12A Key-No. Series—Trustees doing business under declaration of trust and issuing certificates of interest held a "company," within the Corporate Securities Act.

Where four persons engaged in business under a declaration of trust making such persons trustees, and as such trustees sold unit interests in the business to persons for whom they carried on the business and held title to the property in trust, and to whom they issued unit certificates transferring to the holder a proportional interest in the property held by the trustees in pursuance of the trust, the sale of such unit shares without a permit from the corporation commissioner held violative of the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673), as amended by St. 1919, p. 231, the business constituting a "company," within such act, in view of section 2, subds. 3-5, 9.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Company.]

2. Constitutional law $\S$ 240(1) — Corporate Securities Act held not unconstitutional, as discriminating between sales of securities by trustees under wills and those under other instruments.

The Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673), as amended by St. 1919, p. 231, permitting trustees created by a will or by an order of court in a judicial proceeding to sell securities issued by such trustees without a permit from the corporation commissioner, while forbidding the sale of such securities without such permit in the case of a trust created under an instrument executed between individuals, held not unconstitutional by reason of such discrimination.

3. Constitutional law $\S$ 48—Statute not held unconstitutional for discrimination, unless there is no rational doubt as to the improper discrimination.

A court will not declare a law unconstitutional in the matter of discrimination, unless there is no rational doubt that it improperly discriminates between persons similarly situated.

Application by G. S. Girard for writ of habeas corpus. Petition denied.

A. J. Bledsoe, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

SHAW, J. The petitioner alleges that he is unlawfully imprisoned by the sheriff of the county of Los Angeles upon a warrant of arrest issued out of the justice court of Los Angeles township upon a complaint which fails to charge a public offense. The complaint charges that the Crystal & Colored Glass Company was a company of which four persons, namely, Mayer, Marshall, Stevenson, and the petitioner, Girard, were trustees, and that neither said company nor any of said trustees thereof had obtained any permit from the commissioner of corporations to issue or sell any of the securities of the company or any shares, interests, or rights into which the capital stock or property of the said company and the rights of stockholders and members thereof were divided, or to sell any instrument issued or offered to the public by said company and trustees evidencing any right to a share in the profits or earnings or distribution of assets of the business of said company; that said Mayer, Marshall, Stevenson, and Girard did then and there willfully, unlawfully, knowingly, and feloniously, and for a valuable consideration, direct and aid in the issue and sale of, and execute and sell, shares, interests, and rights into which the capital stock and property of said company and the rights of members and holders thereof were divided, and a certain instrument offered to the public by said company, evidencing a right to participate and share in the profits, earnings, and distribution of assets of the business of the company to wit: To John Phillips 1,000 unit interests, to William Phillips 1,000 unit interests, to Earl Fulton 500 unit interests, and to John Blaine 1,000 unit interests, in consideration of the sum of $300 paid by William Phillips, $300 by John Phillips, $100 by Earl Fulton, and $150 by John Blaine, contrary to the statute, etc.

The complaint attempts to state a cause of action under the provisions of the act known as the "Corporate Securities Act," in common parlance known as the "Blue Sky Law," enacted in 1917, as amended in 1919. Stats. 1917, p. 673; Stats. 1919 p. 231. Section 2 of the act declares that "the word 'company' includes all domestic and foreign, private corporations, associations, joint stock companies, and partnerships, of every kind, and also trustees, as hereinafter defined" (subdivision 3); also that "the word 'trust' as used in this act includes all voluntary trusts, as the same are defined in the Civil Code, expressly created by or declared in an instrument in writing, other than a will or judicial writ, order, decree, or judgment, to carry on any business or to secure the payment or repayment of money" (subdivision 4), and that "the word 'trustee,' except as hereinafter used in subdivision 9 of this section, includes only persons or companies executing trusts as hereinbefore defined" (subdivision 5). Subdivision 9 of the section refers only to trustees of a testamentary trust or trust established by judicial decree. It has no bearing on the character of trust here in controversy. The act further provides that "no company shall sell," except for delinquent assessment, as provided for sales of stock under the Civil Code, "any security of its own issue until it shall have first applied for and secured from the commissioner a permit authorizing it so to do" (section 3). The act creates a state corporation department and provides for the appointment of a commissioner of corporations to perform the duties prescribed in the act. Section 13 provides that every company which shall directly or indirectly issue or cause to be issued any security contrary to the provisions of the act shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $10,000. The petition alleges that the Crystal & Colored Glass Company is a common-law trust company existing and organized in pursuance of a declaration of trust filed for record with the county recorder of Los Angeles county on March 31, 1921, that it is not incorporated, and that the sole claim of the prosecution in the case is that the sale of the unit interests provided for in said declaration of trust constitutes a violation of said Corporate Securities Act.

Said declaration of trust is to the effect that it constitutes an agreement between the said four trustees above named—

"for the purpose of enabling the holders of trust shares hereunder to distribute the advantages and risks of their investments from different securities and business enterprises in a way ordinarily possible to investors, and to that end hold as a common or joint investment for the common or equal benefit of the shareholders ratably according to their several holdings of unit shares the real or personal property transferred or conveyed to, vested in, or acquired by the trustees under this agreement, and to invest and reinvest such money and funds as may be paid to the trustees or be realized by them from the disposition of shares issued hereunder in such manner and in such business enterprises, securities, and real or personal property as under the terms of this instrument shall be permissible and in the judgment of the trustees * * * shall tend to enhance the value of the shares issued hereunder as investments."

The trustees thereby declare that they will hold all property acquired by them as trustees in trust for the benefit of the holders of the certificates of shares issued as evidence of interests, in accordance with the terms of the agreement. The name of the trust is declared to be "the Crystal & Colored Glass Company." The trustees are given power and authority "to issue common shares representing unit interests of no par value." It provides that negotiable certificates for 26,000 units are to be issued to the four trustees named above in equal quantity; each trustee to receive 6,500 unit shares, evidenced by certificates which, as above stated, are to be negotiable. Each unit certificate had the effect of transferring to the holder thereof a proportional interest in the property held by the trustees in pursuance of the trust.

[1] The offense described in the complaint was the sale of these unit interests to the different persons therein mentioned for the prices therein stated, without having received from the commissioner of corporations any permit so to do. It will be seen, from the above definitions of the words "company," "trust," and "trustees," that the Crystal & Colored Glass Company comes precisely within those definitions, and constitutes a company within the meaning of the act, and of the provisions thereof, forbidding such company to sell securities of its own issue without a permit. The charge is that the four trustees made the sales set forth in the complaint. A sale of unit shares or unit interests as described in the said declaration of trust without a permit from the corporation commissioner is without doubt a violation of the act.

[2, 3] The defendant argues that the law is unconstitutional for the reason that it is discriminatory, in that it permits trustees created by a will or by an order of court in a judicial proceeding to sell securities issued by such trustees without a permit, while forbidding it in a case of a trust created under an instrument executed between individuals such as that here under consideration. We are satisfied that there is no just ground for declaring this to be an improper discrimination. We cannot declare a law unconstitutional in the matter of discrimination, unless there is no rational doubt that it improperly discriminates between persons similarly situated. We must presume that the Legislature made inquiry to determine whether or not there were evils which required regulation, and that upon such inquiry it was ascertained that the mischief sought to be corrected was being done under the form of trusts created by private individuals, and not under the form of testamentary trusts or trusts declared in judicial proceedings.

The trust here involved is a striking example of the practices which the Legislature intended to prevent. The corporation commission is required to investigate concerning the assets of such a trust, and to refuse to permit it to do business unless upon such investigation he finds that the proposed plan of business is not unfair, unjust, or inequitable, and that the company intends to fairly and honestly transact its business and that the securities it proposes to issue and the methods to be used in disposing of the same are not such as in his opinion will work a fraud upon the purchaser. Conceding that the business intended to be done would be legitimate and lawful, it is evident from the experience of mankind that it is of a character which renders it justly subject to regulation, as much so as that of the corporations towards which the law is principally directed. The provisions regarding companies, trusts, and trustees were inserted in the act for the evident purpose of preventing evasions such as would follow if the operation of the act was confined to corporations alone.

So far as the question of discrimination is concerned, it may be safely assumed that very few testators will ever conceive the idea of creating a trust such as that here under consideration, and such as are described in the Corporate Securities Act, for the purpose of having business of that kind carried on after their death. The fact that no provision is made for the regulation of such testamentary trusts does not render the law discriminatory or unjust toward those institutions to which it applies. The principle involved is the same as that applied in Ex parte Spencer, 149 Cal. 401, 86 Pac. 897, 117 Am. St. Rep. 137, 9 Ann. Cas. 1105, where it was claimed that legislation prohibiting the employment of minors in certain trades was discriminatory. The court said:

"The power to forbid their employment in certain occupations and not in all, depends on the questions whether or not any appreciable number of children are employed in the callings not forbidden, and whether or not those callings are injurious to them, or less injurious than those forbidden. If certain occupations are especially harmful to young children, and others are not so, there can be no serious doubt that it is within the power of the Legislature to forbid their employment in one class and permit it in the other. The difference in the results would justify the classification with a view to the difference in the legislation."

And the court proceeds to hold that these questions of fact were for the legislature to ascertain and determine and that—

"If any rational doubt exists as to the soundness of the legislative judgment upon the existence of the facts, that doubt must be resolved in favor of the legislative action, and the law must accordingly be held to be valid in these respects."

To the same effect, see San Luis Obispo v. Murphy, 162 Cal. 593, 123 Pac. 810, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 71, where it was said that—

"The Legislature may have reasonably concluded that the cases in which a charge is made by a personal surety on an official bond are so inappreciable and insignificant in number that, in reality, the surety corporation bonds 'compose the entire class' as to which there is a premium or charge for the risk assumed by the surety, and such a conclusion would warrant the limitation of the provisions of the act to such bond."

So in the present case, the Legislature may have concluded that the evils which might occur from the administration of a testamentary trust or trust declared by judicial decree or order were so insignificant and inappreciable, and the mischiefs arising from the other trusts described in the act which are forbidden to issue securities without a permit comparatively so great, that the latter comprise the entire class to which legislation should be directed.

For these reasons we have concluded that there is no merit in the application for the writ.

It is ordered that the petition for habeas corpus be denied.

TRAVIS GLASS CO. v. IBBETSON.

1. Creditors' suit $\S$ 8(5)—Judgment creditor may maintain statutory action for conversion of property of judgment debtor.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 720, permitting action against a person alleged to have property of the judgment debtor to be brought by a judgment creditor, whose judgment is unsatisfied, an action may be maintained against defendant for converting property belonging to the judgment debtor, since the purpose of the statutory proceedings supplementary to execution is the same as that of the original creditor's bill in equity, to enable the creditor to reach property which could not otherwise be made to contribute to the payment of the judgment.

2. Evidence $\S$ 594—Finding of trial judge held not error, though evidence not directly contradicted.

Where defendant's evidence was to the effect that property of a judgment debtor taken by him was given to him for the purpose of selling, and to apply the proceeds on a debt owed to him by the judgment debtor, but this testimony was impaired by defendant's testimony in another suit that the property was taken by him under a chattel mortgage, the finding of the trial court that the goods were wrongfully sold by defendant is not error, since the trial judge or jury is not required to find in accordance with evidence merely because it may be uncontradicted.

3. Creditors' suit $\S$ 18—Defense that owner of goods converted owed defendant more than their value held insufficient.

In an action by a judgment creditor for the conversion of property of the judgment debtor, the defense that the judgment debtor owed defendant more than the value of the goods taken is not sufficient, since it would not have been a successful defense in an action for conversion by the judgment debtor.

4. Judgment $\S$ 670—Suit held not determined by former suit between same parties over same subject-matter, where plaintiff sues in different capacity.

Although a former suit between the same parties involving the same subject-matter was brought by plaintiff, claiming ownership of converted property, plaintiff may maintain a suit as a judgment creditor against a converter of property belonging to his judgment debtor, since in this suit the capacity in which plaintiff sues is different than in the first suit.

5. Creditors' suit ☞14—Showing of insolvency of judgment debtor held sufficient.

A stipulation to the effect that plaintiff had obtained judgment against a judgment debtor, and that no part had been paid, and that execution had been issued and returned unsatisfied, is sufficient showing of the insolvency of the judgment debtor in an action against a converter of goods belonging to the judgment creditor.

6. Creditors' suit ☞46—Findings of trial court as to value of property held warranted by evidence.

A finding in a judgment creditor's suit that the value of converted property was in excess of $926.44 was supported by evidence where defendant sold the property for $857.57 and plaintiff had sued the judgment debtor for purchase price of the same property and recovered judgment for $1,108.05.

7. Appeal and error ☞1033(9) — Ruling of court as to value of property held not prejudicial where different ruling would have resulted in larger judgment against appellant.

Ruling of court to the effect that the value of property established at another trial was conclusive as to the value of the same property in the present trial was not prejudicial where the adoption of another view by the court would have resulted in a larger judgment against defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by the Travis Glass Company, a corporation, against R. E. Ibbetson. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. Wiseman Macdonald, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. W. Falkner, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. The present creditors' suit for conversion is the outcome of a succession of events, which began when the Travis Glass Company, a corporation having its principal place of business in the city of Clarksburg, W. Va., sold a carload of milk bottles to the Eureka Dairy Company, a partnership of Los Angeles, Cal. Upon the arrival of the bottles in Los Angeles, in the month of April, 1918, R. E. Ibbetson, acting as agent for the Eureka Dairy Company, directed that they be delivered to the Pacific Commercial Warehouse, which direction was complied with by the railroad company. Shortly thereafter the Eureka Dairy Company discontinued business. On June 5, 1918, Ibbetson sold the bottles for $500, plus freight, amounting to $357.57, which sum he has ever since retained in his possession. The Travis Glass Company, having received nothing in payment for the bottles, commenced an action for the purchase price against the firm Eureka Dairy Company and the individual members thereof, and, on June 28, 1919, recovered judgment in the superior court of Los Angeles county in the sum of $1,108.05, with interest from December 12, 1918, at 7 per cent. per annum, and costs. An execution on this judgment was issued to the sheriff of Los Angeles county and a copy of the execution was delivered by the sheriff to R. E. Ibbetson, as garnish-ee, but the execution was returned, and remains wholly unsatisfied. Subsequently, in proceedings supplementary to execution under section 717 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, Ibbetson was examined in court concerning any debts or property owing by him to the Eureka Dairy Company or the members of said company, and in particular concerning the sale of the milk bottles on June 5, 1918. It appearing for this examination that Ibbetson claimed an interest in the bottles, and the proceeds thereof adverse to the Dairy Company, the Travis Glass Company instituted the present action against him, wherein the trial court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff, from which defendant appeals.

[1] The action is brought pursuant to section 720 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which authorizes an action by a judgment creditor against the judgment debtor's debtor, or, more exactly, which permits a judgment creditor whose judgment remains unsatisfied to maintain an action against a person alleged to have property of the judgment debtor, or to be indebted to him, when such person denies the debt or claims an interest in the property adverse to the judgment debtor. In the present action plaintiff seeks to reach an alleged claim of the Dairy Company for conversion by the defendant Ibbetson in selling the bottles and failing to account for the proceeds. Counsel for defendant contends that the findings of the trial court fail to support the judgment in favor of plaintiff, for the reason that they reveal that, at the time of the claimed conversion, title to and possession of the property in question were in a person other than plaintiff, to wit, the Eureka Dairy Company. Stated otherwise, defendant's contention is to the effect that the statute providing for the recovery by a judgment creditor of property or debts due his judgment debtor does not extend to him the right to maintain a suit for conversion of property belonging to the said debtor. Raymond v. Blancgrass, 36 Mont. 449, 93 Pac. 648, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 976. Since, however, the purpose of these statutory proceedings supplementary to execution is the same as that of the original creditor's bill in equity—namely, to enable the creditor to reach property which could not otherwise be made to contribute to the payment of the judgment—the statutory proceedings should be given an operation at least as broad as that of the creditor's bill. Accordingly, inasmuch as claims arising from torts committed on the property of a judgment debtor were within the reach of the judgment creditor under the old equity proceeding, it has been held that such claims may constitute the basis of a suit by a judgment creditor under section 720 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Staples v. May, 87 Cal. 178, 191, 25 Pac. 346; Cincinnati v. Hafer, 49 Ohio St. 60, 30 N. E. 197. It follows that the present suit for conversion is maintainable by plaintiff in its capacity of judgment creditor.

[2] The point is also made in defendant's behalf that two witnesses the defendant and a stenographer in his office, testified without contradiction that the Eureka Dairy Company delivered the bottles to defendant Ibbetson, requesting him to sell the same and apply the proceeds on a debt then owing from the Dairy Company to said Ibbetson. Upon the authority of Rauer v. Rynd, 27 Cal. App. 556, 150 Pac. 780, it is asserted that the delivery of the bottles with instructions to sell and apply the proceeds in payment of an indebtedness constituted a sale to defendant Ibbetson, and that it clearly appears from the proven facts that defendant's disposal of the bottles was pursuant to authority from the owner, and therefore lawful. The trial court found that no such authority existed, and that the goods were wrongfully sold by defendant, evidently disbelieving the evidence relied upon by defendant. It may be stated that a trial judge or jury is not required to blindly believe a witness, nor to find in accordance with his statements merely because his testimony is uncontradicted or unimpeached by the party against whom he testifies. Murphey v. Virgin, 47 Neb. 692, 66 N. W. 652.

"The most positive testimony of a witness may be contradicted by inherent improbabilities as to its accuracy contained in the witness's own statement of the transaction; or there may be circumstances in evidence in connection with the matter, which satisfy the court of its falsity; the manner of the witness in testifying may impress the court with a doubt as to the accuracy of his statement, and influence it to disregard his positive testimony as to a particular fact; and as it is within the province of the trial court to determine what credit and weight shall be given to the testimony of any witness, this court cannot control its finding or conclusion denying the testimony credence, unless it appears that there are no matters or circumstances which at all impair its accuracy." Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 128, 113 Pac. 147, 150; Blanc v. Connor, 167 Cal. 719, 141 Pac. 217; Cox v. Schnerr, 172 Cal. 371, 156 Pac. 509.

The accuracy of the testimony in question in the instant case was not entirely unimpaired, for, while defendant testified in the present case that he sold the bottles upon the request of the Dairy Company, repeatedly denying that they were covered by a chattel mortgage which he held on certain personal property of the Dairy Company, it appears from evidence introduced by plaintiff's attorney that, in another proceeding concerning the said bottles, defendant emphatically asserted that he had acquired title to the same by purchase under a foreclosure of the above-mentioned mortgage. It was proper for the trial court to consider this confusion with respect to defendant's claim to the bottles in determining the credibility of the testimony concerning defendant's authority to sell.

[3] As a second and separate defense, defendant set forth that, at the time of the alleged conversion, the Eureka Dairy Company, was indebted to defendant in a sum in excess of the price obtained for the bottles, and that this indebtedness remains wholly unpaid. The trial court found that it was unnecessary to make specific findings as to the existence or nonexistence of this indebtedness, for the reason that it did not constitute a defense to plaintiff's action for conversion. Defendant assigns this as error, claiming that, while the indebtedness might not be the basis of a counterclaim (Code Civ. Proc. § 438), it would nevertheless constitute a valid defense to plaintiff's suit for conversion. It is true that in a judgment creditor's suit the defendant may plead any defense which he may have against the judgment debtor. Nordstrom v. Corona City Water Co., 155 Cal. 206, 100 Pac. 242, 132 Am. St. Rep. 81; Bonte v. Cooper, 90 Ill. 440. But the alleged indebtedness would constitute no defense against the judgment debtor in this case. It is essential to the orderly administration of the law that a person be prevented from obtaining payment of a claim by the unlawful seizure of the property of his debtor, and, consequently, as a general rule the taking of property without authority or consent is neither warranted nor excused by the fact that the owner is indebted to the person taking the property. Murphey v. Virgin, supra. Since the existence of the indebtedness would have constituted no defense to an action by the owner of the property for the conversion thereof there is no apparent reason why it should operate as a valid defense in a suit by the judgment creditor of the owner. In this respect the facts of the present case are similar to those in the case of German Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 55 Neb. 86, 75 N. W. 531, where it was held that the fact that the defendant had applied the proceeds of the converted property to a debt owed by the judgment debtor was no defense to a creditor's suit for the conversion.

[4] Res adjudicata is another defense advanced by defendant which cannot be sustained. On July 10, 1918, shortly after the sale of the bottles by defendant, and prior to the recovery of plaintiff's judgment against the Eureka Dairy Company, plaintiff brought a suit directly against defendant Ibbetson and others for the conversion of the bottles. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendants and against plaintiff. It is claimed that the judgment in that action is a bar to the present suit. It is a familiar rule that identity of issues and of parties is indispensable to a valid plea of res adjudicata. In this connection, identity of parties means not only that they must be identical in person, but that the capacity in which they appear must be the same. Code Civ. Proc. § 1908, subd. 2; 23 Cyc. p. 1237. Consequently, although the subject-matter of the suits is the same, the present suit is not barred by the former one, for the plaintiff is suing in a different capacity in the second action. In the first action for the conversion of the bottles, plaintiff relied entirely upon its own interest therein, but it was determined that the title and possession had passed to the Dairy Company before the sale by defendant. Thereafter plaintiff recovered a judgment against the Dairy Company, and in the present action sues in the capacity of creditor, relying solely upon the title of the Dairy Company, its debtor, whose rights were not adjudicated in the first suit.

[5] Two specifications of insufficiency of evidence remain for consideration. It is claimed that there was no evidence in support of the finding to the effect that the Dairy Company was insolvent. However, it was stipulated that plaintiff obtained judgment against the said company, in the sum of $1,108.05 and $10 costs, no part of which had been paid, and that execution had been issued and returned unsatisfied. Upon this particular phase of the case that is the only showing required of plaintiff to enable him to maintain the suit. Herrlich v. Kaufmann, 99 Cal. 271, 33 Pac. 857, 37 Am. St. Rep. 50.

[6, 7] Defendant also attacks the valuation of the bottles in controversy. The trial court found that the value of the bottles was, in reality, in excess of the sum of $926.44. This finding was warranted by the evidence, for the price for which the bottles were sold by plaintiff, as well as the sum received by defendant, was evidence of value. Angell v. Hopkins, 79 Cal. 181, 21 Pac. 729; Greenebaum v. Taylor, 102 Cal. 624, 36 Pac. 957. It was held, however, that the sum of $926.44 must be accepted as the value of the bottles for the purpose of this suit. This holding was made upon the theory that, although the present suit was not barred by plaintiff's former suit for conversion, nevertheless the finding of the court in the former suit as to the value of the bottles was controlling in the present case. It is unnecessary to determine whether the valuation in the former suit was binding upon the plaintiff herein, whose position is predicated upon the rights of a judgment debtor wholly unrepresented in the former suit. It is clear that, had the court not adopted this view of the case, the judgment against defendant would have been for a larger sum than it actually was.

Even assuming that the court erred in adhering to the former valuation, any error that may have been committed in this respect resulted favorably to defendant, and is of no avail to him on this appeal. Wiley v. Young, 178 Cal. 681, 174 Pac. 316; Abdullah v. Abdullah, 194 Pac. 511.

The judgment is affirmed.

HALE v. GARDINER et al. (L. A. 6598.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 19, 1921.)

1. Pleading ⚡350(3)—Motion for judgment on pleadings admits truth of answer only for purposes of motion.

A motion for a judgment on the pleadings admits the truth of the answer for the purposes of the motion only.

2. Pleading ⚡165—Affirmative allegations of answer deemed denied.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 462, the affirmative allegations of the answer are deemed denied, and all affirmative matters by way of replication are deemed to have been pleaded by plaintiff.

3. Pleading ⚡229—Utmost liberality allowed in amending pleadings to conform to truth.

The utmost liberality is allowed in amending pleadings to conform to the truth and to allow a party to escape from the effects of ill-advised allegations of law or fact.

4. Pleading ⚡350(3)—Defendants allowed to amend answer on plaintiff's motion for judgment.

If it appears, on plaintiff's motion for a judgment on the pleadings, that the defendants have failed to fully or correctly state their defense, they should be allowed to amend their answer.

5. Pleading ⚡350(3)—Court, having admitted amendment of answer on plaintiff's motion for judgment on pleadings, erred in giving defendant judgment on theory that plaintiff's motion admitted truth of answer.

Where the court, on denial of plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings, allowed defendant to amend answer, and in addition thereto set the case down for trial on the issues raised, it was error for the court to render judgment for the defendant at the time fixed for the trial, on the theory that the plaintiff, by the motion for judgment on the pleadings, had admitted the allegations of the answer, since the granting of leave to amend and the acceptance of the privilege was in effect a finding by the court that the answer was insufficient as it stood, and that the motion was well taken, and an admission by the defendants of the insufficiency of their answer.

6. Bills and notes *§*92(1)—Note held based on a good consideration, though proceeds were to be used by a corporation instead of the maker.

A note, given to procure funds to be used in the promotion of a proposed corporation, held based on a good consideration, though the corporation, and not the maker, was to use proceeds; the advance of the money by the payee being sufficient to support the promise to pay.

7. Bills and notes *§*484—Payee's agreement to substitute other note for note sued on no defense, in absence of allegation of tender of other note.

In payee's action on a note executed by defendant to procure funds wherewith to promote a proposed corporation, the payee's agreement to substitute for such note the note of the corporation held no defense, in the absence of an allegation that the note of the corporation was ever tendered to the payee.

Henry M. Willis and George W. Bishop, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. Plaintiff brought suit upon a promissory note executed by the defendants March 30, 1917, payable one year after date. The complaint stated a cause of action. Defendants answered, admitting the allegations of the complaint. After admitting the making of the note and its nonpayment, defendants allege that the note was made in connection with the formation of a corporation and in pursuance of a written agreement, a copy of which is attached to and made a part of the answer. It is alleged that in pursuance of this agreement the plaintiff advanced $2,000 for expenses in connection with the organization of the new corporation, of which sum the defendants received $200 for work in connection with such organization. It is alleged that the corporation was duly organized, and named the Pacific Public Service Corporation. The written contract provided that upon the incorporation of the company the corporation would substitute its promissory note with like terms and conditions and in like amount, and that such substituted note should be in lieu of the note signed by the defendants; that upon the organization of the corporation a resolution was passed whereby the corporation accepted the obligation represented by the note, and authorized and directed its president and secretary to execute and deliver to the plaintiff a new note of the same tenor upon his surrendering and canceling the note of the defendants, "or at the option of said plaintiff that the president and secretary of the company were authorized and directed to indorse said original note of defendants in the name of the company." The corporation ever since the 2d day of May, 1917, has been ready, able, and willing to execute and deliver to plaintiff said company's note in substitution for the note of defendants, "but that plaintiff has not presented to said company or to its officers said note of defendants." Said note of said company has been duly executed by its duly authorized officers, and is ready to be substituted for defendant's note held by defendant upon defendant's surrendering and canceling the same." It is further alleged in the answer:

"That no part of said sum of $2,000 was received by the defendants, or any of them, for their own use and benefit, and that all of said sum was expended solely for the use and benefit of the corporation aforesaid 'Pacific Public Service Corporation.' That the defendants and neither of them have received no consideration for the said note."

The plaintiff moved for a judgment on the pleadings on October 17, 1919, and the motion of plaintiff was denied by the following order:

"Motion of plaintiff for judgment on pleadings, J. P. Chandler and H. W. Wright representing plaintiff, and H. M. Willis and G. W. Bishop, representing defendant, is denied. Leave is granted to amend answer."

In pursuance of said leave on October 23, 1919, the defendants filed an amendment to their answer as follows:

"The defendants allege that they received no consideration for the promissory note mentioned and set forth in plaintiff's complaint, and that neither of them received any consideration for the said note."

At the time fixed for the trial the following order was made by the court:

"Defendant having moved the court for judgment herein on the ground that a motion for judgment on the pleadings on behalf of the plaintiff had heretofore been presented and denied, it is ordered that said motion for judgment for defendant be, and the same is hereby, granted, and that plaintiff take nothing herein."

Thereupon judgment was rendered against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendants for costs. The reason for the giving of the judgment was stated therein, and for that reason we quote its recitals:

"The defendants objected to any further trial of said cause, and moved the court to order judgment to be entered, adjudging that plaintiff take nothing by reason of said action, upon the ground that theretofore the plaintiff, having duly made and submitted a motion for judgment on the pleadings, had thereby duly submitted the said cause for final decision and determination, and, said motion having been duly denied, that said cause was thereby determined against said plaintiff, and that judgment should be entered against the plaintiff and in favor of defendants; and said objection and motion having been duly argued and submitted for consideration, and the court having fully considered the same, thereafter, on the 27th day of April, 1920, the court duly sustained said objection and allowed the said motion, and ordered that judgment be entered herein, adjudging that plaintiff take nothing by reason of said action. * * *

[1, 2] The theory upon which judgment was rendered against the plaintiff is that the plaintiff's motion for a judgment on the pleadings admitted the allegations of the answer to the effect that there was no consideration for the note, and because of this admission that the defendants were entitled to a judgment on the pleadings. Thus the motion of the plaintiff for a judgment for $2,000, interest and costs, is converted into a motion by the defendants or by the court for a judgment against him for costs. The fallacy in this theory lies in the fact that a motion for a judgment on the pleadings admits the truth of the answer for the purposes of the motion only. Under our system of pleading the affirmative allegations of the answer are deemed denied, and all affirmative matters by way of replication are deemed to have been played by the plaintiff. Section 462, Code Civ. Proc.; Marriner v. Dennison, 78 Cal. 202, 20 Pac. 386; Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 429, 51 Pac. 630.

Plaintiff's motion for a judgment on the pleadings being denied, his implied replication would at once be restored to its full effect. If plaintiff's motion be deemed to have the effect of a joint motion by both parties for a judgment on the pleadings, if, after the denial of plaintiff's motion, we take up the consideration of the defendants' motion, by the same process of reasoning we would have defendants admitting the truth of the allegations of the implied reply; hence their motion should also be denied, and still further, following the reasoning by which defendants secured judgment in the court below, the admission of the truth of the implied replication would entitle the plaintiff to judgment after the denial of the defendants' implied motion.

[3-5] However, litigation should not be disposed of on any such technical considerations. A litigant should not be compelled to secure the judgment of the court upon a debatable question of pleading at the expense of losing his case if the court differed in its conclusion from the contention of the party. Courts are not instituted or maintained to enable shrewd attorneys to practice legal gymnastics, but to administer justice. The utmost liberality is allowed in amending pleadings to conform to the truth, and to allow a party to escape from the effects of ill-advised allegations of law or fact. Crosby v. Clark, 132 Cal. 1, 63 Pac. 1022; Jamison v. Hyde, 141 Cal. 109, 113, 74 Pac. 695. If it appears on plaintiff's motion for a judgment that the defendants have failed to fully or correctly state their defense, they should be allowed to amend their answer. On the other hand, if the plaintiff's motion is not well taken it should be denied, and the case set down for trial on the issues raised. In this case both of these things were done, but the court, instead of trying these issues, erroneously ordered a judgment upon the theory that the plaintiff had admitted the truth of the answer on the hearing of the motion for judgment, and thus converted the order denying the motion into an order for judgment for defendants. This was erroneous, not only for the reason above stated, but also because on the hearing of the motion the granting of leave to defendants to amend, and the acceptance of the privilege so accorded was in effect a finding by the court that the answer was insufficient as it stood, and that the motion was well taken, and an admission by the defendants of the insufficiency of their answer. The leave to defendants to amend was general, and it would hardly be contended that the plaintiff in advance admitted the truthfulness of whatever the defendants might thereafter state in the amendments. Logically, the order of the trial court should have been: "Motion granted unless the defendants amend their answer within 10 days." The denial of the motion was intended solely as a convenient method of disposing of the motion, in the light of the proposed amendment. It is stated in the brief that the purpose of allowing the amendment was to enable the defendants to correct a double negative by affirmatively denying that there was any consideration for the note. If the motion of plaintiff was predicated upon the fact that the answer, because of the inadvertence of the pleader, admitted a consideration when it was intended to deny such a consideration, it would be obviously unjust to base a judgment herein upon the theory that the plaintiff by his motion admitting that there was a consideration for the note, thereby admitted that there was no consideration for it. The fact is that the plaintiff never admitted, for any purpose or at any time, that there was no consideration for the note.

[6, 7] There is, however, a more persuasive reason for a reversal of this judgment than yet stated. Plaintiff was entitled to a judgment on the pleadings as they stood both before and after the amendment to the answer. The affirmative allegations of the answer show that the plaintiff advanced $2,000 upon the promissory note. There was full consideration for the note, and the fact that the consideration was used to promote a proposed corporation, instead of by the defendants, is of no significance. The consideration for defendants' promise was the advance of the money by plaintiff. The answer contained an allegation that there was an agreement to substitute the note of the corporation for that of the defendants. But there was no allegation that such a note was ever tendered to the plaintiff. The agreement was, in effect, one on the part of the plaintiff to accept payment either in money or by a note of the corporation. Suit was not brought until the defendants' note was due, at which time the substituted note of the corporation would also have been due. Furthermore, the contract between the plaintiff and the defendants provided as follows:

"In the event that the project outlined in this contract is not approved by the Railroad Commission there shall be no liability of first party to second party further under this contract except to see that second party is repaid the promissory note of the first parties given to second party, and that second party receives return of such funds as remain in the escrow in the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank."

And it is alleged in the answer "that the permit asked of the California Railroad Commission by said company was not granted," and hence the obligation of the defendants to pay the note still existed.

The respondents rely upon the decisions of the Supreme Court of Washington in State ex rel. Murphy v. Brown, 83 Wash. 100, 145 Pac. 69, and State ex rel. Brown v. Superior Court, 87 Wash. 524, 151 Pac. 1126, to sustain the procedure adopted in the trial court. It is sufficient to say that the system of pleading in the state of Washington differs from ours, for in that state the plaintiff is required to reply to the affirmative allegations of the answer, otherwise the truth of such allegations are deemed to be admitted by the plaintiff (section 277, R. & B. Annotated Codes and Statutes of Washington), and in default of such reply the defendant may move for a judgment on the pleadings (section 278, Id.). Consequently the decisions cited have no application to our system whereby the allegations of the answer are deemed to be denied by plaintiff.

The same is true as to the decisions cited by respondent from Nebraska. Scotfield v. State National Bank, 9 Neb. 316, 2 N. W. 888, 31 Am. Rep. 412; Boldt v. First National Bank, 59 Neb. 283, 80 N. W. 905 (Cobbey's Annotated Statutes of Nebraska, §§ 1111, 1134, 1261). The text in 31 Cyc. 606, relied upon by the respondent, must be construed in the light of these authorities as applicable to those states in which the failure of plaintiff to file a reply to the defendants' answer operates as an admission of all new matter pleaded in the answer, and not to this state, where such matter is deemed denied and all affirmative allegations by way of defense thereto are deemed to be pleaded. This implied pleading is as much a part of the pleadings in the case as the written pleadings filed with the clerk, and therefore to be considered when any affirmative action is taken against the plaintiff.

The respondent cites Vassault v. Kirby, 1 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 668, as the only California case sustaining the position of the trial court. The opinion in that case was concurred in by only two of the five Justices of the Supreme Court, and hence is not authority.

Defendants have had two opportunities to present an answer, and in both instances have shown by their answer that plaintiff is entitled to a judgment. We can see no reason why judgment should not be ordered for plaintiff, with costs and attorney's fees.

Judgment reversed, with order to the trial court to enter judgment for the plaintiff for $2,000, with interest, attorney's fees, and costs.

MOROPOULOS v. C. H. & O. B. FULLER CO. et al. (L. A. 6545.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 24, 1921.)

1. Conspiracy — Must result in unlawful act or injurious act by unlawful means.

A conspiracy is not actionable unless the combination results in the perpetration of an unlawful act or some injurious act by unlawful means.

2. Conspiracy — Allegations of conspiracy to defraud insufficient unless connected with facts showing acts unlawful or wrongful.

In an action for conspiracy to defraud, allegations that defendants entered into a conspiracy, and that various acts were done for the purpose of defrauding plaintiff, were insufficient, unless connected with a showing of facts showing that such acts were wrongful.

3. Partnership — One partner cannot assign leasehold or other operating assets.

Under Civ. Code, § 2430, specifying authority of a partner, one member of a firm cannot assign leasehold premises, or other operating assets without which the business cannot be carried on, and such attempted transfer is a fraud on the nonconsenting partner, and, as to the latter's interest, void as against a purchaser with notice.

4. Conspiracy ⚡18—Complaint held to sufficiently plead ouster of partner and conversion of firm business.

Complaint in a partner's action against third persons for conspiracy to appropriate a partnership business, alleging ouster of plaintiff by defendants, who came into possession of property used in the firm business, in pursuance of alleged conspiracy with plaintiff's partner, held to state a cause of action.

5. Action ⚡38(4) — Complaint for damages for wrongful ouster from leased premises held to state but one cause of action.

Though a complaint for damages for wrongful ouster from partnership premises, the lease of which was wrongfully assigned to defendants by plaintiff's copartner, contained allegations relating to the acquisition and foreclosure by defendants of mortgages on chattels on such premises, executed to them by such copartner, and their purchase of such chattels at foreclosure sale, which might have been stricken out as irrelevant and immaterial, though matters of inducement, but one cause of action was alleged, namely, the wrongful ouster of plaintiff from his business, thus depriving him of the lease, growing crops and further profits, where all the damages alleged pertained, not to the taking or conversion of personal property covered by the mortgages, but to the partnership rights in the use and possession of the real property, and were set out as separate items of damages arising from a single tort, for which plaintiff may recover such damages as will compensate him for all the detriment proximately caused thereby. Civ. Code, § 3333.

6. Partnership ⚡296(1)—Partner wrongfully ousted from leased premises following fraudulent assignment of lease by copartner dissolving firm may sue for restoration or for damages.

A partner wrongfully ousted from partnership premises following his copartner's wrongful assignment of the lease thereon, may sue for restoration to possession or for damages personally suffered, he, despite the dissolution of the partnership by his copartner's fraudulent act, being entitled, as the remaining member of the firm, to continue in possession and operation of the partnership business, and to retain its assets, at least for such time as would permit the business to be closed out in conformity with the copartnership agreement.

7. Partnership ⚡296(1)—Partner wrongfully dispossessed following copartner's fraudulent assignment of lease dissolving firm need not join latter as plaintiff in suit for restoration or damages.

A partner wrongfully dispossessed from the partnership premises following his copartner's fraudulent assignment of the lease thereon, dissolving firm, whether he sues for restoration to possession or for damages, need not join such copartner as a party plaintiff, the partnership having been dissolved by the latter's action in assigning his interests and attempting to wreck the business, and the rights running to plaintiff being personal, either as an individual or as the sole remaining member.

8. Partnership ⚡296(1)—Partner dispossessed following copartner's fraudulent assignment of lease, dissolving firm, need not join latter as defendant in suit for damages.

In an action by a partner for damages for wrongful ouster from partnership premises, the lease to which was fraudulently assigned by his copartner, dissolving firm, the nonjoinder of such copartner did not constitute a failure in parties defendant, though he was a joint tort-feasor, since it is not necessary to make all the parties to a tort defendants in an action for damages.

9. Partnership ⚡296(2)—Complaint held to allege partnership right to leasehold as partnership asset.

In an action for damages for wrongful ouster of a partner from premises leased by plaintiff's copartner, the lease having been fraudulently assigned by the latter, dissolving the firm, the complaint which set out the partnership agreement as an exhibit recited possession of the leasehold by such copartner, and that the partnership was formed to "carry on the business rendered necessary by the ownership of the above properties, and to farm and crop the said lease," and also alleged that by such agreement it was intended that plaintiff and his copartner should farm the land leased and conduct a dairy business thereon, and that the agreement was to continue until termination of the lease, sufficiently alleged the copartner's right to the use of the leasehold as a partnership asset, a formal assignment of the lease to the firm not being required.

10. Conspiracy ⚡20—Partner ousted following copartner's wrongful assignment of lease can recover only damages inuring to himself individually.

In an action for conspiracy to wrongfully oust a partner from leased premises, following his copartner's wrongful assignment of the lease, plaintiff can recover only such damages as would inure to himself individually, since, if he retained the business and carried it on under the terms of the partnership agreement, he could be held to an accounting to his former partner or his assignees for their proportion of the net profits or remaining assets.

11. Pleading ⚡193(8)—Complaint not demurrable because of demand for greater damages than plaintiff entitled to.

That plaintiff prayed for exemplary damages or any other relief to which he was not entitled was not ground for demurrer.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by John E. Moropoulos against the C. H. & O. B. Fuller Company and others. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Jas. W. Bell; of Los Angeles, Geo. H. Scott, of Santa Ana, and Jas. McLachlan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. T. Clotfelter and E. T. Lucey, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment of dismissal by the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, after the sustaining of demurrer to his third amended complaint, without leave to amend. Appellant makes no point on the refusal of permission to amend, and stands on the sufficiency of the complaint.

The action was brought to recover damages arising from an alleged conspiracy between the defendants and one Peter Karales, not joined as a party to the suit, in which it is charged that the parties so conspiring had wrongfully and fraudulently appropriated and destroyed a partnership business theretofore existing between the plaintiff and said Karales. The facts alleged upon which the cause of action rests are pleaded substantially as follows:

That one Peter Karales was the owner of a four years' leasehold interest in a valuable tract of farming and dairy land in the county of Orange, under a lease executed to him on the 15th of December, 1916.

That on the 30th of December, 1916, the plaintiff and Karales entered into a contract of copartnership to carry on the business of dairy farming, during the term of such lease in which it was agreed that the plaintiff would put into the business certain dairy stock, and Karales would give the use of the leasehold premises.

That immediately upon the execution of said agreement of copartnership the parties thereto entered upon said leased premises and commenced the farming thereof and the operation of said dairy business, and that between the date of the partnership and May 8, 1917, the plaintiff planted about 240 acres of said lands to sugar beets, and established a dairy business thereon which yielded a monthly profit of about $1,000, and planted 150 acres in barley and oats.

That prior to the copartnership, to wit, on the 11th day of October, 1916, Karales had purchased from the defendants in this action certain horses and mules, and about 78 head of cows, for $6,500, and had secured the payment therefor by chattel mortgages on personal property on said leased premises, the use of which property was included in the partnership agreement subsequently entered into.

That thereafter on or about the 31st of March, 1917, as alleged in the language of the complaint—

"Said defendants conspired with said Karales to defraud the plaintiff out of the premises and business hereinbefore described, and in pursuance thereof said Peter Karales assigned the said lands to one Steve Karales, and caused the same, together with said assignment, to be recorded at said date in the office of the recorder of Orange county in said state, and thereafter, and on April 7, 1917, pursuant to said conspiracy to defraud the plaintiff, the said Peter Karales and Steve Karales assigned said lease to the defendant, C. H. & O. B. Fuller Company, as additional security for the payment of the sum of money hereinbefore referred to as secured by chattel mortgages, and the further sum of $1,000 alleged to be due the said Steve Karales from Peter Karales, which the defendants agreed to pay; and that immediately thereafter, and in further pursuance of said conspiracy, the defendants began foreclosure proceedings under said chattel mortgages in the superior court of the county of Orange in said state against plaintiff and said Peter Karales, alleging default in payment of three months' interest."

That judgment was entered in said action of foreclosure on May 1, 1917, for the sum of $6,855.80.

That thereupon plaintiff procured from one R. E. Ibbetson sufficient money as a loan to satisfy said judgment of $6,855.80 and to pay said $1,000 owing to Steve Karales, and that in consideration of the payment of said amounts defendants "assigned and transferred said judgment and said lease to the said Ibbetson for the use and benefit of the plaintiff."

That thereafter, on May 8, 1917, a sale of said chattels under said judgment of foreclosure was made by the sheriff of said Orange county at which Ibbetson bid the amount of said judgment for the purpose of obtaining clear title thereto as security for his loan to plaintiff. That the defendants, who were also present at said sale, bid a sum in excess of that offered by Ibbetson, and, their bid not being raised, "the said chattels were thereupon sold by said sheriff to the said defendants." The complaint further alleges in this connection "that the bid of said defendants was in pursuance of said conspiracy with the said Peter Karales to defraud the plaintiff, and in furtherance of said scheme," and that plaintiff was unaware of said conspiracy, and had therefore arranged with said Ibbetson for only sufficient money to pay off the liens on the property sold.

That Peter Karales and Steve Karales immediately following said sale, pursuant to said scheme to defraud plaintiff, made another assignment and transfer of said lease to an agent of defendants, and it was thereafter assigned to the defendant, Pioneer Ranch Company.

That thereafter the defendants took possession of the leased premises, ousted and ejected plaintiff from the possession, installed Peter Karales as their employee and manager, and proceeded to operate the business of the ranch to the plaintiff's damage in various sums aggregating $34,500 from loss of use and occupation of the premises, beet crop, hay, and oats, and plaintiff demanded judgment for that amount, together with $10,000 punitive damages and costs.

If plaintiff has stated facts under which he may maintain this action, the gist of such cause of action is contained in the last above paragraph. The preceding part of the narrative fails to set up any wrongful acts of the defendants. The plaintiff, by the foregoing averments, attempts to allege a conspiracy between his former copartner and the defendants to defraud him of his interest in the copartnership business.

[1,2] Conspiracy is not actionable unless the combination results in the perpetration of an unlawful act or of some injurious act by unlawful means. Bouvier's Law Dictionary; People v. Flack, 125 N. Y. 324, 26 N. E. 267, 11 L. R. A. 807; Herron v. Hughes, 25 Cal. 555. We have in this complaint only the bare allegation that the defendants entered into a conspiracy to defraud the plaintiff, and that the various acts narrated were done for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff. This is not a sufficient averment of fraud unless connected with a showing of facts which, if true, would support the charge that they were wrongful. There is no showing of any unlawful or wrongful act of the defendants in the alleged transaction down to and including their purchase of the chattels at the foreclosure sale.

[3,4] It may be conceded that Peter Karales, as a member of the partnership, had no right or authority to assign the leasehold of these premises or other operating assets of the firm, the use of which had been turned over to the partnership, and without which the business of the partnership could not be carried on (Civ. Code, § 2430), and that his assignment of the lease without the consent of the plaintiff was as to him a fraudulent act. But it is not alleged and does not appear that the defendants, at the time they took their chattel mortgage from Peter Karales, before the copartnership was formed, or when they received as further security for Karales' indebtedness the assignment of this lease shortly after the partnership began, had any knowledge that the plaintiff, or any one other than Karales, had any interest in this property. For all that appears, they were innocent incumbrancers in good faith for value. There is every presumption that this is true so far as the chattel mortgage is concerned. And, as to the lease, the legal title stood in Karales' name. It was not until the 21st day of April, 1917, two weeks after the lease was first assigned to the defendants as additional security, that plaintiff claims to have notified them of his copartnership agreement with Karales and his interest in the lease. So far as the foreclosure suit and judgment are concerned, the defendants, under the facts pleaded, seem to have been entirely within their rights. The plaintiff apparently recognized this by borrowing the money and paying off their liens, and taking an assignment for his own benefit of the judgment and lease in the name of Ibbetson, from whom he borrowed the money. This transaction cleared the slate as to past events. The defendants had released all their claims against the partnership property, and plaintiff, through Ibbetson, held the assignments of the judgment and lease as security for the money he had been compelled to advance for his copartner's debts.

The next event in this pastoral drama was inaugurated by the plaintiff. He and his trustee Ibbetson proceeded to turn the tables on Karales by advertising a sheriff's sale under the assigned judgment at which Ibbetson was to buy in the mortgaged chattels for plaintiff, holding title in himself until the money he had advanced was repaid. Ibbetson, however, only bid the amount of the judgment, and the defendants, who appeared at the sale, raised the bid and bought in the property. This they had a perfect right to do, for aught that is shown by the pleadings. Whether or not it was done in connivance with Peter Karales is immaterial, so long as it was not a wrongful act. Up to this point no fraud or wrong is shown.

The defendants under this sale had acquired a valid title to the chattels, and become entitled to their possession. They had no right, however, to possession of the land or the partnership business. The leasehold interest which they held as security had been satisfied and assigned to the plaintiff's trustee, and the right to the use and occupancy of the land was still a partnership asset in the rightful possession of plaintiff. Defendants took no new interest as against the plaintiff under the second assignment by Peter Karales and Steve Karales, and their original assignments of this leasehold had already been turned over by them to Ibbetson, and, moreover, the defendants at this time had notice that the plaintiff was in possession under a partnership agreement with Karales which transferred the use and possession of the premises to the copartnership. Such a transfer was void against a purchaser with notice, as to the interests of a non-consenting partner. Myers v. Moulton, 71 Cal. 498, 12 Pac. 505.

The allegation, therefore, of the subsequent ouster of plaintiff by the defendants, and the averment that it was done wrongfully, and in pursuance of the alleged conspiracy with Karales, and that in pursuance of such wrongful and unlawful purpose they took possession of the dairy ranch, put Karales in charge, converted to their own use the growing crops, and deprived the plaintiff of any further use of the premises under this leasehold, furnishes the basis for a cause of action, and the only cause of action stated in the complaint.

[5] The pleader has adopted the narrative form of complaint permitted by section 426 of the Code of Civil Procedure, without, however, putting it in concise language, and with the addition of much surplusage. The allegations relating to the chattel mortgages might have been stricken out as irrelevant and immaterial, though perhaps some of them have their place in the complaint as matters of inducement, leading up to the unlawful entry and ouster. They were evidently not pleaded as an independent cause of action, since no damages are claimed or alleged for any taking or conversion of the personal property covered by the mortgages.

The damages alleged all pertain to the invasion of the partnership rights in the use and possession of the real property, and are set out as separate items of damage arising from a single tort. There is but one cause of action alleged; namely, the wrongful ousting of plaintiff from his business, thus depriving him of the lease, the growing crops, and future profits to his damage in the sum of $25,000 for the use and occupation of the premises, $5,000 for the value of his beet crop, $4,500, the value of the hay and grain crop, and $10,000 demanded as exemplary damages.

In such an action the plaintiff may recover as damages in an amount "which will compensate for all the detriment proximately caused" by the act complained of. Civ. Code, § 3333. In Hawthorne v. Siegel, 88 Cal. 159, 25 Pac. 1114, 22 Am. St. Rep. 291, in which case the plaintiffs had been compelled by the wrongful acts of defendants to abandon their barber business in leased premises, this court sustained damages on the single cause of action, for loss of profits and established trade, loss of lease, loss of improvements on the leased premises, loss of a hot water privilege from adjacent premises, and expenses incident to removal to other quarters.

This action is to be distinguished from Bowman v. Wohlke, 166 Cal. 121, 135 Pac. 37, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1011, cited by respondents. There, there was an attempt to join causes of action arising from distinct tortious acts for injuries to property, to the person, and to the character of plaintiffs. This was in direct conflict with section 427, Code of Civil Procedure, as it then read. Here, the injuries complained of are all damages to property, and arise out of one primary wrong, the unlawful taking of the partnership assets by defendants.

[6] The plaintiff here might have brought his action after the ouster for restoration to the possession of the leasehold and the dairy business. Notwithstanding the partnership was dissolved by the fraudulent acts of the other partner, alleged in the complaint, plaintiff, as the remaining member of the firm, was entitled to continue in the possession and operation of the partnership business, and to retain its assets, at least for such time as would permit the business to be closed out in conformity with the agreement of copartnership.

One member of a copartnership, by wrongfully violating the terms of his agreement and withdrawing from the copartnership, cannot defeat the right of the remaining members to continue in control of the property and the business. Mervyn Invest. Co. v. Biber, 194 Pac. 1037; Miller v. Brigham, 50 Cal. 615; Page v. Summers, 70 Cal. 121, 12 Pac. 120; Crossen v. Murphy, 31 Or. 124, 49 Pac. 858; Civ. Code, § 2458.

But plaintiff also had the right to submit to this wrongful appropriation and conversion of the partnership business and assets by the defendants and his partner Karales, and to bring his action for the damages personally suffered.

[7] In neither form of action would it be necessary to join Karales as a party plaintiff. The partnership was dissolved by the action of Karales in assigning his interests to the defendants and attempting to wreck the business. The rights running to plaintiff were personal, either in his individual capacity, or as the sole remaining member of the copartnership. Parsons on Partnership (2d Ed.) 338, 339; Murray v. McGarigle, 69 Wis. 483, 34 N. W. 522.

[8] Neither was there a failure in parties defendant by the nonjoinder of Karales. While he was a joint tort-feasor with the defendants, it is not necessary to make all the parties to the tort defendants in an action for damages. Cooley on Torts, §§ 124-126; Cheney v. Powell, 88 Ga. 629, 15 S. E. 750.

[9] We think the complaint sufficiently alleged the right of the copartnership to the use of the leasehold as a partnership asset. The partnership agreement is set out as an exhibit, and recites the possession of this leasehold by Karales, and that the partnership is formed to "carry on the business rendered necessary by the ownership of the above properties and to farm and crop the said lease," and there is also alleged in the complaint that by said agreement it was intended that plaintiff and said Karales should farm the land in said lease and conduct thereon a dairy business, and that said agreement of copartnership should continue until the termination of said lease. A formal assignment of the lease to the copartnership was not required. Where one holding a lease of premises enters into a partnership with another, agreeing to the use and possession of the leased property in the business, a valid interest in the lease is thereby vested in the partnership. Lamb v. Hall, 147 Cal. 44, 81 Pac. 288; Stitt v. Rat Portage Lumber Co., 98 Minn. 52, 107 N. W. 824.

[10] In the form of action elected by plaintiff he can only recover for such damages as would inure to himself individually. Had he retained the business and carried it on under the terms of the partnership agreement he would be held to an accounting to his former partner or his assignees for their proportion of the net profits of the business and its remaining assets.

[11] In the allegation of damages the complaint is, perhaps, open to demurrer for uncertainty in this respect, but this does not happen to be one of the specifications of uncertainty set forth in defendants' demurrer. In any event, the defendants cannot be prejudiced by allegations in the complaint of greater damages than plaintiff may be entitled to recover.

The prayer for damages itself is not a part of the complaint, subject to demurrer, and the fact that plaintiff has prayed for exemplary damages, or any other relief to which he may not be entitled does not affect the sufficiency of his complaint.

We think this review of the complaint covers all the grounds of demurrer coming within the Code provisions, and requiring consideration. The complaint is inartificially drawn, and, as we have said, contains much redundant and irrelevant matter, and ambiguity and uncertainty, but the one objectionable feature was not reached by motion to strike, or the other by applicable specifications of insufficiency.

We are of the opinion that facts relating to the ouster of plaintiff and the wrongful invasion and conversion of the partnership premises and business are sufficiently pleaded, and that the facts are stated which support the averments of conspiracy between Karales and the defendants to wrongfully deprive plaintiff of his interest in the leasehold and other remaining partnership assets and business.

The judgment is reversed.

SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY SAV. BANK
v. DENMAN et al. (L. A. 6617.)

1. Corporations ⚡230 — Stockholders' payment of subscription binding on creditors of corporation, though made without call.

While the agreement to purchase stock, in absence of any special agreement for a different price or time of payment, is an agreement to pay par value on call, the obligation of each stockholder to pay the balance of an unpaid subscription is a simple contract obligation to pay such amount at a time not specified, in consideration of the shares issued, so that, in absence of fraud, such a payment at any time by a stockholder to an agent of the corporation authorized to receive it is a discharge of such liability, and is binding on its creditors, though it could not have enforced such liability against one stockholder without demanding a proportional payment by all of them by means of a call; the latter rule being for the benefit of the stockholder, who may waive it at any time and pay in full or in part for his stock, provided the corporation is willing to accept.

2. Corporations ⚡230 — "Creditors' bill" to apply stock subscriptions on debt will not lie against stockholder, whose obligation was paid without call before proceedings attached.

Suit of a creditor of a corporation to have stock subscriptions applied on his debt, being merely a resort to the equitable remedy of a creditors' bill to reach assets of the debtor which cannot be got in an action at law, will not lie against one under no obligation to the corporate debtor, so that, if a stock subscription has been lawfully paid and accepted before the proceeding on the bill attached to it, the bill must fail, since equity, while it has gone so far as to hold that the creditor may compel payment without a previous call by the corporation, which cannot enforce payment, except by a call, cannot refuse to credit payments made in good faith without a call, in the absence of proof of insolvency when they were made, or prior to the suit, though payment was to a creditor on the corporate debt, or to some one other than a proper officer of the corporation, to be applied on the unpaid balance; the corporation and the stockholder, in the absence of fraud, being at liberty to effect payment in any mode they see fit.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Creditors' Bill.]

3. Corporations ⚡230 — Stockholders' payments of running expenses on demand of manager advancing same held discharge pro tanto of liability for balance of par value of stock.

Where one of several incorporators of a theater company, to whom the entire management of its affairs was left after the theater building was completed with borrowed money, attended to all the business of the corporation by common consent of all the stockholders, and, when additional money was required, advanced the amount necessary and apportioned it to the stockholders according to their holdings, they paying their respective sums on his demand, with the understanding that such payments constituted a credit on the balance due on their subscription liabilities, such payments operated as a discharge pro tanto of the stockholders' obligation to pay the balance of the par value of their stock, binding on the corporation and the court in an action to collect and apply the unpaid subscription on the claims of a creditor of the corporation.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Rex B. Goodcell, Judge.

Suit by the San Bernardino County Savings Bank against A. C. Denman, Jr., and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

H. C. Beach, Janeway & Beach, and Edgar G. Pratt, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.
W. J. Curtis and McNabb & Hodge, all of San Bernardino, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendants appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The complaint states a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff as a creditor of a certain corporation known as the San Bernardino Theater Company to recover of the defendants certain sums alleged to be due and unpaid upon their subscriptions to the capital stock of said Theater Company, and to have said sums applied in satisfaction of the debt owing by said Theater Company to the plaintiff. The answer denied the liability, and denied that any money was due or unpaid upon the stock subscriptions of the defendants.

The court found that the stock was of the par value of $100 per share; that the defendant Denman was the owner of 136 shares thereof; that Fisher owned 34 shares; that only $38.03 had been paid on each share, and that the remainder, $61.97 per share, was due and owing from each of them upon the number of shares owned by them respectively. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff against each defendant for the amount due from him on said stock, but not to exceed from either or both the amount of $7,854.97 and interest, found to be due from said Theater Company to the plaintiff.

Evidence was given tending to show that, in addition to the sum of $38.03 paid on each share, as found by the court, the said defendants had paid for the benefit of the company other sums, which, by an agreement among the stockholders, were to be considered as paid upon the stock subscriptions of the said defendants. These additional sums were not allowed by the court as a credit upon the said stock subscriptions. The principal point argued in the briefs is the question whether or not these several payments, or any of them, should have been credited as payment upon the stock subscriptions.

The Theater Company was incorporated on January 17, 1903, with a capital stock of $75,000, divided into 750 shares, at $100 a share. Seven persons subscribed for stock and became members of the corporation, taking one share of stock each and paying full value therefor, and they were all elected directors, and Denman was elected president. About the same time they each contributed money, amounting to some $8,575, for the purpose of buying a lot in San Bernardino as a site for a theater building which the company was organized to construct and carry on. With this fund a lot was purchased by the defendant Denman, which was by him conveyed to the corporation. At the time of said conveyance all of the remaining 743 shares of stock were issued to him. The plan was to raise the money necessary to erect the proposed building by sales of the corporate stock. In pursuance of this plan he transferred to each of the other six incorporators 34 shares of the stock, keeping 34 shares himself, and returned to the corporation 505 shares. In effect, the transaction amounted to an issue to each stockholder of 34 shares in consideration of his contribution to the purchase money of said lot. As the lot was found to be of the value of only $8,575 at that time, the transaction amounted to a payment of $36.03 per share upon each share of stock so issued to the respective incorporators. It was found impossible to sell other shares of the stock. Thereupon it was determined to borrow $15,000 and erect a theater building on the lot with the money. Accordingly the plaintiff loaned to the company $15,000, taking its note for that amount and a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage upon the property to secure the same. With this money the building was erected. Something like a year was occupied in these transactions. The stockholders all understood that the 34 shares so issued to them, respectively, were not fully paid up, and that the balance was to be paid in afterwards, if necessary, for the carrying on of the enterprise.

At or about the time the deed of trust was made, the defendant Denman acquired the shares of three others of the original incorporators, and thereby became the owner of 136 shares of the stock issued as partly paid. In October, 1904, a call for $2 per share on the stock was entered in the minute book of the company and was voluntarily paid, thus making up the $38.03 which the court found had been paid on the stock. The enterprise did not prove successful, and contributions became necessary from time to time for the purpose of paying interest to the plaintiff and for other expenses.

The corporation business was transacted in a very informal manner. Meetings of the directors were held occasionally up to September 20, 1906, after which date there were none. A minute book was kept, in which was entered the proceedings at these meetings. The company had no office and kept no regular books of account, nor any other books, except a book of stock certificates, showing the issuance and transfers thereof. The business of the corporation was managed entirely by the defendant Denman as president by the original election and as general manager by common consent. When it was necessary to have more money to keep up the expenses, he would first advance the same, and then collect from the other stockholders their proportion thereof according to their respective holdings of stock. There was evidence to the effect that it was understood between all of them that the payments so made to Denman were to be considered as a credit upon the unpaid balance owing upon their stock subscriptions. Denman kept an account of these payments in a small book which he carried in his pocket. The book was lost before this action was begun and could not be produced at the trial. This book and the book of checks containing stubs appear to have constituted the only records made by Denman or any one else on behalf of the corporation showing the money transactions of the Theater Company. The only other account thereof, and it was not complete, was the bank account kept by the San Bernardino National Bank showing the deposits and checks made by the Theater Company.

The payments for which credits on the stock subscriptions are now claimed were, for the most part, made during the years from 1904 to 1912, inclusive. It appears that none of the stockholders at that time expected any suit by plaintiff to reach the liability on stock subscriptions, and that they did not carefully preserve their individual accounts regarding the payments. There is positive evidence that substantial sums were paid by the defendants, and that such payments were intended to apply on the subscriptions. The evidence as to the amounts so paid is not in all instances definite and clear. The court might have found a sum less than the defendants claimed. But there is no suggestion or claim that there was any bad faith, and the evidence on the subject of the payments is not contradicted. The parties concerned were all men of means; they had been friends for many years, and the enterprise was conceived and carried out for the purpose of advancing their common interests as citizens and property owners of the city of San Bernardino, as well as the interests of the general public of that city.

From the conduct of the case and the briefs of counsel it is clear that the court below, in refusing to allow credit for payments in excess of the $38.03 on the stock subscriptions, did not go upon the theory that the evidence was too indefinite as to the amount, or was insufficient to show any payment on account of the stock, but that it refused to allow further credit for payments on the theory that the stockholders were not entitled to such credit for payments, unless they were made in pursuance of a formal call by the directors, or upon the theory that the payments were invalid as credits on the subscriptions, because they were not made to the corporation directly, but to Denman, who, it is claimed, was without valid authority to receive them for that purpose, or because they were paid to him to reimburse him for money he had already paid on the corporate debts, which was true in many instances. The evidence as to some of the payments that they were made for the benefit of the corporation, and that all the stockholders believed, agreed, and understood that they were to be applied on the subscriptions, was uncontradicted, and unless one or the other of the last-mentioned theories is sound, the court should have allowed credit for them on the stock subscriptions.

[1] We think the court below erred if it adopted either of the supposed theories as applicable to the facts of this case. The agreement of a stockholder with the corporation to purchase its stock, in the absence of any special agreement for a different price, or a different time of payment is an agreement that he will pay the par value of the stock on call. In this case that was the agreement finally made with respect to the unpaid balance. Seven of the shares were fully paid up, and the court so found. The other shares were understood to be paid, and were in fact and in law paid up, only to the cost of the lot purchased by the corporation with the money advanced in its behalf by the stockholders prior to the purchase. This the court found to be $36.03 per share. The obligation of each stockholder to pay the balance was, in legal effect, a simple contract obligation to pay that amount at a time not specified, in consideration of the shares issued. Payment could lawfully have been offered at any time thereafter, and if accepted by the corporation it would apply on the subscription price, and would be good against creditors seeking to reach the subscription liability.

There is nothing contrary to the policy of the law in this proposition. It is true that the corporation could not have enforced this liability against one stockholder without demanding a proportional payment by all of them by means of a call. But this is a rule for the benefit of the stockholder, and he is at liberty to waive it at any time and pay in full or in part for his stock, provided the corporation is willing to accept it. The creditors of a corporation do not stand in a position to complain of such payment, since it will inure to their benefit as much as to that of the corporation itself. The rule is the same as in the case of any other obligation to pay money on similar conditions. The rule that a call may be waived and that payment may be made at any time is a settled principle of law of corporations, although the question does not often arise for the reason that such advance payments are infrequent. In Marsh v. Burroughs, 1 Wood (U. S. C. C.) 468,¹ decided in 1871, a case involving payment of subscription liability for stock of a bank, the court, referring to this subject, said that when a stockholder subscribes for stock the par value of which is not paid at the time—

"it is the right of the stockholder to pay it. The mode of calling it in, prescribed by the charter (in this state, by the statute), is a mere form of remedy, given to the bank to enforce the subscription, usually followed by forfeiture for nonpayment if the bank so choose. But the stockholder is not obliged to wait until a call is made upon him. He may pay in at any time."

This doctrine has ever since been regarded as settled, and the case is cited by all the text-writers who have touched on the question. 1 Cook on Cor. § 106; 4 Thomp. on Cor. (2d Ed.) § 3687. To the same effect see In re Wyncham, etc., Co., L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 328. The necessary consequence is that, in the absence of fraud, a payment by a stockholder, to an agent of the corporation who is authorized to receive it, of a part or all of the sum owing by him on his stock subscription, is a discharge of that liability, and is binding on creditors.

[2] Another consideration leads to the same conclusion. The suit of a creditor to have the stock subscriptions applied on his debt is merely one instance of a resort to the equitable remedy of a creditor's bill; a proceeding in equity to reach assets of the debtor which cannot be got in an ordinary action at law. The creditor is seeking for assets of the debtor; that is, money or credits due to the debtor. He cannot reach anything that does not constitute assets of such debtor. His standing in the court must always be in the shoes of the debtor, and he can obtain no greater relief than his debtor could obtain, at least to this extent: That he cannot force payment from one who is not the debtor of his debtor. A valid obligation must exist in favor of the debtor against the party sued, or the creditor's bill will not lie against him. Hence, if the obligation once existed, but has lawfully been paid before the proceeding on the creditor's bill attached to it, the bill must fail. Equity has gone so far, when stock subscriptions are sought by a creditor of a corporation, as to hold that the creditor may compel payment through the court without a previous call by the corporation, although the corporation cannot enforce payment except by a call in some states and under ordinary conditions; but it has gone no farther, and it cannot disregard or refuse to credit payments made in good faith by the stockholder without a call.

It has been held that a payment by a stockholder of a debt owing by the corporation, which is insolvent, with the intent thereby of discharging his liability on his unpaid subscription, and which the accredited officers of the corporation did not authorize or accept, is not good in defense to a creditors' bill against the stockholder. But in this case there was no proof of insolvency at the time the greater part of the payments in question were made, nor any finding of insolvency prior to the beginning of the action, and that principle does not apply as to them.

It is claimed, on the authority of Welch v. Sargent, 127 Cal. 72,² that no payment can be credited where the payment is made to a creditor upon the corporate debt, or in any case where it is not made to the proper officer of the corporation to be applied on the balance unpaid on the stock. In Welch v. Sargent the payment was made to a creditor in discharge of his claim against the corporation and the corporation did not agree that it should constitute a payment on the stock subscription, nor accept or credit it as such. The only person who had the intent that it should so apply was the stockholder himself. In discussing the effect of such payment on the stockholder's liability the court remarked that the stockholder's liability is an asset of the corporation which "is payable to the corporation and no one else." It is upon this remark that the respondent relies. It cannot be given the effect here claimed for it and the context shows that it was not so intended. In the absence of fraud, actual or constructive, the corporation and the stockholder are at liberty to effect a payment in any mode they see fit, either in property, or in payment of a corporate debt, or in actual cash or its equivalent. There is nothing in the opinion in that case that is contrary to these principles of the law of contracts.

[3] Coming now to the facts shown in the evidence bearing on the proposition, we find that no formal call was made in the ordinary manner. But it is clear that there was that which in substance amounted to a call. Denman was the leader of the seven persons who formed the corporation, and after its formation the entire management of its affairs was left to him. After the theater building was completed with the borrowed money, he attended to all of its business. There was no office, no treasurer, and no ordinary books of account. By common consent of all the stockholders he was authorized to perform the functions of all the officers and he did perform them without objection from any of them. He kept account of the debts and expenses accruing in excess of the receipts; he collected the rents and applied them on the interest accruing to the plaintiff and other expenses; and when additional money was required he ascertained the amount necessary and apportioned it to the stockholders according to their holdings, informed them of the amount due from them, and they paid it on his demand, with the understanding that it constituted a credit on the balance due on the subscription liability. The corporation was then a going concern, and this method of carrying on its business was satisfactory to all the persons interested. We can perceive no reason why, under all these circumstances, the payments so made did not operate as a discharge, pro tanto, of the obligation of the stockholders to pay the balance of the par value of the stock, binding on the corporation, and likewise binding upon the court in the trial of an action to collect and apply the unpaid subscriptions upon the claims of such a creditor.

BUCKMASTER v. BERTRAM. (L. A. 6538.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 23, 1921.)

1. Specific performance ⇨30—Contract for sale of land too uncertain as to payment of price.

Contract whereby plaintiff agreed to sell and convey to defendant, and defendant agreed to buy, five parcels of land in a certain tract in a county for $1,000, payable "at the times and in the manner hereinafter mentioned, * * * to wit, in the form of a mortgage payable to S. and due April 3, 1919," held too uncertain as to payment of the price to be enforceable.

2. Specific performance ⇨115—Cross-complaint, failing to allege buyer willing to pay price, insufficient.

In suit to cancel a contract for the sale of land, defendant buyer cross-complaining for specific performance, the cross-complaint, which does not show that defendant buyer ever paid or offered to pay the purchase price, or is willing to pay the same if performance be decreed in her favor, is insufficient; while positive repudiation of a contract of sale by the vendor excuses the vendee from formal tender of the price as a condition precedent to an action for specific performance, it does not obviate the necessity for stating in his complaint that he is ready, willing, and able to pay the amount due from him, a requisite not complied with by an offer to pay the amount due after deducting the damages to the vendee from the refusal of the vendor to perform.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨342—Remedies of vendee, where vendor refuses to perform, inconsistent.

Where the vendor of land refuses to perform, the vendee has two remedies, to sue for specific performance or for damages suffered, which remedies are inconsistent, and, if one is chosen by the vendee, the other is deemed to be abandoned, wherever a change of remedy would occasion any injury to parties adversely interested in the matter, as subsequent purchasers of lots from the vendor.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by J. A. Buckmaster against Elsie May Bertram. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying her motion to vacate the judgment and enter a different judgment on the findings, defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Eden & Koepsel, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

Lee Utley, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying her motion to vacate said judgment and enter a different judgment on the findings.

The complaint alleges that on October 3, 1916, the plaintiff and defendant executed a contract in writing whereby plaintiff agreed to sell and convey to the defendant and the defendant agreed to buy five parcels of land in the Newmark tract in Orange county—

"for the sum of one thousand and no/100 dollars, of the United States, and the said party of the second part [Bertram], in consideration of the premises, agrees to pay at the times and in the manner hereinafter mentioned, to the said party of the first part [Buckmaster] the sum of one thousand and no/100 dollars, as follows, to wit: In the form of a mortgage payable to S. M. Skillman, and due April 3, 1919, or 2 years and 6 months from date of the contract, with 7 per cent. interest per annum, payable semiannually."

The contract provided that upon her failure to comply with the terms of the contract the plaintiff should be released from all obligation in law or equity to convey the property, and the defendant should forfeit all right thereto. The deed was to be made "on receiving such payments at the time and in the manner above mentioned." The prayer of the complaint was that the contract be canceled, that the defendant's title, interest, and estate to the property be "adjusted" as subordinate to the plaintiff's title, and that the defendant "be forever disbarred" from asserting any claim or title to the property.

The defendant filed a cross-complaint, which was afterwards superseded by a second amended cross-complaint. The second amended cross-complaint asked that the court state an account between the parties and give the defendant a reasonable time to redeem the same, and for judgment against the plaintiff for any balance found due on the accounting, and for specific performance of the contract on payment by the defendant of the amount found due from her, or, if it is found impossible for the plaintiff to perform his agreement, then for damages against plaintiff in the sum of $2,000. The cross-complaint alleged the contract set up in the complaint, that on April 9, 1918, plaintiff gave notice to the defendant that he had decided to cancel the contract, and that the plaintiff has ever since refused to perform said agreement, and that plaintiff had informed defendant that he had disposed of one of said lots. It is alleged that the property had greatly increased in value, and was at the time of the filing of the cross-complaint worth $4,000.

The findings state that the agreement alleged in the complaint was executed by the parties; that plaintiff had given notice to defendant that he had sold some of the lots and had concluded to cancel the agreement; that defendant had not paid anything upon said contract; that on April 1, 1919, the lots were of the value of $2,500; that defendant was not entitled to specific performance, because of the fact that her first cross-complaint did not claim the right of specific performance, and that after the filing thereof the plaintiff had sold parts of the property to bona fide purchasers, because of defendant's failure to claim the right of specific performance in her first cross-complaint; and that by so doing she had waived that right and was confined to her claim for damages for the refusal of the plaintiff to perform the contract. The findings declare that the defendant is damaged in the sum of $900 by the refusal of the plaintiff to perform. Judgment was given, declaring that the defendant was estopped from seeking specific performance of the contract and that she recover of plaintiff the sum of $900 as damages; that upon payment thereof by plaintiff all adverse claims of the defendant be declared invalid and groundless, and the plaintiff and his grantees be declared to be the owners of said property, and have their titles quieted as against all claims of the defendant.

[1] On its face the agreement is too uncertain to be enforceable by way of specific performance.

"It is elementary that specific performance will not be enforced unless the contract not only contains all the material terms, but also expresses each in a sufficiently definite manner. In Pomeroy on Contracts, § 159, it is said: 'An uncertain contract * * * may perhaps embrace, in a partial manner, all the material terms, but on account of the inexact, indefinite, or obscure language in which one or more of them is stated, it fails to express the intent of the parties with sufficient clearness to enable a court of equity to enforce its provisions. The specific performance of an agreement, thus uncertain, will not be decreed.' As said in 26 American & English Encyclopedia of Law (2d Ed.) p. 33: 'The contract sought to be enforced must, at all events, be so certain that its meaning can be ascertained, as an indefinite contract cannot be enforced, because the courts do not know what the parties agreed. The meaning and intent of the parties should be placed beyond the bounds of mere conjecture by full and clear proof.'" Reymond v. Labouigue, 148 Cal. 694, 84 Pac. 190.

The terms of the contract as to the payment of the price are so indefinite and uncertain that its meaning cannot be ascertained. The price is definitely stated to be $1,000, but the agreement of the defendant to pay such price is qualified and limited by the statement that it is to be paid "at the times and in the manner hereinafter mentioned," which time and manner are declared to be as follows, to wit:

"In the form of a mortgage, payable to S. M. Skillman, and due April 3, 1919, * * * at 7 per cent. interest per annum, payable semi-annually."

Does this mean that the defendant is to cause a mortgage, payable to Skillman, to be transferred or assigned to the plaintiff, who is to accept it as payment of the $1,000, and immediately execute to her a deed, which, as appears later in the contract, is to be made "on receiving such payments, at the time and in the manner above mentioned"? Or is the defendant herself to execute a mortgage payable to Skillman for $1,000, or some other sum, which is in some unexplained manner to inure to the benefit of the plaintiff, and to operate as payment of the price? If our first guess is correct, what is the amount of the Skillman mortgage? If either guess is correct, what land or personal property is covered or to be covered by the proposed mortgage? If the Skillman mortgage was in existence at the time, who was the mortgagor? And if it was for more than $1,000, was its full payment necessary to constitute the payment of "said price," or would a payment of $1,000 thereon suffice to accomplish that purpose, and when was such payment due? The execution of the mortgage to Skillman by some person other than the defendant and on other property than that described in the agreement of sale would come within the terms of the agreement as to the payment of the price. Was such performance within the intent of the parties?

The agreement answers none of these questions. Nor is any answer shown by the pleadings or findings. Possibly extrinsic facts might be proven which would render the contract sufficiently certain to enable a court of equity to decree its specific performance. But there are no allegations, either in the complaint or in the cross-complaint, nor any statements in the findings, relating to any such extrinsic facts, or indicating what they may be, and no solution of the meaning of the contract in the respects indicated is possible from anything contained in the judgment roll. On the face of the record, therefore, the defendant is not entitled to a specific performance.

[2] The cross-complaint is insufficient for another reason. It does not show that the defendant ever paid or offered to pay the purchase price, or that she is willing to pay the same if specific performance should be decreed in her favor. She alleges that she has been damaged in the sum of $4,000 by the alleged repudiation of the contract by the plaintiff and certain other alleged breaches thereof, and that she is ready, able, and willing to perform the contract on her part "upon statement of an account by the court of the amount, if any," which she ought to pay to the plaintiff, and she prays for an accounting, and that a reasonable time be given her in which to pay any balance "found due on such accounting." The only accounting shown to be necessary is the ascertainment of the difference between the purchase price and the damages alleged. While the positive repudiation of a contract of sale by the vendor excuses the vendee from a formal tender of the price as a condition precedent to an action for specific performance, it does not obviate the necessity of stating in his complaint in such action that he is ready, able, and willing to pay the amount due from him. This requisite is not complied with by an offer to pay the amount due after deducting the damages to the vendee from the refusal of the vendor to perform, from the amount of the purchase price unpaid. The vendee cannot seek damages for the refusal and specific performance in a single cause of action.

[3] Furthermore, the findings show that the first cross-complaint of the defendant sought damages from the plaintiff by reason of his repudiation of the contract and did not ask specific performance, and that during the interval between the filing of the first cross-complaint and the filing of the second amended cross-complaint, seeking specific performance, the plaintiff, relying upon defendant's election of remedy, had made sales of some of the lots, which the purchasers had bought, also relying upon such election. Where the vendor refuses to perform, the vendee has two remedies; that is, either to sue for specific performance or to sue for damages suffered from the refusal. These remedies are inconsistent and the vendee cannot have both, and if one is chosen the other is deemed to be abandoned, wherever the change of remedy would occasion any injury to parties adversely interested in the matter. McGibbon v. Schmidt, 172 Cal. 75, 155 Pac. 460. The findings show that both the plaintiff and his subsequent vendees would be injured by allowing the defendant to maintain the action for specific performance set up in her last amended cross-complaint. It was for this reason that the court below allowed her damages and refused specific performance. Under the circumstances she has obtained all that she is entitled to, and perhaps more.

The notice of appeal purports to state that the defendant appeals from the order denying her motion to vacate the judgment and render a different judgment on the findings. The record does not show that she ever gave notice of any such motion, nor does anything appear from which we can determine the form of judgment which she desired to have entered upon the findings. No error in this respect is made to appear.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

STATE v. ANGLO & LONDON PARIS NAT. BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.
(Sac. 3047, 3215, 3217.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 29, 1921.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 26, 1921.)

Escheat § 8(1)—State statute of escheat applies to deposits in national banks.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1273, providing for escheat to the state of bank deposits unclaimed for 20 years, applies to national banks, it not being in express conflict with any federal statute, Congress not having attempted to legislate on the subject, and its operation not incapacitating such a bank from discharging its duties to the government, nor impairing its efficiency as a governmental agency; and the property rights of the depositor being created and controlled by state law, so that the sovereignty to which the escheat inures is the state, and not the United States.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the State against the Anglo & London Paris National Bank of San Francisco and others, in which there was a separate judgment against the First National Bank of Santa Barbara, the First National Bank of San Jose, and the Crocker National Bank of San Francisco, and each separately appeals. Affirmed.

Leib & Leib, of San Jose, Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco, and R. B. Canfield, of Santa Barbara, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank L. Guarena, of San Francisco, for the State.

SHAW, J. This is an action by the state of California, begun in pursuance of the provisions of section 1273 of the Code of Civil Procedure, against the above-mentioned defendants and a large number of persons alleged to be depositors in said banks, to obtain a judgment against said banks, respectively, declaring that the credits of the depositors therein mentioned in the respective banks have escheated to the state of California, and directing the respective banks to forthwith deposit the same with the state treasurer. Separate findings and a separate judgment were given and entered in the case with respect to each of the three defendants who are appellants above named. From each of these judgments the respective banks have taken separate appeals, and the same are presented in separate transcripts filed in this court. The three appeals all raise the same questions, and they will be considered together as one case.

The questions presented in these cases, with one exception, are considered and fully treated in the opinions of this court in State v. Security Savings Bank, 199 Pac. 791, filed on July 5, 1921 (Sac. No. 2890), and in State v. Savings, etc., Co., 199 Pac. 26, filed on June 20, 1921 (Sac. No. 2922), and were thereby decided adversely to the contentions of the appellants. The facts presented in the cases now before the court are in all respects similar to those stated in the opinion in State v. Security Savings Bank, supra. It is unnecessary to restate those questions or to repeat the reasons given in support of our conclusions thereon. We refer to those decisions for such statement.

The one question not considered in those decisions arises from the fact that each of the three appellants in the cases now under consideration is a national bank organized and doing business under the laws of the United States. At the time the rehearings were granted from the decisions of the District Court of Appeal of the Third District on the appeals of the First National Bank of San Jose and the Crocker National Bank of San Francisco, the other cases above mentioned were pending, and the rehearings were granted, because we deemed it best to have the entire subject before this court before any decision therein should become final. With respect to the question arising out of the fact that the appellants now before the court are national banks, governed by the laws of the United States, the opinion prepared by Mr. Justice Burnett of the District Court of Appeal of the Third District on the appeal of the First National Bank of San Jose (Sac. No. 3215) is satisfactory to this court, and we hereby adopt the same as the opinion of this court. It is as follows:

"It is not disputed that the general rule is that 'the power to regulate property within the limits of the state, the modes of acquiring and transferring it, and the rules of descent and distribution of property, are subjects belonging exclusively to the jurisdiction of the state,' but appellant insists that said section 1273 of the Code of Civil Procedure has no application to deposits made in national banks, for the reason that 'the sovereign that created national banks is the United States,' that such sovereign alone has the right to enact, and has enacted, laws for the government of national banks, and that such deposits are subject to and controlled by said statutes, entirely independent of any enactment passed by the state Legislature. This is the objection, as we understand it, stated in somewhat general terms. Some more specific considerations are urged, but they are based upon the fundamental principle already stated.

Indeed appellant considers such legislation, so far as it may be said to apply to national banks, as a regulatory measure, and it is declared: 'The state has no power to regulate national banks. The regulation of national banks has always been solely within the provision of the United States, and not in any degree within the province of the state, especially when attempted regulation of the state would conflict with the laws of the United States regulations, as is the case here.'

"The extent to which said banks may be subject to state statutes has been settled in general terms by the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, although much has been left to the exercise of a wise discretion in the application of the general principle to the particular facts of each case.

"In McClellan v. Chipman, 164 U. S. 347, 17 Sup. Ct. 85, 41 L. Ed. 461, it is said: 'Two propositions have been long since settled by the decisions of this court: First. National banks "are subject to the laws of the state, and are governed in their daily course of business far more by the laws of the state than of the nation. All their contracts are governed and construed by state laws. Their acquisition and transfer of property, their right to collect their debts, and their liability to be sued for debts, are all based on state law. It is only when the state law incapacitates the banks from discharging their duties to the government that it becomes unconstitutional." National Bank v. Commonwealth, 9 Wall. 362. Second. "National banks are instrumentalities of the federal government created for a public purpose, and as such necessarily subject to the paramount authority of the United States. It follows that an attempt by a state to define their duties, or control the conduct of their affairs, is absolutely void, whenever such attempted exercise of authority expressly conflicts with the laws of the United States, and either frustrates the purpose of the national legislation, or impairs the efficiencies of these agencies of the federal government to discharge the duties, for the performance of which they were created." Davis v. Elmira Savings Bank, 161 U. S. 275, 283. These two propositions, which are distinct, yet harmonious, practically contain a rule and an exception, the rule being the operation of general state laws upon the dealings and contracts of national banks, the exception being the cessation of the operation of such laws whenever they expressly conflict with the laws of the United States or frustrate the purpose for which the national banks were created, or impair their efficiency to discharge the duties imposed upon them by the law of the United States.'

"It is not contended that there is any statute of the United States providing for the forfeiture of what is called inactive deposits in national banks, nor is it claimed that Congress has by any legislation limited the time within which such deposits may be checked out. Indeed, it is admitted that there is no federal statute expressly in conflict with said section of the Code of Civil Procedure. In fact, it is apparent that Congress has not attempted to legislate on this subject at all. Hence, it seems clear that the legislation herein does not 'expressly conflict with any law of the United States,' and is therefore not required to yield to the paramount authority of the federal government because inconsistent therewith. It seems equally plain that this statute, in its operation, does not incapacitate the bank from discharging its duties to the government, nor does it in the least impair its efficiency as a governmental agency. It is not denied that the depositor could at any time while the bank is a going concern withdraw his deposits, with interest, or—what is substantially equivalent—require the same amount to be paid to him in honor of his check; nor is it doubted that he could assign his claim and thereby clothe the assignee with the same right. In either of such events it should not be deemed an interference with the proper administration of the business of the bank or an impairment of its usefulness as a governmental agency. Indeed, such withdrawal or the satisfaction of such claim would be in entire harmony with one of the primary purposes of the organization and operation of such banks and is contemplated by the very terms of the charter. That a claimant may have succeeded to the right to demand such payment otherwise than by assignment—for instance, by abandonment or forfeiture—would not, of course, render the transaction any the more a disturbance of the legitimate functions of the bank. In other words, it must be admitted that as far as this question and the interest of the bank in said deposit are concerned, it makes no difference whether the claim is presented by the depositor or by his successor by whatever title. Certain decisions have been cited to illustrate the application of this principle, to which we may briefly refer.

"Similar legislation as it relates to national banks was involved in State v. First Nat. Bank of Portland, 61 Or. 551, 123 Pac. 712, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 153, and it was held by the Supreme Court of Oregon 'that national banks are only exempted from state legislation to the extent that such legislation impairs their efficiency to perform the functions which they were designed to serve, and that the legislation here proposed does not have this effect.' In First National Bank v. Commonwealth, 143 Ky. 816, 137 S. W. 518, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 54, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 378, the Court of Appeals of Kentucky held that 'where a national bank in the state held real estate, not necessary to its business, for more than five years, the property was subject to escheat under the state law; it appearing that it would not impair the efficiency of the bank.' In National Bank v. Commonwealth, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 353, 19 L. Ed. 701, a state law requiring a national bank to pay the tax which is rightfully laid on the shares of its stock was upheld, the court reiterating the doctrine that such instrumentalities are exempt from state legislation only to the extent that such legislation may impair or destroy the efficiency of these agencies of the federal government. In Waite v. Dowley, 94 U. S. 527, 24 L. Ed. 181, it was held that 'a state statute is not void, which, for the purposes of taxation, requires, under a penalty for his neglect or refusal, the cashier of each national bank within the state to transmit, on or before the 15th day of April in each year, to the clerks of the several towns in the state in which any stock or shareholders of such bank shall reside, a true list of the names of such stock or shareholders on the books of such bank, together with the amount of money actually paid in on each share on the 1st day of that month.' In McClellan v. Chipman, supra, legislation by the state of Massachusetts invalidating preferences made by insolvent debtors and assignments or transfers made in contemplation of insolvency was held to apply to national banks, and not to be in conflict with any statute of the United States. In Guthrie v. Harkness, 199 U. S. 148, 26 Sup. Ct. 4, 50 L. Ed. 130, it was held that a state court had the right by mandamus to enforce the right of a stockholder in a national bank to inspect the books of the corporation.

"Appellant seems to think that the tontine principle is involved in the disposition of the deposits made in a national bank; that is, upon the dissolution of the corporation the then depositors would receive the money of those absent and unknown. Our attention has been invited to no provision in the charter or by-laws of such banks or in any statute, state or federal, which gives countenance to this view. The National Bank Act (13 Stat. 99) provides that in case of the dissolution of a national bank the assets shall be used to pay the claims of the depositors, and the surplus, if any, shall be distributed to the shareholders, not to the depositors. No depositor has any interest in the deposit of another, except, of course, incidentally as he is interested in the prosperity of the bank.

"The interest of the shareholder in the deposit is not vested, but contingent upon the event that it may not be claimed by the depositor or any one representing him. The law in reference to the disposition of the assets of the national bank upon dissolution is not dissimilar to that applying to the state banks, but in neither case is there anything in derogation of the right of the depositor or his successor in interest to maintain his claim to the entire deposit. It is manifest that no depositor is required to leave his deposit in the bank indefinitely, or until the dissolution of the bank. No such obligation is expressed or implied in any provision of the statute, as far as we know. Of course, the ability of a national bank to loan money depends upon the amount of its deposits, and it might be a great advantage to such corporation for the depositors to allow their money to be so used indefinitely, but the law does not require it, nor does it impose any such duty upon any one succeeding to the interest of the depositor.

"Of all the objections made by appellant, we think only one possesses any merit. That relates to the peculiar language of the statute providing that the amount of money deposited shall escheat to the state. Appellant is undoubtedly right in the claim that deposits in national as well as in state banks become the property of the bank, and thereby is created a debt in favor of the depositor to the amount of the deposit, and it is this debt which is paid in honor of the check of the depositor. Smiths' Cash Store v. First National Bank, 149 Cal. 32, 84 Pac. 663, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 870. It follows that the deposits mentioned in the complaint herein became a part of the actual assets and funds of the bank, and those identical funds could not, of course, escheat to the state by reason of any default of the depositor. Manifestly, the bank could not be deprived of its own funds in this summary manner without any default on its part. But while the language of the section is not very apt, it should be given a reasonable construction, and one, if possible, that will sustain, and not defeat, the law. No doubt it was the intention of the Legislature to provide that the right or claim of the depositor to such indebtedness should be forfeited or should 'escheat' to the state. It would be an impeachment of the common sense of the lawmakers to assume that they contemplated the forfeiture of the identical money that was deposited. It is not disputed that the language employed in said section is similar to that used generally in such statutes and involved in the decisions to which we have referred, and we think the reasonable interpretation is that the property affected by the escheat is the credit held by the depositor against the bank.

"We do not agree with appellant in its construction of the term 'escheat' as used in said statute. It is said that 'an escheat can be taken over by the sovereignty only in cases where the property rights existed by reason of the sovereignty which claims the escheat, or where the property has been forfeited for violation or wrong committed against some valid law of that particular sovereignty,' and that the United States of America is that sovereignty. Hence, the contention that, if there could be an escheat of the depositor's interest, it must be in favor of the United States, and not of the state. The mistake is in assuming that said property rights arise from and are governed by the federal statute. On the contrary, they are created and controlled by the state law, as the decisions abundantly show. In that respect the relation between a national bank and its depositor is placed upon the same footing as in the case of a state bank. The sovereignty, therefore, to which the escheat inures, is the state, and not the United States."

We deem it proper to repeat the statement at the conclusion of our decision in State v. Security Savings Bank, supra, that we express no opinion upon the question whether the judgment of the superior court herein operates as a present escheat of the rights of the several depositors against the respective banks, or whether under section 1272 they each still have the right within the time there stated to prosecute an action to obtain payment of their several deposits from the state treasurer, and to say that if they have such right the judgment of the superior court would not be a bar thereto.

The judgment appealed from in each of the said appeals is hereby affirmed.

SIMONSEN et ux. v. L. J. CHRISTOPHER CO. (L. A. 6534.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 29, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ☞1011(1)—Finding of trial court where evidence is conflicting will not be disturbed.

Where the evidence showed that defendant's motortruck was exceeding the legal speed limit, and that plaintiff had the right of way at a street intersection, although the testimony was contradictory, a finding of the trial court that the accident was caused by the negligence of defendant, and that plaintiff was not negligent, will not be disturbed.

2. Municipal corporations ☞705(10)—Person may assume another will use care if nothing indicates contrary.

One crossing a street in front of an approaching vehicle cannot close his eyes to threatening danger, relying on the presumption that the driver will use reasonable care and prudence, and obey the traffic laws; but if there is nothing in the situation to warn him of impending danger, he is not negligent in relying upon such assumption.

3. Municipal corporations ☞706(7)—Failure to watch for truck at street intersection not negligence as a matter of law.

Where plaintiffs, traveling in an automobile at a reasonable speed, had passed beyond the center of a street intersection, and were presumably out of the zone of danger from any vehicle approaching from the east, and were struck by defendant's motortruck, which was exceeding the legal speed limit, at a place out of the line of travel from that direction, plaintiffs were not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in failing to keep watch for the truck.

4. Municipal corporations ☞705(10)—Speed of plaintiff's automobile or failure to keep lookout held not to have contributed to accident.

Where plaintiff's automobile, when struck by defendant's truck, had passed the center of a street intersection, and was beyond the line of travel for vehicles traveling in the direction the truck was traveling, the speed of the automobile or the failure of plaintiffs to keep a sufficient lookout when entering upon the street crossing did not contribute to the accident.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Louis Simonsen and wife against the L. J. Christopher Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. T. Morrow, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. This is an automobile accident collision case. The plaintiff, Louis

Simonsen, with his wife, Gussie Simonsen, was driving in a light Buick car south on the west side of Arlington street, in the city of Los Angeles. The defendant's employee was driving a delivery autotruck west on the northerly side of an intersecting street.

According to the testimony of the plaintiffs, they were driving at from 18 to 20 miles an hour at a point about 20 feet north of the intersection where they first saw defendant's truck approaching from the east at a distance of about 50 feet from the intersection, and at a speed of about 30 miles an hour. Plaintiffs had the right of way, and, having slowed down to 15 miles at the intersection, proceeded south across the street, paying no further attention to the truck. The next they knew of the truck, as they testify, was after they had passed the center of the intersection, when the truck suddenly appeared coming diagonally across the street from the northeast, and closing in upon them at a point near the southwest corner of the street intersection. Plaintiff Simonsen testified that he then swerved his car to the right, but could not avoid the collision, the truck striking his machine on the left side, about the front fender.

[1] The evidence shows that defendant's truck was being driven beyond the legal rate of speed, and that the plaintiffs had the right of way; but defendant relies upon its plea of contributory negligence of the plaintiffs for failure to keep a continuous lookout for the truck after entering upon the intersection. The trial court found that the accident was caused by the negligence of defendant, and that the plaintiffs were not guilty of contributory negligence. Under the conflicting evidence we cannot disturb this finding.

[2] As has been frequently said by this court and the District Courts of Appeal, a person crossing a street in front of an approaching vehicle cannot close his eyes to threatening danger, relying upon the presumption that the other party will use reasonable care and prudence, and obey the traffic laws; but if there is nothing in the situation to warn him of impending danger he is not guilty of negligence in relying upon such assumption. McPhee v. Lavin, 191 Pac. 23; Commonwealth B. & C. Co. v. Pac. Elec. Co. (App.) 184 Pac. 29; Baker v. Western Auto Co. (App.) 192 Pac. 73; Harris v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 55, 161 Pac. 1155, L. R. A. 1917C, 477, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 560.

[3, 4] In this case, according to the plaintiffs' evidence, the plaintiffs had passed beyond the center of the street crossing without accident, and were presumably out of the zone of danger from any vehicle approaching from the east. We do not think they can be held guilty of negligence as a matter of law, or under their version of the facts, because they failed to keep further watch for defendant's truck. It is claimed that they did not keep a sufficient lookout while entering upon the street crossing, and that they were driving beyond the prescribed speed limit, but obviously neither of these circumstances contributed to the accident, as the collision did not occur on the side of the street in defendant's line of travel, and the greater speed at which they made the crossing lessened the danger of their being overtaken by defendant's truck.

The place where the court found the collision to have occurred indicates that the course of the truck was in violation of the traffic laws. The driver of defendant's truck testified that he proceeded directly west on the north side of the intersection, and was run into by the plaintiffs, approaching from the north, but the trial court evidently accepted the testimony of plaintiffs as the correct history of the collision, and on such conflict of the evidence the findings of the court must be sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

COURT OF PLUMAS COUNTY et al.
(S. F. 9769.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1921
Rehearing Denied Sept. 29, 1921.)

1. Dismissal and nonsuit — 45—Statute requiring dismissal after five years mandatory.

The provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 583, are mandatory in the matter of a dismissal after five years after answer filed, except where the parties have stipulated in writing that the time may be extended beyond such limitations.

2. Dismissal and nonsuit — 60(1)—Extension stipulated to dates within statutory period does not prolong.

Extensions of time made or stipulated to dates for trial within statutory term of five years after answer does not operate to prolong five-year period under Code Civ. Proc. § 583, providing for the dismissal of an action for failure to bring the same to trial within five years after answer filed, even though such extensions are asked by the defendant.

3. Dismissal and nonsuit — 60(1)—Court had jurisdiction after five years from answer to try case; "stipulation in writing."

Court had jurisdiction to try a case more than five years after answer under Code Civ. Proc. § 583, although the case was continued beyond such period by the court on its own motion without request of either party, where the long delay in bringing the cause to trial was at the repeated request and for the accommodation of the defendants, and several dates were agreed upon in writing for trial by the parties after the expiration of the five years before defendant finally moved for dismissal under the statute, parties being at liberty to treat the action as pending and within the jurisdiction of the court after such time, and the agreements of the parties setting certain dates for trial constituting a stipulation in writing within the meaning of such statute

In Bank.

Application by the Rio Vista Mining Company for a writ of mandamus against the Superior Court of the County of Plumas and the Presiding Judge thereof. Writ denied.

W. A. Dow, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

W. E. Davies and J. E. Ebert, both of Marysville, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. This matter is before this court on petition for writ of mandate to enforce the dismissal of an action for failure to bring the same to trial within five years after answer filed, as required by section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The action was brought in said superior court by one Ed Metcalf, as plaintiff, against the petitioner here, Rio Vista Mining Company, and others, as defendants. The suit was begun August 13, 1913. Various pleadings were filed, but it is conceded by the parties that the matter was finally brought to issue by a stipulated answer on September 24, 1915.

The attorney for plaintiff in this action resides at Marysville, and the attorneys for petitioner reside and have their office in San Francisco, while the action was pending in the county of Plumas. Hence, it appears that most of the negotiations herein referred to have been carried on by correspondence.

The defendant (petitioner here), claiming that the action had not been brought to trial within the five-year period under section 583, supra, moved the court for a dismissal on the 10th of March, 1921, more than five years after answer filed. The motion was denied in the superior court, and this proceeding followed.

[1] On the face of the petition the petitioner was entitled to a dismissal. The provisions of section 583, Code of Civil Procedure, are mandatory in the matter of a dismissal after five years, "except where the parties have stipulated in writing that the time may be extended" beyond the five-year limitation. Romero v. Snyder, 167 Cal. 216, 138 Pac. 1002; Larkin v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 720, 154 Pac. 841, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 670.

Respondents have set up by way of answer and affidavits certain facts upon which they rely as an extension of time for bringing the cause to trial, both by way of estoppel and stipulation. It appears without dispute that the plaintiff had the cause set down for trial on several occasions, and that postponements were taken at the request and for the accommodation of the defendant (the petitioner herein) in each instance. None of these stipulated continuances, however, carried the time of trial beyond the five-year limitation.

[2] It has been settled under the rulings of this court that no extension made or stipulated to dates within the statutory term of five years operates to prolong the five-year period. City of Los Angeles v. Superior Court, 197 Pac. 79; Larkin v. Superior Court, supra.

The five-year period dating from the filing of the answer expired on the 24th of September, 1920. By stipulation of the parties the cause was last set down for trial, before the expiration of the five years, for June 22, 1920. There was a continuance granted at the request of defendants to the 12th of August. On or about the 10th of August the trial judge notified the parties that he had again continued the trial to December 8th on account of inability of the judge who was to hear the case to be present at an earlier date. This carried the date of trial beyond the five-year period, and the postponement was made on the court's own motion without the consent of either of the parties. However, no objection was made by either plaintiff or defendants, and, as the burden was upon the plaintiff to bring the cause to trial within the time prescribed by law, it may be conceded that, in the absence of further effective stipulation or waiver on the part of the defendants, the action was subject to dismissal for want of prosecution at any time on defendants' motion or by the court on its own motion.

Instead of moving for a dismissal, the defendants thereafter, about the 1st of December, 1920, notified the trial court that they could not proceed to trial on the 8th of December, for the reason that one of their principal witnesses was outside the state, and could not be present on the date named, and the court thereupon reset the hearing for March 2, 1921, and notified both parties of such postponement. Following this, as affiant, the trial judge deposes, "said affiant received a request or communication from said Powell & Dow, said attorneys for said defendant, Rio Vista Mining Company [the petitioner], requesting that affiant do continue said date or time of trial from March 2, 1921, to some time during the week commencing March 7, 1921, as an accommodation to said firm," as they were engaged in the trial of another case in San Francisco. Thereupon, "affiant informed said Powell & Dow to take said matter up with J. E. Ebert, attorney for plaintiff, for an extension of time of trial herein," and he would appoint a new date for the trial in accordance with their agreement. Such conference was had between the attorneys for the respective parties and as a result of their meeting they agreed upon the 10th of March, 1921, as a new date of trial. Attorneys for petitioner sent to the trial judge the following telegram, signed by attorneys for both parties: "We both agree upon March 10th." The trial, pursuant to this stipulation, was again set for that date, and upon the matter coming on for hearing, the parties all being present, defendant, the petitioner here, for the first time objected to the trial of the case on its merits, and made its motion for a dismissal for failure of respondent to bring the case to trial within five years from date of filing answer.

The court denied the motion, and the trial was taken up; both parties participating in contesting the action on its merits. It is entirely clear on the face of the record that after the expiration of the five years petitioner made no move to have the case dismissed until the day finally set for trial, and that it was stipulated over the signatures of both parties that the cause be brought to trial on its merits on that day. Nothing appears in the record of any notice of objection to the trial, and the negotiations of the parties preceding the telegram clearly indicate that what they had in contemplation was a trial on the merits, in notifying the court that "we both agree on March 10th."

[3] It seems to have been conceded by counsel on both sides at the oral argument of this petition for writ of mandate before this court that, at the conference between counsel preceding the telegram, counsel for petitioner suggested that he did not think the court had jurisdiction of the case. The conduct of counsel for petitioner and the signed telegram were such, however, as to give the court jurisdiction if it could be conferred by the written consent of the parties.

There are no equities in behalf of petitioner in this matter. It is apparent that the long delay in bringing the cause to trial was at the repeated request and for the accommodation of the defendants, and that the attitude of defendants' counsel throughout was such as to lull the plaintiff into a sense of security as regards the provisions of section 583, Code of Civil Procedure. The question resolves itself into the bare legal proposition as to whether the mere lapse of five years before trial deprived the court of jurisdiction to thereafter try the case, even by consent of the parties. We do not think it did. If the parties had appeared in court at the final date set and voluntarily tried the case without objection it will hardly be disputed that a judgment following such trial would be valid.

Where a cause of action is within the general jurisdiction of a court the voluntary appearance of the parties and submission of the cause on its merits confers jurisdiction to try the issues presented. Allen v. Allen, 159 Cal. 197, 113 Pac. 160; In re Crawford, 68 Ohio St. 58, 67 N. E. 156, 96 Am. St. Rep. 648; Lewis v. Albertson, 23 Ind. App. 147, 53 N. E. 1071. If the parties can waive the right to object to want of jurisdiction by actually going to trial they certainly can confer such jurisdiction by a stipulation to submit the cause to trial.

There is, moreover, nothing in the wording of the statute in question to deprive the court of jurisdiction upon the mere lapse of five years. It is only after due notice to plaintiff that it may be dismissed on motion of the defendant, and until the actual dismissal there appears no reason why the matter of going to trial should not remain subject to the stipulation of the parties.

Unlike the preceding sections, 581a and 581b, directing dismissals upon failure to issue and return summons within a specified period, or upon failure to pay fees on transfer of actions, section 583 does not require that such actions shall not be "further prosecuted and no further proceedings shall be had therein," after the limited time has expired. The provision of section 583, for an extension of time for trial by stipulation of the parties, and directing notice, before dismissal on motion of the plaintiff, would suggest that even a dismissal on the court's own motion would contemplate some previous determination as to whether or not such stipulation between the parties existed. Under sections 581a and 581b the writ of prohibition has been upheld to prevent further exercise of jurisdiction in actions coming under those provisions (Modoc Land Co. v. Superior Court, 128 Cal. 255, 60 Pac. 848; White v. Superior Court, 126 Cal. 245, 58 Pac. 450), and such dismissal can be had without notice to either of the parties (Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Wood, 40 Cal. App. 355, 180 Pac. 951).

The only relief granted under section 583 by our decisions has been to require, on proper showing, that an order of dismissal be entered, upon the apparent assumption that until such dismissal is made or demanded the parties are at liberty to treat the action as pending and within the jurisdiction of the court. Even under sections 581a and 581b it is held that the control of the court over the action is not lost for some purposes until the order of dismissal is made. Consolidated Construction Co. v. Pac. Elec. Ry., 193 Pac. 238. In any event it was competent for the parties here, by consenting to go to trial upon the issues as framed in the action, to confer jurisdiction upon the court to try the case.

We are of the opinion that the correspondence between the plaintiff and defendant with reference to setting the case for trial after the expiration of the five-year period, followed by the signed telegram agreeing upon the date, constituted a stipulation in writing signed by the parties agreeing to bring the case to trial at a date beyond the period prescribed by section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The writ is denied.

In re PARKER'S ESTATE. (L. A. 6734.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 19, 1921.)

1. Executors and administrators ☞109(2)—Entitled to reimbursement for necessary traveling and other expenses.

An administrator or executor is entitled to reimbursement for such traveling and other expenses as were necessarily and properly incurred in the preservation and care of the assets of the estate.

2. Executors and administrators ☞510(10)—Court's discretion as to reasonableness and necessity of executor's expenditures abused and reviewable, when it exceeds bounds of reason or contravenes uncontradicted evidence.

Though the court below, when passing on the reasonableness and necessity of an executor's expenditures, is invested with a broad discretion, which, when exercised for or against the executor's claim, will not be disturbed on appeal, such discretion is abused whenever it may be fairly said that in its exercise the court exceeded the bounds of reason or contravened the uncontradicted evidence.

3. Executors and administrators ☞497—Entitled only to regular statutory commission for ordinary services.

For services rendered in the ordinary administration of an estate, consisting in locating assets thereof, collecting claims due it and selling personal property belonging thereto, the executrix is entitled only to the regular commission fixed by statute, Code Civ. Proc. § 1618; additional compensation being allowable only when there has been an extraordinary service.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Petition by Anness A. Hoyt, executrix of the estate of Ida B. Parker, deceased, for an allowance for extraordinary services and expenditures. From an order disallowing her claim, executrix appeals. Reversed in part, and remanded, with directions.

See, also, 200 Pac. 620.

Raymond E. Hoyt, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John A. Harvey and S. M. Davis, both of Santa Ana, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Anness A. Hoyt, executrix of the estate of Ida B. Parker, deceased, petitioned the court below for an allowance from the funds of said estate in the sum of $159.73, which she claimed was due her in addition to $318.92, the regular commission allowed by statute for services during the administration of the estate. Code Civ. Proc. § 1618. One hundred dollars of this sum the executrix requested as compensation for extraordinary services alleged to have been performed by her for the benefit of said estate; the balance of $59.73 was claimed as reimbursement for extraordinary expenditures made for and upon behalf of said estate by said executrix. Upon a hearing of the petition, the court below ordered that the same be disallowed, save and except to the extent of the sum of $25, which sum was allowed solely for "extraordinary services." The executrix appeals from this order, and the appeal is grounded in the contention that the order is contrary to the uncontradicted evidence adduced upon the hearing of the petition.

[1] This contention must be sustained in part. It is an admitted fact in the case that the preservation and care of the property of the estate and the disposal of the personal property thereof necessitated trips from the city of Los Angeles, where the executrix resided, to points in and about the county of Orange, where the property of the deceased was situated. It is also an undisputed fact that the sum of $59.73 was necessarily expended in these trips. It further appears that when the executrix took charge of the estate it was insolvent, and that as a result of her promotion and direction of sales of the personal property, coupled with her efforts in the collection of accounts due the estate, the sum of $3,623.39 was brought into the estate which would otherwise have been lost to the estate. The traveling expenses in question were therefore necessary to preserve the property of the estate, and resulted in a distinct, direct, and consequential benefit to the estate.

[2] An administrator or executor is entitled to reimbursement for such traveling and other expenses as were necessarily and properly incurred in the preservation and care of the assets of the estate. Estate of Byrne, 122 Cal. 260, 54 Pac. 957, 1015. It is true that the court below, when passing upon the reasonableness and necessity of such expenditures, is invested with a broad discretion, which, when exercised for or against the claim of the executor or administrator, will not be disturbed on appeal. This discretion, however, is abused, in a legal sense, whenever it may be fairly said that in its exercise the court in a given case exceeded the bounds of reason or contravened the uncontradicted evidence. Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, 16 Pac. 345; Murray v. Buell, 74 Wis. 14, 41 N. W. 1010. The uncontradicted evidence in the instant case shows beyond cavil that the money expended by the executrix and for which she sought reimbursement was necessarily and properly expended in the preservation of the property of the estate, and that sum should therefore be allowed her.

[3] With respect to the claim for compensation for extraordinary services, however, as distinguished from the claim for reimbursement for expenditures, petitioner's contention cannot be upheld. The court below allowed petitioner $25 for the alleged extraordinary services performed by her. The services performed by the petitioner consisted in locating assets of the estate, collecting claims due the estate, and selling personal property belonging to the estate. The services rendered in the performance of these acts appear to have amounted to nothing more than the performance of the ordinary duties of an executrix in securing possession of and preserving the property of the decedent. For services rendered in the ordinary administration of the estate an executrix is entitled only to the regular commission fixed by statute. Additional compensation is allowable only when there has been an "extraordinary" service. Estate of Phelps, 199 Pac. 10. In the instant case the commission provided by the Code of Civil Procedure constitutes payment for all ordinary services in connection with the administration of the estate and the extra allowance of $25 made by the court below is full compensation for any services of the petitioner that could, by any possibility, be deemed "extraordinary."

The order appealed from is reversed, in so far as it pertains to the petition for reimbursement for extraordinary expenditures, and the case is remanded, with directions to the trial court to proceed in conformity with the above opinion.

In re PARKER'S ESTATE. (L. A. 6735.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 19, 1921.)

Executors and administrators §510(10) — Court's allowance of attorneys' fees not reversed, unless discretion clearly abused.

Though the court below would have been warranted in allowing an attorney for an estate a much larger sum for extraordinary services, its allowance will not be reversed or modified, unless the Supreme Court can plainly see and unequivocally say that its order is absolutely and unqualifiedly an abuse of discretion; the allowance for extraordinary services resting largely in the discretion of the court.

Petition by Raymond E. Hoyt, as attorney for the executrix of the estate of Ida B. Parker, deceased, for fees for extraordinary services and expenses. From an order granting his petition in part, he appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 200 Pac. 619.

Raymond E. Hoyt, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John A. Harvey and S. M. Davis, both of Santa Ana, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal by Raymond E. Hoyt, as the attorney for the executrix in the above-entitled estate, from an order of the court below granting in part only a petition for fees for extraordinary services rendered and extraordinary expenses incurred by said attorney in behalf of said estate. Code Civ. Proc. § 1616. The petition in question prayed for an allowance in the sum of $311.35, of which $16.35 was for extraordinary expenses and the remaining $295 was claimed as a charge for extraordinary services rendered by petitioner to the estate. The court below upon a hearing of the petition made an order allowing the petitioner the sum of $85 in full for the sums claimed to have been expended as extraordinary expenses and for attorney's fees for the rendition of extraordinary services. The uncontradicted evidence clearly shows that the extraordinary expenses, legitimately and necessarily incurred in the performance of services as attorney for the executrix of said estate, amounted to $16.35. Deducting this sum from the award of the court leaves $68.65 as the amount of the award for extraordinary services. It is contended that the order of the court is contrary to the undisputed facts in the case and an abuse of discretion, which may therefore be reversed by this court.

It may be conceded that upon the record before us the court below would have been warranted in allowing petitioner a much larger sum for his extraordinary services as attorney to the estate, but the allowance of attorney's fees for such services rendered in the probate of an estate rests largely in the discretion of the court in the first instance, and will not be reversed or modified, unless this court can plainly see and unequivocally say that the order under review is absolutely and unqualifiedly an abuse of discretion.

Estate of Adams, 131 Cal. 415, 63 Pac. 838; Treadwell v. Treadwell, 134 Cal. 158, 66 Pac. 197. In other words, as was said very recently in Estate of Conrad Iser, 198 Pac. 1014:

"To justify us in holding that the court below erred to the prejudice of appellants in its allowance of attorney's fees for professional services rendered by appellants in the action referred to, we must be prepared to say that such allowance is, upon its face, so far out of proportion to the value of the services rendered as to constitute the making of the order of allowance a clear or manifest abuse of judicial discretion. After a painstaking consideration of the question thus propounded, we have not been able to satisfy ourselves that it can justly be held that the order complained of involved an abuse of the discretion with which trial courts are invested in disposing of such matters as the one now before us. If the application for the allowance of attorney's fees had been directly made before and the evidence directly heard by us, we might have ordered the payment of a fee in excess of that allowed. But we are here reviewing an order in the making of which, as is declared by the Supreme Court in Freese v. Pennie, 110 Cal. 467, 42 Pac. 978, the trial court is clothed with a 'large discretion,' which is always regulated or controlled by a showing directly made before the court to which it is committed."

The order appealed from is affirmed.

SUMMER v. NEW YORK LIFE INS. CO.

1. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1002—Verdict in action on life policy held to involve a weighing of conflicting testimony and cannot be disturbed, notwithstanding documentary evidence.

Verdict for plaintiff in an action on a life policy, involving a finding of seasonable mailing of a premium, held to necessitate a weighing of conflicting testimony of different witnesses and a determination of the credence to be accorded each, so that it cannot be disturbed on appeal, notwithstanding written testimony tending to contradict plaintiff's testimony, it not so corroborating that of defendant's witnesses as to conclusively contradict plaintiff's testimony, or impair it to such an extent as to compel conclusion that a finding based thereon was due to prejudice, rather than credence thereof.

2. Insurance $\hookrightarrow$ 665(3)—Evidence of seasonable mailing of premium sufficient.

Evidence for plaintiff in action on life policy, involving question of seasonable mailing of premium, held, notwithstanding that for defendant was exceedingly strong, sufficiently substantial to sustain a verdict for plaintiff.

3. Insurance $\hookrightarrow$ 360(1)—Life policy not forfeited by failure to pay interest, as well as premium, within 30 days after premium is due.

Under provision of life policy declaring a premium in default if not paid on or before the day it falls due, but allowing a grace of a month, subject to an interest charge of 5 per cent. per annum, for payment of the premium, during which time the insurance continues in force, the policy is not forfeited by failure to pay the interest, as well as the premium, during the month; interest, defined by Civ. Code, § 1915, in view of section 1919, not being considered as part of the premium in the absence of express agreement to that effect.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Morres Summer against the New York Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Meserve & Meserve and Shirley E. Meserve, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. A. Klein, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment entered upon verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff. The suit is brought upon a life insurance policy whereby the defendant corporation, New York Life Insurance Company, insured plaintiff, Morres Summer, and his wife, Sadie Summer, jointly, in the sum of $2,000, payable to the survivor upon proof of the death of either. Sadie Summer died on October 15, 1918, and plaintiff claims that he is entitled to the $2,000.

By the terms of the policy the insured agreed to pay $17.92 by way of premium, said sum to be paid quarterly in advance, commencing December 10, 1917, and the present controversy is concerned with the question as to whether plaintiff performed this particular prerequisite to the collection of insurance. The policy of insurance provided, in effect, that, upon the failure to pay a premium on the date when it became due, the policy was to continue in force during a definite period of grace, upon the expiration of which without payment being made the policy should become inoperative. The clause which deals with the period of grace is in the following words:

"If any premium is not paid on or before the day it falls due the policy holder is in default; but a grace of one month (not less than thirty days) subject to an interest charge of 5 per cent. per annum will be allowed for the payment of every premium after the first, during which time the insurance continues in force. If death occurs within the period of grace the unpaid premium for the then current insurance year will be deducted from the amount payable hereunder"

It is conceded by both parties that, up to September 10, 1918, plaintiff made all required payments, but the premium due on that date, to cover the three ensuing months, was not paid or tendered until some time during the month of October, 1918. Defendant contends that the check for the premium due September 10, 1918, was not mailed until after October 10, the day upon which the period of grace expired, and that, as a consequence, the policy was forfeited, and had ceased to operate at the time of the death of Sadie Summer on October 15. Practically all of the evidence adduced upon the trial of the case pertained to this issue.

It was customary for the defendant insurance company to send plaintiff a notice when the premium became due, and to inclose with the notice a self-addressed envelope. In the inclosed envelope plaintiff, in turn, mailed to defendant a check for the amount of the premium, receiving no receipt other than the canceled check. Plaintiff testified that he received a notice that a payment of premium was due September 10, 1918, and that, on the afternoon of October 4, 1918, he mailed a check for the sum of $17.92 in one of defendant's self-addressed envelopes. A canceled check to the order of the insurance company for that amount, signed by plaintiff, and bearing date October 4, 1918, was introduced in evidence and identified by plaintiff as the one mailed by him. Plaintiff further testified that, late in the afternoon of October 15, 1918, shortly after the death of his wife, he went to the place of business of a friend and stated that his wife had died. The bookkeeper at that place (who died before this case came to trial) had previously written checks in favor of the insurance company for plaintiff, including the one dated October 4. Upon hearing that plaintiff's wife had died, the bookkeeper informed plaintiff that he must notify the insurance company of that fact. Plaintiff asked the bookkeeper to write the notification, took the letter written at his request, and went home and placed it in one of defendant's envelopes, which he deposited in the same mail box in which he had mailed the check of October 4. This, in brief, is the plaintiff's case.

It is defendant's theory that the envelope mailed by plaintiff on the afternoon of October 15 contained the check dated October 4, and not the information concerning the wife's death. In support of this theory, the cashier of defendant's branch office at Los Angeles, who stated that he was in charge of all correspondence, testified that the check above mentioned was received at defendant's Los Angeles office on October 16, 1918, in an envelope postmarked "Bakersfield, October 15, 7 p. m. 1918," which was introduced in evidence. He also testified that the first notice of the death of Sadie Summer which reached his office was contained in a letter from plaintiff's attorney, dated October 25, 1918, and received October 26, 1918. Several letters were admitted in evidence in behalf of defendant.

[1, 2] Defendant contends that the verdict of the jury in plaintiff's favor rests upon a finding that the check was mailed prior to October 10, 1918, and that the preponderance of the evidence is against such a finding. Since a considerable portion of the evidence consists of written instruments, it is urged that this court is in as good a position as the jury to pass upon the weight of the evidence. When analyzed, however, it is apparent that the verdict of the jury necessitated a weighing of the conflicting testimony of different witnesses and a determination of the degree of credence to be accorded each which cannot be disturbed on appeal. The only material evidence in plaintiff's favor was plaintiff's testimony and the canceled check. Opposed to this evidence was the testimony of the cashier of defendant's Los Angeles office and of a postmaster, together with certain written instruments. We are of the opinion that the written evidence, while it tended to contradict the plaintiff's testimony, did not so corroborate the testimony of defendant's witnesses as to conclusively contradict plaintiff's testimony or impair it to such an extent as to compel the conclusion that a finding based thereon was due to prejudice against the defendant, rather than credence of the plaintiff. Thus, the letter written to the insurance company by plaintiff's attorney on October 25, 1918, reads as follows:

"This is to advise you that the insured, Sadie Summer, died, and her husband, Morris Summer, has requested me to so inform you of that fact and ask you to mail me the necessary papers to sign to establish the proof of death."

By this letter defendant sought to disprove plaintiff's statement that the envelope mailed by him on October 15, 1918, contained a notice to the company of his wife's death. It does not necessarily follow from the wording above quoted that the letter of October 25, 1918, contained the first notification of death. Inasmuch as this was the first appearance of plaintiff's attorney in the matter, it was not unnatural for him, in his capacity of attorney, to open the correspondence with a formal notice of death and application for papers necessary in the establishment of the proof of death, regardless of whether or not plaintiff himself had previously notified the company. In fact, it would seem that this communication was intended primarily as a notification that plaintiff had requested his attorney to act for him in attempting to collect the insurance. A letter from the insurance company to plaintiff dated October 21, 1918, was introduced for the purpose of showing that the company had received no notice of death up to that date, and that the check was received after October 10. In this letter defendant's agent acknowledged receipt of plaintiff's check, and stated that, as it had been remitted after the policy had lapsed, it would be necessary for plaintiff and his wife to sign the inclosed application for reinstatement. This letter is, however, not conclusive against the plaintiff. At the time the letter was written by defendant's agent, plaintiff's letter of October 15, containing the notice of death, may have been misplaced, or defendant's agent may have overlooked, or for some reason have been unaware of, the notice of death. These inferences the jury was entitled to draw.

Perhaps the strongest evidence in defendant's favor is the testimony of the postmaster to the effect that a letter deposited in the mail box mentioned by plaintiff after 3 o'clock in the afternoon of October 15, 1918, would, in all probability, bear the postmark "9 p. m.," instead of "7 p. m.," which was the hour stamped on the envelope mailed by plaintiff. Relying upon this testimony, defendant claims the envelope mailed October 15 must have been posted before 3 o'clock and therefore could not have contained notice of the death of Sadie Summer, which, according to the testimony of plaintiff, occurred about 4 o'clock. Inasmuch as plaintiff is not an educated man, nor thoroughly familiar with the English language, the jury may have concluded that he became confused in attempting to remember and state the exact hour of his wife's death and the precise moment of his arrival at the mail box. While we consider the evidence in defendant's behalf exceedingly strong, we nevertheless find that the evidence in support of plaintiff's case is sufficiently substantial to raise a conflict and sustain a verdict in his favor.

[3] Assuming the check to have been mailed on October 4, defendant contends that plaintiff failed to make payment as required by the policy. It will be noted that the policy provides for an interest charge on the premium, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, during the month of grace after the premium has become due. Plaintiff's check of October 4 was for $17.92, the amount of the quarterly premium. The interest thereon for the 24 days of grace was never requested by defendant nor paid by plaintiff. Defendant directs attention to this omission on plaintiff's part, claiming that it was essential to the continuance of the policy that the interest, as well as the premium, should be paid before the expiration of the period of grace.

Unless clearly justified by the language of the contract, we cannot hold the parties to have contracted that a policy carrying a quarterly premium of $17.92 should be forfeited upon a failure to pay a sum which, in this case, was less than 6 cents and which could, in no event, have amounted to more than 7 cents. That the defendant did not consider the policy as so providing is evidenced to some extent by previous conduct. For instance, the premium due June 10, 1918, was paid on June 24, 1918, and, although no interest was paid for the 2 weeks' delay, none was demanded, and the policy was not considered as forfeited.

"Provisions in an insurance policy are always construed so as to prevent a forfeiture, if the language will reasonably permit such a construction." O'Neill v. Caledonian Ins. Co., 166 Cal. 310, 315, 135 Pac. 1121, 1123; Welch v. British American, etc., Co., 148 Cal. 223, 82 Pac. 964, 113 Am. St. Rep. 223, 7 Ann. Cas. 396.

The policy provides:

"A grace of one month (not less than thirty days), subject to an interest charge of 5 per cent. per annum will be allowed for the payment of every premium after the first, during which time the insurance continues in force."

"Interest is the compensation allowed by law or fixed by the parties for the use, or forbearance, or detention of money." Civ. Code, § 1915.

It cannot be considered a part of the principal, or basic fund, unless the parties expressly agree to do so (Civ. Code, § 1919), and, since there is no such agreement in the instant case, the words "premium" and "interest," appearing in the above quotation, must be regarded as separate and distinct terms. While it is clearly intended that the policy shall lapse upon the failure to pay the premium within the month of grace, no such intent is manifest in the event of a failure to pay interest. Assuming that the interest may be regarded as due and payable at the same time as the premium on which it is charged, it does not follow that the provision with respect to forfeiture attaching to the failure to pay the premium within the month of grace attaches likewise, to the omission to pay the interest when due. The grace of one month is allowed for the payment of the "premium" and, in the absence of a more specific provision concerning the acts required of the defaulting policy holder during the time the insurance continues in force, there is a natural implication that the payment of the premium within the period of grace will prevent a lapse of the policy. Since reason does not require that the language of the policy be construed as prescribing a forfeiture upon failure to pay interest within the month of grace, it will not be accorded that interpretation.

Upon the record before us, it must be held that there was no lapse of the policy prior to the death of the insured. The judgment in favor of plaintiff is therefore affirmed.

Where one riding a motorcycle did not exercise proper care in looking before crossing a highway, and was injured by an automobile, evidence held to support a jury finding of contributory negligence.

2. Appeal and error ☞1170(9) — Error in question submitting special issue held not prejudicial.

Where, in the submission of a special issue as to whether an injured person was guilty of negligence contributing directly or proximately to his injury, the word "approximately" was used instead of "proximately" but various other instructions required the jury, if they found contributory negligence, to find that it was the proximate cause of the injuries, and an instruction defining "proximate cause" was given, the error is not prejudicial under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by the State Compensation Insurance Fund against Carl Jorn. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Abrahams and P. B. D'Orr, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

F. C. Drumm, of Orange, and H. C. Head, of Santa Ana, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. The plaintiff, an insurance carrier under the Workmen's Compensation Law of California for the employer of one Earl Summers, paid compensation to Summers for injuries received by him in an automobile accident. The injuries inflicted were alleged to be the result of the negligent driving of his automobile by the defendant here, Carl Jorn, and the insurer claims subrogation to the rights of the injured party under the compensation law (Act 1913, p. 279, §§ 31, 34f).

The judgment was in favor of the defendant, and plaintiff appeals. One of the issues presented by the pleadings was contributory negligence on the part of Summers. A special verdict was submitted and returned by the jury against the plaintiff on this issue. If this finding of contributory negligence can be sustained under the instructions and the evidence, it is conclusive in support of the verdict, and the judgment must be affirmed.

Appellant attacks the finding of the special verdict on two grounds: First, that the evidence is insufficient to show contributory negligence; second, that there was prejudicial error in the instructions of the court upon that issue.

The undisputed facts, as shown by the record, are that Summers, at the close of his day's work upon the ranch of his employer, had occasion to ride a motorcycle across a public highway which intervened between the field where he had been at work and the ranch house. This highway extended north and south. He approached it from along a roadway leading into the highway from the east, and was attempting to cross the highway to a driveway near the house on the opposite or westerly side of the highway. The entrance to this driveway connected with the highway at a short distance north of the point of intersection of the road on which he approached the crossing. According to his own testimony, he looked up and down the highway as he entered upon it, and saw no vehicle excepting a wagon drawn by a team of horses or mules, which was coming from the south, and about 40 or 50 feet from where he entered the highway. He claims that he entered upon the highway, veered his motorcycle slightly to the right toward the north, so as to come opposite to the entrance to the driveway, and then crossed to the left toward his destination, when he was run into by an automobile driven by the defendant, which suddenly came upon him at a rapid rate of speed from the south, and on the westerly side of the highway, within a few feet of the entrance to the driveway. He testifies that he saw nothing of the automobile until it was fairly upon him.

The defendant's account of the accident is that he came up the road from the south driving his automobile at a rate of about 22 miles an hour; that as he approached the wagon referred to he turned to the left to pass it; he saw the employee, Summers, enter the highway from the east and turn his motorcycle to the north, and going at a speed of about 10 miles an hour; that he supposed the motorcyclist was going on up the highway toward the north, and that he continued to the left, intending to pass him; that suddenly, without giving any signal or warning, the motorcycle was turned to the left, and ran into defendant's machine, with the resultant injuries to the rider. The defendant's version of the occurrence is corroborated by the testimony of a companion who was with him in the automobile.

[1] We think under this state of the testimony the jury was justified in finding in favor of the defendant on the issue of contributory negligence. The conflict in the evidence, if there is any, must be resolved in support of the verdict. The fact, as testified to by the employee himself, that he crossed the intersection of the highway without seeing this approaching automobile, is a circumstance against him. The view to the south was unobstructed but for the team and wagon, and this could have obscured an automobile approaching at a rapid speed but for an instant. He did not take a second look, and did not become aware of the automobile until it was upon him. His course, as testified to by defendant and his witness, was such as to justify them in the conclusion that he was going north on the highway, and his turn to the left to enter the driveway, without again looking, and without a signal, was evidence of negligence upon which the jury could properly base its verdict and special finding.

It might be questioned, under the evidence in this case, if actionable negligence existed on the part of the defendant, but that becomes immaterial in view of the finding that the injured employee contributed proximately to the accident by his own negligence.

[2] The second assignment of error bearing upon the finding of contributory negligence arises upon an instruction of the court in submitting the special issue to the jury. This issue was submitted in the following words:

"Was Earl Summers guilty of negligence that contributed directly or approximately to the collision?"

The use of the word "approximately" for "proximately" was doubtless a clerical error. Standing alone it might be misleading and prejudicial. But the court had just previously instructed the jury that the pleadings had "raised the issue that the said Earl Summers contributed to the direct and proximate cause of said accident by his own negligence," and as to what facts under the testimony they could consider in reaching a verdict on that point, and that if they found such to be the facts, and that they contributed "directly or proximately" to the collision, then they should find said Summers guilty of contributory negligence.

Elsewhere in the instructions the jurors were told, as to alleged negligence of the defendant, that "lack of ordinary care, which is the proximate cause of the injury," constitutes grounds of recovery, and that he would be liable for the injury if his acts were the "direct and proximate cause thereof," and proximate cause was defined as "negligence at the time of the injury which was its direct and controlling cause."

In view of the many references in the instructions to "direct and proximate cause of the injury" as the basis of liability, it is altogether improbable that the jurors were misled by this error, even if they noticed the variation in the terms used. In common parlance the two words, "proximate" and "approximate," are used interchangeably, and the dictionaries give them as synonyms. It is true, however, that the word "proximate" has a distinct and separate legal significance; but, in view of the explicit instructions making the negligence to depend upon the "proximate" cause, the jury could not well have been misled by the substitution of the word "approximate" in the submission of the special issue. The courts have frequently held such an interchange of these terms in instructions without prejudice. Brooks v. Muncie & P. Tr. Co., 176 Ind. 298, 95 N. E. 1008; Choctaw O. & T. Ry. Co. v. McLaughlin, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 523, 96 S. W. 1091; Pledger v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 69 Neb. 456, 95 N. W. 1060.

In the absence of any showing of actual misleading of the jury, the error complained of may be properly disregarded, under section 4½, art. 6, of the Constitution.

In the face of the finding on this special verdict, the general verdict of the jury could have been no other than it was, and it is unnecessary to pass upon the several assignments of error involving the various rights and liabilities of the parties arising under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

The judgment is affirmed.

FURLOW PRESSED BRICK CO. v. BALBOA LAND & WATER CO. et al. (L. A. 6710.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 29, 1921.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 26, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ☞110—Appeal from order granting new trial, where trial was by judge, unauthorized.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, as amended in 1915, providing for an appeal from an order granting a new trial in an action or proceeding tried by jury as a matter of right, and section 956, providing that the court may also, on appeal from the judgment, review any order on motion for new trial, no appeal lies from an order granting a new trial where there had been no trial by jury.

2. Appeal and error ☞870(6) — Appeal from order granting new trial may not be considered on appeal from second judgment.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 956, as amended in 1915, providing that the court may, on appeal, review any order on motion for new trial, where the entire case was tried de novo on the new trial, the order granting a new trial cannot be considered on appeal from the judgment on the second trial.

3. Appeal and error ☞870(6)—Order granting new trial on certain issues may be reviewed on appeal from judgment.

Where the order granting a new trial confines the order to certain issues, or, in some other way, enters into and affects the final determination of the case, it can be reviewed on appeal from the judgment, and it is only such orders granting new trials that can be considered on appeal from the second judgment.

4. Limitation of actions — 29(1)—Open book account barred in four years.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337, 339, as amended in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 299), the period of limitation for actions on open book accounts is four, and not two, years.

5. Limitation of actions — 53(1) — Against open, mutual, and current account statute runs from the date of the last item.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 2, setting the limitation of actions on a mutual, open, and current account at four years, the time when the statute commenced to run is the date of the last item shown in the account.

6. Limitation of actions — 53(2)—Statute held to put a book account on the basis of an open account.

Under the amendment of Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 2, to include an open book account, the statute begins to run in case of an open book account on the date of the entry of the last item.

7. Limitation of actions — 159 — Statute is tolled by payment made and entered on open book account.

Since the Legislature fixed a different period of limitations in case of an open book account and an ordinary account, a payment made and entered upon the open book account tolls the statute, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 360, requiring a written acknowledgment to toll the statute.

8. Limitation of actions — 29(4)—Partner having power to bind others by book account for goods used in partnership business, such account held an open book account.

Where a partner was intrusted with the management of business of the other partners and opened a book account for goods to be used in partnership business which were charged in his name, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 2428, 2429, giving a partner power to bind his co-partners in writing in the transaction of partnership business, the account so kept is an open book account as to the other partners within the statute of limitations.

9. Limitation of actions — 143(3)—Partner's letter held to be sufficient acknowledgment of indebtedness to toll the statute.

Where partner intrusted with the carrying on of partnership business wrote a letter, the letter head of which contained the names of all the partners, and acknowledged indebtedness in language indicating that it was a partnership indebtedness, the letter tolled the statute of limitations with respect to all the partners under Code Civ. Proc. § 360, requiring an acknowledgment "signed by the party to be charged thereby."

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by the Furlow Pressed Brick Company, a corporation, against the Balboa Land & Water Company, a corporation, and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed by the District Court of Appeal, and on hearing in the Supreme Court judgment of superior court reversed.

Simpson & Simpson, of Pasadena, for appellant.

W. N. Goodwin and Goodwin & Morgrage, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. This is an action to recover from the defendant Balboa Land & Water Company, alleged to be a corporation, but in fact a partnership, E. J. Louis, J. P. Greeley, E. E. Richardson, and E. W. Beckwith, a balance of $808.15 upon an open book account for brick and mineral ore sold by the plaintiff to defendants for a building being erected by them at Balboa. The case was decided against the plaintiff on the statute of limitations. The original complaint was filed April 19, 1917, but was superseded by an amended complaint served on defendants May 9, 1918, and filed on May 15, 1918, the date of the first trial. It was stipulated that the defendants might answer thereto at any time prior to May 15th. The answer was filed May 17, 1918. The answer contained a general denial and alleged that the claim was barred by subdivision 2, § 337, and subdivision 1, § 339, Code of Civil Procedure.

Before the first trial, on April 15, 1918, a written agreement had been entered into between the parties stipulating that the only issues in the action to be determined by the court were:

"First, the question as to whether or not the statute of limitations is a bar to the cause of action set up in plaintiff's complaint; second, a determination of the quantity of brick sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendants, which latter question by said stipulation was to be determined by two referees selected by the parties."

The referees filed their report, and it was stipulated in open court to be correct. The cause was then submitted upon the statute of limitations. The court decided that the action was not barred and gave judgment for the plaintiff for $808.15 and interest amounting to $287.09. Thereafter, a motion for a new trial was made by the defendants and granted. The new trial was had on the 26th day of November, 1918. It was also stipulated that the cause of action set forth in the second count was set up for the first time in the amended complaint filed May 15, 1918. On the new trial the plaintiff offered in evidence the stipulation of April 15, 1918, as to the issues between the parties. The defendants objected to the use of the stipulation as evidence on the ground that after it had been entered into the complaint had been amended and for the first time set forth the cause of action contained in the second count thereof. Plaintiff insisted that the trial be conducted in accordance with the stipulation, but the court refused the request and made an order releasing defendants from the stipulation and sustaining defendants' objection thereto. The court apparently acted solely upon the theory that there had been a change in the pleadings which justified the rejection of the stipulation. It appears, however, that the stipulation had been used on the previous trial, after the amendment of the complaint. The original complaint is not set out in the transcript, but it is fairly inferable from the stipulation and from the evidence on the trial that the original complaint was to recover for the purchase price of the same brick and ore. The plaintiff did not ask for a continuance on the ground of surprise at the ruling of the court, and introduced other evidence in support of its claim. At the close of the plaintiff's evidence the defendants' motion for a nonsuit was granted. Findings of fact and conclusions of law were made wherein it was found that the Balboa Land & Water Company was not a corporation; that the allegations of the amended complaint were untrue. The court further found that plaintiff's cause of action was barred by subdivision 1, § 339, and subdivision 2, § 337, Code of Civil Procedure. Thereupon, judgment was rendered that plaintiff take nothing by the action and purporting to dismiss the action.

It appears from the record that the original controversy between the parties was as to whether or not all the brick the plaintiff claimed to have shipped to defendants had been delivered to them, the defendants claiming that there was one carload short. There was never any question as to the correctness of the account except as to the amount of brick actually delivered to defendants. On this subject E. J. Louis, who acted on behalf of the other defendants, testified that he had checked over the accounts and had satisfied himself that they were correct, with the possible exception of one carload of brick, and that they were unable to determine whether that carload of brick was received by the defendants. The Balboa Land & Water Company was not a corporation, but was an association or copartnership composed of E. J. Louis, E. W. Beckwith, J. P. Greeley, and E. E. Richardson. E. J. Louis testified that he had acted as general manager in conducting the affairs of the defendants in the construction of the building at Balboa, and that practically all correspondence, payments of money, etc., had been taken care of by him or had passed through his hands. It appears that a Mr. Butler called up the president of the plaintiff corporation and left an order on behalf of the defendant Balboa Land & Water Company, for the shipment of seven cars of sand lime brick to the Balboa Land & Water Company. Mr. Butler informed the plaintiff that the defendants were all interested in the Balboa Land & Water Company; that thereupon the president of the plaintiff corporation made in the account-book of the plaintiff corporation the following entry: "Mch. 25-13. E. J. Louis, Sec. Balboa Land & Water Company, Balboa. Main 2217. I. W. Hellman Bldg. Ship 7 cars sand lime brick No. 1, 19.70. No. 2, 11.70. 1st car about Tuesday"—and thereafter entries were made in the books of the plaintiff showing shipments of six cars of brick. In each item the name of E. J. Louis is entered, together with the character of brick and the price per thousand. The last item of brick furnished is April 19, 1913. On April 15, 1913, a charge for "mineral ore" amounting to $36.50 was entered in the books. The following payments were entered in the account: "January 19, 1913, Cash, $700, August 4, 1913, $220, August 13, 1914, $100." Evidence was given that the payment of August 4, 1913, was by the personal check of defendant E. W. Beckwith, mailed to the plaintiff by E. J. Louis, and the payment of August 13, 1914, was by the personal check of E. J. Louis. Certain letters were written by E. J. Louis to the plaintiff in connection with the account. A letter of August 12, 1914, accompanying the check for $100, above referred to, addressed to the plaintiff and signed by E. J. Louis is as follows:

"Inclosed please find check #401 in the sum of $100.00, which kindly credit for the brick furnished for the Balboa building, sending receipt to me."

A letter dated October 27, 1914, addressed to the plaintiff, signed by E. J. Louis, stated that the discrepancy of one carload of brick was being considered; that the associates would meet and try to determine what had become of the disputed carload of brick. He closed as follows:

"We are just as anxious to clear this matter up as you can be, only we want to be sure we are not going to pay for something we did not get, and we feel quite sure you do not wish us to do otherwise."

On November 13, 1914, under the letter head of the Balboa Land & Water Company, which letter head showed the names of all the defendants, E. J. Louis addressed the plaintiff admitting the receipt of five carloads of brick and stated that three were unaccounted for, and adding:

"The writer wishes to co-operate with you in every way to expedite the adjustment of this account, and hopes you will exercise just a little bit more patience and he believes it will be done."

On November 19, 1914, E. J. Louis addressed to plaintiff another letter saying that one carload, number 5085, had not been delivered to them, and stating:

"I am sending a copy of this letter to Balboa and hope that we are on the track of these deliveries, and that we will be able to determine very shortly who received the brick."

On November 24, 1914, a letter was addressed by E. J. Louis to plaintiff's attorneys, in which he states:

"I incline to believe that Mr. Wold [plaintiff's president], under whose instructions you are acting, wants nothing more than is due him, and so far as we are concerned we want to pay every dollar which we are justly owing."

The letter then proposed that Mr. Wold meet with them on the Sunday next in order to determine the amount of the claim due, and concludes as follows:

"If we can then agree on the correct amount, I firmly believe the matter of settlement can be adjusted. Hoping that no unnecessary expense will be incurred, I remain, Very truly, E. J. Louis."

On December 29, 1914, another letter was addressed by Mr. Louis to plaintiff's attorneys stating among other things as follows:

"We wish to reiterate that it is our desire to pay your client for every brick which we used or sold for their account and which is in keeping with our arrangement in the early part of 1913, and can be disclosed by correspondence on file in our office, and, we assume, as well in that of your client."

Then follows the suggestion that the attorneys of the respective parties get together and fix the amount due.

[1] Appellant's first contention is that the trial court was in error in granting the defendants' motion for a new trial after the first judgment in the case. Section 963, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1915 provides for an appeal "from an order granting a new trial in an action or proceeding tried by a jury where such trial by jury is a matter of right," but does not provide for an appeal from an order granting a new trial after trial by the court sitting without a jury. Section 956, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that—

"Upon an appeal from a judgment the court may review the verdict or decision, and any intermediate ruling, proceeding, order or decision which involves the merits or necessarily affects the judgment, or which substantially affects the rights of a party. The court may also on such appeal review any order on motion for a new trial. The provisions of this section do not authorize the court to review any decision or order from which an appeal might have been taken."

The second sentence was added by the amendment of 1915, so that after that amendment in order to review an order denying a motion for a new trial it was necessary to do so by an appeal from the judgment. It is contended that the order granting the new trial in this case was erroneous for the reason that the questions raised by the motion were questions of law which could have been determined by a motion to amend the conclusions of law and for judgment upon the findings (section 659, Code Civ. Proc.), or an appeal from the judgment, and that for that reason the order granting the new trial was erroneous. It may be conceded that the questions raised upon the motion for a new trial were not proper subjects for consideration upon such a motion and that the order granting the new trial was therefore erroneous. The question is whether or not upon an appeal from the second judgment rendered upon the second trial the error in granting the motion for a new trial can be reviewed. The purpose of the amendment to sections 956 and 953, Code of Civil Procedure, with reference to appeals from orders granting or denying motions for new trial, was to expedite the business of the courts and avoid delays incident to appeals. Previous to that amendment orders granting motions for new trials were so largely discretionary with the trial court that an order granting a new trial was rarely reversed. As a result most appeals from such orders merely served to delay the final trial of the case. It was evidently thought by the Legislature to be more expeditious and economical to do away with the appeal from the order granting a new trial where there had been no trial jury and thus to allow the parties to try the case de novo than to permit such appeals.

[2, 3] If appellant's point that the order granting a new trial was erroneous can be considered upon an appeal from the second judgment where the order granting a new trial set the whole case at large, then, as is made evident by this appeal, there is a double chance of reversing a case where a new trial has been granted because the errors on both trials can be considered. We think this is an erroneous view of the law. While the second sentence of section 956, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1915, providing that the court may, on an appeal from the judgment, review any order on motion for a new trial, is broad enough, considered alone, to justify the court in reviewing the order granting the new trial in every case, we think it apparent from the entire context and purpose of section 956, taken in connection with the scheme for appeal adopted by the Legislature in 1915, that it was not intended that any order granting a new trial should be reviewed unless it affects the second judgment and where the entire case is tried de novo, the order granting a new trial could not affect the judgment, however much it might affect the parties to the action. Where the order granting a new trial confines the order to certain issues, or, in some other way, enters into and affects the final determination of the case, it could no doubt be reviewed upon an appeal from the judgment, and it was only such orders granting a new trial that can be considered on an appeal from the second judgment. In this connection it is proper to say that the parties apparently concede that the order granting the new trial in this case can be thus reviewed and therefore discuss the merits of the order granting a new trial. The District Court of Appeal (second District, First Division) held that the motion was improperly granted and ordered the first judgment restored. The case was transferred to this court because the assumption of the parties and of the District Court of Appeal, although the latter was justified by the remission of the respondents, was fundamentally erroneous and might lead to a misapprehension of the proper practice in such cases.

The Statute of Limitations.

[4] The amended complaint was filed within four years after the last payment upon the account, and if the statute of limitations begins to run at the time of the last payment the suit was brought in time. In this action appellant seems to be laboring under a misapprehension as to the effect of the amendment of 1917, for appellant admits that by that amendment of sections 337 and 339, Code of Civil Procedure, the statute of limitations upon the account in question was shortened to two years. Respondents are correct in their position that the period of limitation under section 337, subd. 2, Code of Civil Procedure, both prior and subsequent to the amendment of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 299), is four years on an open book account. The cause of action upon which the plaintiff seeks to recover was expressly alleged to be upon an open book account. Respondents' contention that the four-year period had elapsed at the time suit was brought is based upon the following line of reasoning: First, that the statutes of limitations upon an ordinary account is two years under section 339, Code of Civil Procedure; that the amount in question did not become an open book account within the meaning of subdivision 2, § 337, until the first payment was made thereon, to wit, on June 19, 1913 (Merchants' Collection Agency v. Ben Levi, 32 Cal. App. 595, 163 Pac. 870); that the account then became an "open" book account and the balance then due became a "balance due * * * upon an open book account," within the meaning of section 337, subd. 2, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 599), and that it was barred in four years from June 19, 1913 (section 337, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc.); that the subsequent payments, August 4, 1913, and August 13, 1914, were but partial payments upon a "balance due * * * upon an open book account" and did not, therefore, have an effect upon the running of the statute of limitations. Respondents' position cannot be maintained.

[5-7] The rule has long been settled in this state with reference to "a mutual, open and current account" mentioned in subdivision 2, § 337, Code of Civil Procedure, that the statute runs from the date of the last item shown in the account. Carter v. Canty, 181 Cal. 749, 186 Pac. 346. The evident purpose of the amendment, subdivision 2, § 337, Code of Civil Procedure, was to put an open book account upon the same basis. Such an account is differentiated from an open, mutual, and current account solely by the fact that to constitute an open, mutual, and current account it was necessary that items other than cash appear as credits upon the account, whereas, in an open book account cash payments alone are sufficient to characterize the account as an "open book account." If we apply the rule so well established as to "a mutual, open, and current account," it would follow that the four-year period of limitations runs from the date of the last payment, in this case August 13, 1914. In most of the states a partial payment upon an account tolls the statute. The rule is otherwise in this state, because of section 360, Code of Civil Procedure, requiring a written acknowledgment, but it is a reasonable construction of the legislation fixing a different period of limitation upon an "open book account" from an ordinary account to hold that the payment made and entered upon the open book account tolls the statute. It follows that the statute of limitations began to run on this account on August 13, 1914, and that the amended complaint filed May 15, 1918, was within the four years.

With reference to the contention of the respondent that there is no sufficient evidence as to the price of the brick furnished, and hence that the nonsuit was proper, it is sufficient to call attention to the testimony of E. J. Louis that the accounts were correct with the exception of the question at issue, namely, the delivery of one carload of brick.

[8] We have not thus far discussed the proposition that the account was charged on the books to E. J. Louis, one of the partners, and that the names of the other partners nowhere appear on the account. In Wright v. Loaiza, 177 Cal. 605, 171 Pac. 311, suit was brought upon an open book account consisting of one item for funeral expenses. It appeared that this item had been charged upon the books of Wright against W. Y. Loaiza, the defendant, and it was attempted by the action to charge his sister, Dolores Loaiza, upon said account after two years had elapsed. It was held that the action could not be maintained against her, although he was authorized by the appellant Dolores to incur the indebtedness, for the reason that the "open book account" was not a charge against her. The court there stated:

"It may fairly be assumed that the idea underlying the enactment of both subdivisions of this section was that a longer period of limitation might well be allowed where the existence of the claim sued upon was supported by some kind of written evidence. Where, on the other hand, the establishment of the contract rests on oral testimony only, the law requires the action to be brought before the lapse of time may prevent the production of witnesses, or impair their memories. If this view be correct, the action against Dolores must be regarded as one upon an oral contract, and not one upon a book account. There is no account or other writing which in any way indicates her liability. To connect her with the transactions at all, resort must be had to parol testimony."

It was therefore held that the period of limitation had expired as to her.

Following this line of reasoning, the account in this case was not an open book account within the meaning of the statute as to any one except the defendant E. J. Louis, unless the fact that he is a partner and that the indebtedness is a partnership indebtedness differentiates this case from the rule announced in Wright v. Loaiza, supra. No question is raised as to the authority of the partner E. J. Louis to bind the partnership. Not only did he have express authority, as he testified, but the law expressly authorized him to act for and bind the copartnership in the transaction of its business and for that purpose to bind the copartners by an agreement in writing. Civ. Code, §§ 2428, 2429. A partnership may be held for an indebtedness entered into on behalf of the partnership in the individual partner's name (39 Cyc. 485), and this is true even if he has given his individual note for such indebtedness. Beckwith v. Mace, 140 Mich. 157, 103 N. W. 559. The only question involved here is whether the account in question is an open book account upon which the statute of limitations does not run for four years against the other partners where the partnership account is inadvertently, or as a matter of convenience, charged to one partner only. The reasons leading to the decision in Wright v. Loaiza, supra, as to the proof by parol of an agency to enter into the account do not apply. Here the fact of partnership may be readily proven and the circumstances showing the nature of the indebtedness are readily susceptible of proof and do not usually depend solely upon parol evidence as to the nature of the transaction. It was clearly proper to show that the indebtedness was a partnership one, and the fact that it was charged on the plaintiff's books to one of the partners was sufficient to constitute it a book account within the meaning of our Code.

In this connection it is proper to note that, in addition to the testimony of E. J. Louis that the business transactions with reference to the erection of the brick building were carried on by him, defendant J. P. Greeley testified that there was no written agreement between the parties to the association known as the Balboa Land & Water Company and that he and his associates had permitted the defendant E. J. Louis to attend to matters of business for them and had made no complaint of any of his acts in connection therewith; that he knew that there was a claim asserted against the association by the plaintiff, but knew very little about it. Defendant E. E. Richardson testified that he was a member of the association and that he was not personally present at any time during the construction of the building at Balboa and knew very little about it; that he had informed his associates that he was willing to abide by whatever action was taken by them in regard to the property; that he knew that E. J. Louis was attending to matters of detail in connection therewith; that he made no objection to any action taken by his associates. It appears from the correspondence between the parties that all the negotiations with reference to the account were carried on by E. J. Louis in his own name and that in all this correspondence he purported to be representing his associates. We thus have a case where one member of a partnership carries on the business in his own name with the consent of his associates and contracts a partnership indebtedness in his own name. It is true that the partners are in a sense agents for one another, but they also have power to act for and on behalf of the partnership, and when they act in partnership business the partnership acts. The partnership is regarded for some purposes as an entity. 30 Cyc. 422.

[9] The trial court rejected the letter of November 13, 1914, on the letter head of the Balboa Land & Water Company, above referred to, except as evidence of the relationship of the defendants. It was rejected as evidence of an acknowledgment of indebtedness. The letter clearly refers to the partnership indebtedness, as such, in the following sentence:

"Personally the writer wishes to see this matter cleaned up at the earliest moment possible, but at the same time, unless delivery can be proven he does not feel that the account should be paid, and our company fight it out with the Pacific Electric." (Italics ours.)

Reference is here made to three cars then in dispute, the delivery of five cars being admitted in the letter. In the inclosure in the letter, a copy of a letter addressed to the Pacific Electric Railroad Company, the plural pronoun is repeatedly used as indicating the consignee of the cars of brick, and closes with the request to "advise us promptly, as we wish to arrive at a settlement with the Furlow Pressed Brick Company, but cannot do so until we have your reply." This acknowledgment was clearly admissible against defendant E. J. Louis. He also had authority to bind the copartnership by his acknowledgment made in the course of business before the statute had run and before dissolution of the copartnership. Sears v. Starbird, 78 Cal. 225, 229, 20 Pac. 547. The only question remaining is whether it is an acknowledgment "signed by the party to be charged thereby" within the meaning of section 360, Code of Civil Procedure, sufficient to start another four-year period under our statute of limitations as against his copartners. In the case of Union Oil Company of Cal. v. Purissima Hills Oil Company, 181 Cal. 479, 185 Pac. 381, a letter signed by the president of a corporation, written upon the letter head of the corporation, was held sufficient where the president had authority to incur the indebtedness and his name was shown on the letter head as president. In the case at bar the names of the four partners were shown upon the letter head, as well as the name of the copartnership; thus the authority of E. J. Louis to bind the copartnership was shown upon the face of the letter, as well as the fact that he was acting for the copartnership in writing the letter. The acknowledgment was therefore sufficient to bind the copartnership upon the authority of Union Oil Co. v. Purissima, supra. See, also, Auzerais v. Naglee, 74 Cal. 60, 69, 15 Pac. 371.

property transferred to third person not party to proceeding.

An order of the bankruptcy court directing a receiver to take possession of the property of the estate does not extend to property transferred by the bankrupt to a third person, who was not a party to the proceeding in which the order was made, and had no notice or opportunity to be heard, in view of Const. Cal. art. 1, § 13, and Const. U. S. Amends. 5 and 14, § 1, relative to due process of law.

2. Bankruptcy §115—Property held not surrendered to receiver voluntarily.

Where the agents of a receiver in bankruptcy secretly entered and took possession of a hotel, which had been transferred by the bankrupt, and obtained the keys by threats of contempt proceedings, the property was not surrendered voluntarily to the receiver, and the seizure being unauthorized, he was liable as a trespasser, though no force was used.

3. Bankruptcy §115—Payment of earnings of illegally seized property by receiver to trustee according to an order of referee does not relieve receiver of liability.

Where the earnings of plaintiff's property illegally seized by a receiver in bankruptcy were paid to the trustee, in pursuance of an order of the referee directing such payment, obtained without notice to, or appearance by, plaintiff, the receiver is not relieved from liability for making an illegal seizure.

4. Bankruptcy §115—Application of owner of illegally seized property for its return does not waive his right to sue for its earnings while detained.

Where a hotel was illegally seized by a receiver in bankruptcy, the fact that the owner subsequently applied to the bankruptcy court for the release of his property did not prevent him from suing in a state court to recover the income of his property while it was detained; that relief not having been asked in the application to the bankruptcy court.

5. Bankruptcy §115—Exemplary damages for unlawful seizure of property by receiver in bankruptcy held not justified.

Where a receiver in bankruptcy illegally seized property, but acted in good faith and in belief that the order under which the seizure was made applied to the property, and was not guilty of using actual force and violence in the seizure, he is not liable for exemplary damages.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Action by the Fidelity Savings & Loan Association against the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

G. Harold Janeway, Hunsaker, Britt & Edwards, Robert B. Murphy, and Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Milton K. Young and L. L. Young, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment. The complaint is voluminous, but, in effect, it sets forth a cause of action against the defendant for damages for wrongfully, unlawfully, and oppressively seizing and holding possession of a hotel known as Hotel Schuyler, which was then a going concern and was then the property of the plaintiff. Judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,503.59, which the court found the defendant had received from the patrons of the hotel during the time it was in possession thereof, and for an additional sum of $500 allowed as exemplary damages.

In support of the appeal it is claimed that the evidence does not support the findings or judgment in several material particulars. The decision of these points depends in great measure on questions of law, there being little conflict in the evidence. The main defense is that the defendant was lawfully authorized to take and hold possession of the hotel under and by virtue of an order of the referee in bankruptcy of the United States District Court appointing it receiver of the assets and property of Hotel Schuyler, a corporation, which had been adjudged a bankrupt on its own petition by said court on May 24, 1916. The evidence shows that said corporation was duly adjudged a bankrupt on that day, that the matter was duly referred to the referee in bankruptcy, and that the referee, on May 26, 1916, by an ex parte order, on the petition of alleged creditors of said bankrupt, made an order appointing the defendant receiver of the estate of said bankrupt, authorizing it as such receiver "to take possession of, hold, preserve, care for, secure, and inventory the property of said bankrupt estate until the appointment and qualification of the trustee hereinafter to be chosen, and with the further authority to collect all accounts receivable of said bankrupt," and to operate the business of said bankrupt.

Under the authority of this order the defendant, on May 27, 1916, took from the plaintiff the possession of said hotel and held possession thereof until June 12, 1916, on which day it delivered possession thereof to one Levin, who had been elected trustee in bankruptcy of said bankrupt corporation. On June 14, 1916, the trustee, in pursuance of an order of said United States District Court, restored to plaintiff the possession of said hotel. During the time the defendant held possession as aforesaid as receiver it conducted the hotel business therein, and in so doing took and received money belonging to the plaintiff amounting to $1,503.59, which it has not returned or repaid to the plaintiff. At the time the receiver thus took possession of the hotel the plaintiff had been in possession thereof, and had been carrying on the hotel business therein on its own behalf, ever since November, 1915. It had been put in possession thereof by said Hotel Schuyler Corporation by reason of the plaintiff's rights thereto under a deed of trust executed to it by said bankrupt corporation for the securing of debts of said corporation amounting to $140,000. Afterwards, on January 26, 1916, the matter was adjusted by a deed executed by said Hotel Schuyler, a corporation, to the plaintiff, and conveying to it the remaining rights of said Hotel Schuyler in and to said hotel and the furniture and furnishings therein.

[1] For the purposes of this case, it may be conceded that the referee in bankruptcy had power to make an ex parte order directing that a receiver be appointed in the bankruptcy proceeding to take and hold possession of any and all property belonging to the bankrupt at the time of the adjudication. The decision of this case does not depend on the existence of such power. The case made by the plaintiff is that it was the owner of the property of which the receiver took possession, and that the bankrupt corporation, Hotel Schuyler, did not at that time have either the possession, or the right of possession of that property. While the order was good against the bankrupt and those holding as its agents or servants, it was made ex parte and it was not enforceable against third persons holding possession of property once owned by said bankrupt, under transfers made by the bankrupt to them which were valid under the bankrupt law. The plaintiff was not a party to the proceeding, nor to the application for the appointment of the defendant as receiver therein, and it was not bound thereby.

The receiver could not justify under an order made in that manner. It was in no better position than a sheriff, who makes a levy on property in the possession of a third person, belonging to such third person, and to which the attachment or execution defendant has neither title nor right of possession. It was a mere trespasser. An attack upon a seizure so made is not a collateral attack upon the order appointing the receiver. That is conceded to be valid. The real contention, and it is well taken, is that the seizure was not within the authority conferred by the order; that the property which it gave authority to take and hold was the property of the bankrupt, not that of third persons. The right of the plaintiff to keep possession of the hotel could not be divested, except by an order made in a proceeding to which it was a party, and in which it had been given an opportunity to be heard. To take it in any other manner would be to deprive it of its property without due process of law, a thing forbidden both by our own Constitution (article 1, § 13) and by the Constitution of the United States (Amends. art. 5, and article 14, § 1).

The Constitution of the United States, by article 5 aforesaid, withholds from the Congress the power to enact a law authorizing such taking of property. It is true that the bankrupt law authorizes a provisional summary seizure of property by order of the court where a creditor, or the trustee, after his appointment, alleges facts showing that the person in possession holds it under an unlawful preference to a creditor, or in virtue of a transfer made to defraud the creditors of the bankrupt, and that the seizure of such property is necessary for the preservation of the estate. Such seizure has been held to be authorized by sections 2, 3, 60, and 69 of the act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 9586, 9587, 9644, 9653). In such cases the property is taken for the purpose of holding and preserving it until the final order in the matter and the law provides for adequate security to the adverse claimant if the facts alleged are not established at the hearing. But no proceeding to obtain such an order was begun in the bankruptcy proceeding here in question, and no such order was made by that court. In no other manner does the act purport to authorize the taking of property in the bankrupt proceeding in the adverse possession of a third person, before such person is brought in by process and is given an opportunity to defend. Loveland on Bkcy., p. 100; Remington on Bkcy., §§ 1652, 1696. It is also true that it has been held that the court may in the bankruptcy proceeding make inquiry in regard to the question whether the property is in the virtual or constructive possession of the bankrupt and is in legal effect the property of the bankrupt, and that, if it so determines, it may proceed accordingly to hold the property. But in the present case there was no such inquiry made, and the order appointing the receiver was not based on any decision to that effect.

The case comes within the rule set forth in Tapscott v. Lyon, 103 Cal. 297, 37 Pac. 225. In that case there had been a proceeding in insolvency, and an adjudication of insolvency, and the defendant had been appointed receiver to take and hold possession of all the property of the insolvent. The plaintiff was in possession of certain goods formerly belonging to the insolvent, but which had been transferred to the plaintiff before the proceeding in insolvency. He sued the defendant for damages for the wrongful taking and conversion of the goods. The court held that the order appointing the receiver authorized him to take possession of the goods of the insolvent (which was identical to that extent with the order of the referee herein involved), gave the receiver no authority to seize the goods in the possession of the plaintiff and claimed by him, "however manifest the fraud through which they were acquired," and that if he took property from the possession of one who was not a party to the proceedings in which he received his appointment, he "does so at his personal risk." This is the precise doctrine invoked by the plaintiff in the present case, and the facts are in all respects similar to those referred to in Tapscott v. Lyon. It is authority, therefore, for the proposition that the defendant was not authorized by the order to take goods from the possession of the plaintiff under claim of title.

The defendant relies on the further statement in the Tapscott Case upon other facts appearing therein. The court there held that the duty of the receiver, if he believed that the goods really belonged to the insolvent, was to demand the same, and upon a refusal to deliver the same to bring an action for the recovery thereof. But it appeared in that action that he did demand the goods, and that thereupon the plaintiff voluntarily surrendered them. Upon this the court said that when they were surrendered the receiver could not refuse to accept them, and that when he did accept the possession thus given the goods were in his custody—that is, in the custody of the law—and that thereupon the court in the insolvency proceeding acquired jurisdiction of the property by the consent of the plaintiff, so that the only remedy of the plaintiff thereafter was to apply to that court for relief and obtain an order for the redelivery, upon showing that his title was superior to that of the insolvent, and that since the plaintiff voluntarily surrendered the goods on demand, and thus put them within the jurisdiction of the court, the receiver did not take or hold them as a trespasser, and was not liable in an action for trespass.

[2] If it were true that the plaintiff had voluntarily yielded to the defendant's demand for the possession of the hotel, the doctrine stated in the last-mentioned portion of the opinion in Tapscott v. Lyon would be applicable. But the court below found that the defendant seized and forcibly took possession of the hotel, with knowledge that the plaintiff was in possession and was claiming ownership, and that the possession was not voluntarily given to the defendant by the plaintiff. This finding brings the case within the rule first stated in Tapscott v. Lyon.

We think there is sufficient evidence to sustain the material portion of this finding. The court was authorized from the evidence to find that the possession was not given voluntarily and that there was no surrender of the property on the demand of the receiver. The evidence showed that the defendant's agent gained access to the hotel building through the back door and proceeded to a room therein occupied as the office of the manager; that the manager was temporarily absent, and that they then summoned the clerk, who was at the desk in the main lobby, and told him that they were in possession of the premises; that they then shoved him out of the office, conducted him to the desk in the main lobby behind the counter, and put seals on the cash drawer and safe; that at about that time the manager entered the hotel and was told by the said agents that they were in possession in virtue of the order appointing the receiver, which was then exhibited to him. Demand was then made for the keys, which he did not immediately deliver. He was told that if he did not give up possession the United States marshal would be called to put him out and that he would be in contempt of court. The hotel was in Long Beach, and the place of business of the plaintiff was in Los Angeles. After telephoning to the plaintiff's office in Los Angeles, the manager turned over the keys, through fear of being taken to court on a charge of contempt. From all this and other evidence the court was justified in determining that the defendant seized possession of the hotel and that the same was not voluntarily given to it by the plaintiff. It is immaterial whether actual force was used or not. That part of the finding may be disregarded. A possession thus given cannot be said to have been voluntarily surrendered. The defendant was a trespasser in so doing, and it was not justified by the order under which it acted. It was therefore liable for the return of the money which it received from the operation of the hotel during the time it was in the occupancy thereof.

[3] The payment of the money to the trustee in bankruptcy by the defendant, in pursuance of an order of the referee in bankruptcy directing it to do so, did not relieve the defendant of liability for the return of the money to the plaintiff. The defendant was not notified of the making of the order, nor of the hearing of the application therefor; it made no appearance in that proceeding, and was not a party thereto. The referee had no more jurisdiction to direct the payment of the money to the trustee than it had to order the taking of the property from the plaintiff. Conceding that the referee might have made inquiry with reference to the validity of the transfer from the bankrupt to the plaintiff prior to the adjudication in bankruptcy, the fact remains that no such inquiry was made and no such determination given, and it also appears by the evidence that the transfer of possession and of the right of possession of the hotel property was made more than four months prior to the adjudication, and that there was no ground upon which it could be declared invalid under the Bankruptcy Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 9585-9656).

[4] The defendant further claims that the order of the United States District Court, made on June 14, 1916, directing the trustee to restore the possession of the hotel to the plaintiff, was made on the application of the plaintiff, and that this was a submission to the jurisdiction of the court in the bankruptcy proceeding over said property and the proceeds thereof, up to the time of the said order for restoration. When the wrongful taking took place, the plaintiff had its option to proceed in either of two ways: It could treat the order as ineffectual to authorize the taking, and void to that extent, and sue in the state courts for the recovery of the possession of the property, or it could upon the same grounds apply to the District Court in which the bankruptcy proceeding was pending for an order in that proceeding restoring possession to it. It is true that it made such application to the District Court for the restoration of the hotel property, and it was given to it in accordance with its application; the court holding that the taking of the hotel by the receiver was without authority and that the trustee had no right to the possession thereof. It does not appear, however, that the plaintiff ever made any application to the District Court or the referee for the return of the money obtained by the defendant as receiver from the operation of the hotel while it was in possession thereof. That relief was not included, so far as appears, in the application for the restoration of the hotel property, and it follows that the defendant did not in any manner waive its right to take either of the two courses above suggested by any submission to the jurisdiction of the court with respect to said money. It had the right, therefore, to resort to the ordinary action for damages for trespass in order to recover the money from the receiver.

[5] The court below found that the seizure of plaintiff's property aforesaid was made by the defendant wantonly and oppressively, and that by reason thereof the plaintiff was entitled to $500 exemplary damages. We are of the opinion that this portion of the finding is not supported by sufficient evidence. While it is true that the conduct of the agents of the defendant in taking possession of the property was somewhat abrupt and overbearing, there was no actual violence on their part, and we think it is plain from all the testimony that the defendant and its agents actually believed that the order appointing the receiver gave it authority to take the property in controversy, and that the seizure was made by its agents in good faith and for the purpose of carrying out the authority which they supposed they had as agents of the receiver to execute said order. There was no exhibition of any intent to make use of the order, knowing it to be void, for the purpose of overawing the plaintiff's agents in possession of the hotel. No sufficient evidence of the attempt to act oppressively or wantonly appears in the record. The appellant may obtain all the relief it is entitled to from this error of the court by a modification of the judgment. A reversal thereof is not necessary.

It is ordered that the judgment be modified, by deducting therefrom the sum of $500 allowed by the court as exemplary damages, and that, as so modified, the judgment be affirmed; the appellant to recover the cost of the appeal.

WILLIAMS v. SEIGLITZ. (L. A. 6593.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 29, 1921.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 26, 1921.)

1. Libel and slander ⚡86(2)—Enough to plead that words slanderous per se were spoken of and concerning plaintiff.

While, where words used are of such a character as to contain a covert slander, their meaning must be alleged and proved in an action therefor, it is enough, under Code Civ. Proc. § 460, where the words are actionable per se, to allege that they were spoken of and concerning plaintiff.

2. Libel and slander ⚡9(7)—Stating that respondent in his business of jeweler was a crook, and got away with a diamond left with him, actionable per se.

Statement that one in his business as a jeweler was a crook, and that he got away with a diamond intrusted to him, is actionable per se, under Civ. Code, § 46, as calculated to injuriously affect him in his business.

3. Witnesses ⚡392(1)—Abandoned pleading admissible to impeach pleader's testimony by showing prior inconsistent statements.

While an abandoned pleading is not admissible as evidence against the pleader, it is admissible for purpose of impeaching his testimony, by showing prior inconsistent statements.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Phil D. Swing, Judge.

Action by Clinton E. B. Williams against Frank P. Seiglitz. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles L. Childers, of El Centro, for appellant.

Ault & Anderson, of Calexico, and Ross T. Hickcox and Hickcox & Crenshaw, all of Los Angeles, and Hickcox, Crenshaw & Trude, of El Centro, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for damages in the sum of $1,000 and costs in an action for slander.

Appellant and respondent were both engaged in the jewelry business in Calexico, Imperial county. Respondent's business was called the "Williams Jewelry Company," and respondent employed his brother, George Williams, in the capacity of manager. Respondent and appellant were advertisers in the "Semi-Weekly Plain Dealer," a newspaper published in Calexico, and with which one Frank W. Roach was connected. Upon an occasion in the month of December, 1918, appellant called at the office of the "Plain Dealer" for the purpose of discontinuing his advertising in and his subscription to the paper. He had a conversation with Mr. Roach at that time in which he assigned as the reason for his action that he did not care to support any one who was supporting his competitors, the Williams Bros. It was during this conversation that the alleged slanderous statements were made. The alleged slander consisted in appellant having said, speaking of and concerning respondent and his brother, that "they are not men who are entitled to support, they are crooks," that they "were run out of a place in Arizona," that "the people [meaning the people of Cal-exico] will find it out," that "somebody left a diamond with the Williams Bros. in Arizona, and they got away with it," that "some persons are going after them legally on some crooked deals they were mixed up in before they came to Calexico," and that "they cannot get goods through wholesale houses."

Appellant relies upon two points for reversal—the denial of his motion for nonsuit, and the admission in evidence of his original answer over his objection.

1. The first point is thus stated in appellant's brief:

"Section 46 of the Civil Code carefully defines what a slander is. There is nothing anywhere in the plaintiff's complaint which on its face charges or tends to charge a crime, or that the plaintiff had been indicted, convicted or punished for crime, and there is no explanation anywhere of any of the alleged statements which explains in any way what any of these statements mean, or were supposed to have meant or was understood to have meant, but the statements are left standing entirely alone and unsupported. There is no allegation that any of the alleged statements tends directly to injure the plaintiff in respect to his office, profession, trade, or business, either by imputing to him general disqualifications in those respects which the office or other occupation peculiarly requires, or by imputing something with reference to his office, profession, trade, or business that has a natural tendency to lessen its profits. Since there is no allegation on this point, of course, an attempt to prove it would be erroneous, but the plaintiff did not even attempt to make the proof. * * * There is not the slightest bit of evidence that any actual damage was caused by these or any other remarks, so we find nothing in any of the evidence that brings any of the alleged statements within the meaning of section 46 of the Civil Code, and therefore, on that ground alone, the defendant's motion for nonsuit should have been granted."

Respondent claims that the language used was actionable per se as imputing to him a crime and as tending to injure him in respect to his trade and business; as imputing to him a want of integrity, a qualification which his occupation, trade, and business peculiarly required; and that therefore it was not necessary minutely and in detail to show what appellant meant by the language used, how he meant it to be understood, or how it was understood. However, he contends further that even if the words are not actionable per se, their meaning is set forth in the complaint, and that evidence was introduced to show that they were used and understood in an actionable sense.

The following testimony of Mr. Roach as to his conversation with appellant will be sufficient for our purposes:

"Why, he canceled his arrangement for advertising and his subscription to the paper, and I asked him why, and he said that he didn't care to support any one who was supporting or helping those—his competitors, I don't know just how he referred to them, but his competitors in the jewelry business, and I said that seemed to be a foolish view to take of it, I said in a newspaper competitors in all lines advertised, and were supposed to, and he had to expect competitors in his business in Calexico sometime, and he said he didn't object to competitors, he would welcome competition of the right kind, but he did object to competition, he said that those people were not worthy of support of the people at that time, and they were not the kind of competitors that he liked, or words to that effect, and I said that I had found the Williams boys, in my dealings with them, to be fair and straight, honest and all that, and he said I didn't know them, that when the people of the town did know them as well as he knew them they would be run out, or something of that kind, that they wouldn't be supported, and that they had been run out of some place in some other state, I believe he said Arizona, where they had done business, in fact he knew them to be crooked, he said. And I think that was about the extent of the conversation, he canceled his contract and canceled his business with me. * * * He stated that he had knowledge or knew something about a diamond ring, he mentioned its value it seems to me, I am pretty certain it was about a thousand dollars, had been left with the Williams boys in Arizona some place for remounting or cleaning or something of that kind, and had disappeared while in their possession. Q. Was anything said at that time that they were guilty of embezzlement, or taking the property? A. Yes, sir; he intimated that they know what became of it. * * * His words were that they had got away with it."

On cross-examination, he testified:

"He said a diamond ring had been left with them, I don't remember for what purpose he said, to be repaired, or reset or to be cleaned, and it disappeared and they had gotten away with it."

On redirect examination, he stated:

"Q. I will ask you, Mr. Roach, whether or not the term 'crook' was used in the conversation? A. Yes, sir; it was. Q. And directed to the Williams boys? A. Using the personal pronoun, yes, sir, without expressing either one, just 'them' or 'they.' Q. You understood him to mean the Williams boys, the jewelers? A. Yes, sir. Q. And Clinton E. B. Williams, and George Williams? A. Yes, sir."

Section 46 of the Civil Code defines "slander" as a false and unprivileged publication other than a libel, which: (1) Charges any person with crime. (3) Tends directly to injure him in respect to his office, profession, trade, or business, either by imputing to him general disqualification in those respects which the office or other occupation peculiarly requires, or by imputing something with reference to his office, profession, trade, or business that has a natural tendency to lessen its profit. (5) Which, by natural consequence, causes actual damage."

[1] Where the words used are of such a character as to contain a covert slander, their meaning must be alleged and proved. Edwards v. San Jose Publishing Society, 99 Cal. 431, 34 Pac. 128, 37 Am. St. Rep. 70; Schomberg v. Walker, 132 Cal. 224, 64 Pac. 290. But where the words are actionable per se, an allegation that they were spoken of and concerning the plaintiff is sufficient. Code Civ. Proc. § 460; Jarman v. Rea, 137 Cal. 339, 70 Pac. 216.

In Beek v. Nelson, 126 Minn. 10, 147 N. W. 668, the plaintiff was a secretary and executive officer of an association. The slanderous expressions were that he was a paid hireling of a combine, that he had never done a decent or respectable thing for his city, and that he was employed to do the dirty work of a jobbers' union. In reversing the judgment of the court below, wherein it was held that the words were not actionable per se, it was said:

"By the great weight of authority, spoken words directly disparaging a person in his employment or calling are held to be actionable per se even though they do not charge a crime. [Citing numerous authorities.] * * * The rule is applicable to a person engaged in any lawful occupation or employment by which he gains his livelihood. Johnson v. Shields, 25 N. J. L. 116. The reason of the rule is that, when an employment is lucrative, words which reflect upon the integrity or the capacity of the employee render his tenure precarious, and are therefore a detriment in a pecuniary point of view. Gove v. Blethen, 21 Minn. 80, 18 Am. Rep. 380."

In Noeninger v. Vogt, 88 Mo. 589, the defendant, referring to plaintiff in his business of merchant and miller, said in part: "You are a defrauder; all that you have you accumulated by defrauding." The court, holding these words to be actionable per se, said:

"Any charge of dishonesty against an individual in connection with his business, whereby his character in such business may be injuriously affected, is actionable. * * * Language which imputes to one fraud, or want of integrity in his business, is actionable, per se, and hence special damages need not be alleged."

[2] In our opinion respondent's contention that the words are actionable per se must be sustained. While it may be true, as appellant asserts, that honesty is a requisite in any business, still that quality, within the meaning of the statute, is peculiarly required of a bailee such as a jeweler to whom jewelry is intrusted in the course of his business. The statements that respondent in his business as a jeweler was a "crook," and that he "got away" with a diamond ring which had been intrusted to him in another state, palpably imputed to him a want of the quality of keeping safe and returning the articles intrusted to him. In addition to being an imputation of a want of integrity in his trade, such an accusation would naturally tend to lessen the profits of his jewelry business, for, as respondent says:

"If a general impression were established among the good people of Calexico that plaintiff had gotten away with a thousand dollar diamond ring left with him as bailee, how many diamond rings would thereafter be intrusted to his care?"

Appellant relies on the following authorities in support of his contention that where the meaning of the words is ambiguous it must be set out and proved: Hearne v. De Young, 119 Cal. 670, 52 Pac. 150, 499; Edwards v. San Jose Publishing Society, supra; Maynard v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 34 Cal. 48, 91 Am. Dec. 672; People v. Isaacs, 1 N. Y. Cr. 149; Bloss v. Tobey, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 320; People v. Collins, 102 Cal. 345, 36 Pac. 669. It will be found by an examination of these authorities that the law as to the allegation and proof of ambiguous terms in actions of libel or slander is as we have stated it to be. Appellant insists that the words used in this case are no stronger than those used in other cases where the language has been held not actionable per se. These cases are Clark v. Fitch, 41 Cal. 472; Nidever v. Hall, 67 Cal. 79, 7 Pac. 136; De Witt v. Wright, 57 Cal. 576; Frolich v. McKiernan, 84 Cal. 177, 24 Pac. 114; Mellen v. Times-Mirror Co., 167 Cal. 587, 140 Pac. 277, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 766; Rea v. Wood, 105 Cal. 314, 38 Pac. 899. While it is true the words alleged in several of these cases were held not to be actionable per se, the decisions were put upon the ground that it was not properly alleged that they applied to the plaintiff, as for instance in De Witt v. Wright, supra, or People v. Isaacs, supra; in Mellen v. Times-Mirror Co., supra, where the words purported to impute a crime, it was held the language was insufficient; where the words purported to affect the plaintiff in a public office, as was the case in Rea v. Wood, supra, or his business, as in the case of Maynard v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., supra, the language complained of was not calculated peculiarly to affect the plaintiff in such office or business. In the case at bar the language was plain and unequivocal, clearly applying to respondent, and, as we have shown, calculated to injuriously affect him in his business.

Since the words were actionable per se, it will not be necessary to consider appellant's contention that the allegations of the complaint are insufficient as to the meaning of the language used, or respondent's contention that the words impute a crime and are also actionable per se within the meaning of subdivision 1 as well as subdivision 3 of section 46.

The foregoing testimony of Mr. Roach amply supports the allegations of the complaint that the alleged statements were made, and we have shown they were slanderous per se. The motion for nonsuit was therefore properly denied.

[3] 2. In support of his contention that the original answer was improperly admitted as a part of his cross-examination, appellant cites Morris v. Lachman, 68 Cal. 109, 8 Pac. 799; Stern v. Loewenthal, 77 Cal. 340, 19 Pac. 579; Mecham v. McKay, 37 Cal. 154; Ponce v. McElvy, 51 Cal. 222. These authorities lay down the rule that in this state an abandoned pleading may not be used as evidence against the pleader. However, it has been held that such a pleading may be admitted for purposes of impeachment of the pleader's testimony by showing prior inconsistent statements. Estate of O'Connor, 118 Cal. 69, 50 Pac. 4; Schuh v. Herron Co., 177 Cal. 17, 169 Pac. 682; Johnson v. Powers, 65 Cal. 179, 3 Pac. 625. On his direct examination appellant testified that he "knew absolutely nothing about respondent that he could have discussed his character at any time." In the original verified answer he alleged in effect that the statements attributed to him concerning respondent were each and all of them true. In the amended answer the allegation was modified to include only the statements that "some persons are going after them legally on some crooked deals they were mixed up in before they came to Calexico" and "they cannot get goods through wholesale houses." Notwithstanding appellant's claim to the contrary, we think it clear from the record that the original answer was admitted for purposes of impeachment, although there is no direct statement to that effect. It appears that appellant was given an opportunity to explain the inconsistency, and did offer an explanation. The pleading was properly admitted.

Judgment affirmed.

BADOVER v. GUARANTY TRUST & SAVINGS BANK. (L. A. 6403.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 29, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error — 1010(1)—Where evidence is sufficient to sustain findings of trial court, they will not be disturbed.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1847, providing that the jury are the exclusive judges of the credibility of a witness, which is also applicable to a judge where a case is tried without a jury, where there is substantial evidence in favor of plaintiff in an action on a claim against an estate, the finding of the trial court will not be disturbed, even assuming that in such case the evidence must be clear and convincing.

2. Trial — 70—Reopening case to receive new evidence held within court's discretion.

The reopening of the case several months after making an order for the submission for decision upon briefs to be filed, where sufficient notice was given both parties, was within the court's discretionary powers, though the action was on a claim against an estate, and was not error in the absence of any abuse of discretion.

3. Witnesses — 140(19) — Former attorney, who had released his lien for fees, held competent witness against estate.

Where a former attorney in a case had released his lien for fees, he is not incompetent to testify under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3, which renders incompetent "parties" or "assignors of parties," or "persons in whose behalf an action is prosecuted," in an action against the executor or administrator on a claim against the estate of a deceased person as to any matter of fact occurring before the death of the deceased person.

4. Witnesses — 146 — Wife of plaintiff held competent witness against estate.

The wife of plaintiff was not an incompetent witness in an action by her husband on a note constituting community property, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1880, 1881, excluding as witnesses parties or assignors of parties to an action against an estate, since the wife of plaintiff is not a party to the action, and under Civ. Code, § 157, providing that neither husband nor wife has any interest in the property of the other, and the settled doctrine concerning the status of community property, she has no interest in the cause of action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis M. Myers, Judge.

Action by M. Badover against the Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Amrmed.

Lewis Cruickshank, Vincent B. Vaughan, O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, and Dockweiler & Mott, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Albert J. Sherer and Robert Young, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for $7,253.88 upon a promissory note found to have been given "for value" by defendant's testate, Benjamin L. Liveson, to plaintiff. The action was commenced against said Liveson about two months before his death, which occurred March 4, 1917, prior to the trial. The trial court found that the note was lost after the commencement of the action and prior to the filing of the supplemental complaint filed after the death of Liveson, and has not since been found, notwithstanding diligent search therefor.

[1] 1. It is earnestly urged that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court with relation to the giving of the note. In the light of the record it cannot reasonably be contended that there was not substantial testimony in favor of plaintiff on every disputed point. The contention of insufficiency is based upon matters going to the question of the credibility of the witnesses, and upon the theory that the proof of a claim against the estate of a deceased person must be clear and convincing. It is, of course, true that the burden is on the claimant to establish his claim by a preponderance of evidence to the entire satisfaction of the trial judge, who alone, in the absence of a jury, has to do with all questions as to the credibility of the witnesses. As our law puts it with regard to a witness "the jury are the exclusive judges of his credibility" (section 1847, Code Civ. Proc.), and this is equally applicable to the judge where the case is tried without a jury. This is the absolute rule in the matter of review of findings of fact of a trial court by an appellate court, except where the record demonstrates that in the very nature of things certain testimony of a witness cannot be true and we have no such case here. Assuming that in such a case as this the evidence of genuineness of the claim should be "clear and convincing" to the trial court, as was said in Couts v. Winston, 153 Cal. 686, 688, 96 Pac. 357, 358, "whether or not the evidence * * * is clear and convincing is a question for the trial court," and "in such cases, as in others, the determination of that court in favor of either party upon conflicting or contradictory evidence is not open to review in this court." See, also, Wadleigh v. Phelps, 149 Cal. 627, 637, 87 Pac. 93; Beckman v. Waters, 161 Cal. 581, 584, 119 Pac. 922. It would serve no useful purpose to set forth the testimony in this opinion. It will suffice to say that there was substantial positive testimony in favor of plaintiff as to every necessary element of his case and that there is no possible justification for a conclusion by this court that the same did not fully warrant the learned trial judge in his conclusion as to the facts. The apparent earnestness of counsel has caused us to give more attention to this point than it deserves in view of the fact that the rule is so thoroughly established by our decisions.

[2] 2. Complaint is made that the court on three separate occasions, over the objection of defendant's counsel, permitted the case to be reopened for the purpose of the introduction of further evidence by plaintiff. One of these occasions was nine months after the making of an order for the submission of the cause for decision upon briefs to be filed; the cause being then reopened on the court's own motion for further testimony on certain specified matters. There is no suggestion that defendant was prejudiced in the conduct of its defense by any action of the trial court in this matter. It had the same full opportunity to meet the new evidence that it would have had if the same had been introduced on the first hearing. It is not intimated that it was denied the right to procure additional evidence in reply. It is apparent from the record that the learned trial judge was anxiously seeking the truth in this case, and that his action was due entirely to a commendable desire to have all the facts before him. There can be no question, it seems to us, of the discretionary power of the trial court to permit further evidence in any cause at any time before decision, where it is believed by the court that the ends of justice will be subserved by so doing. That a trial court has such power in an ordinary case is not disputed, but it seems to be contended that a different rule should be applied in actions against the estate of a decedent. The reasons of counsel for this asserted distinction, for which distinction we find no basis, go rather to the weight to be accorded the new evidence than to anything else. To our minds the trial court has this discretionary power in all cases, and so long as the power is exercised with due regard to the adverse party's right to fully present his side of the case there can be no prejudice of which he has the right to complain on appeal. Where a trial court abuses the discretion confided to it in this respect to the prejudice of a party the action will, of course, be set aside on appeal. We find no warrant in the record for the claim that the trial court was guilty of any abuse of discretion in this regard. See in this connection Clavey v. Lord, 87 Cal. 413, 25 Pac. 493.

[3] 3. One Max Rapaport, who was the original attorney of record for the plaintiff in this action, and for whom another attorney was substituted prior to the trial, was allowed to testify as to matters of fact occurring before the death of Mr. Liveson over the objection that under subdivision 3 of section 1880, Code of Civil Procedure, he was incompetent to testify as to any such matter. His testimony was material and important, including both matter as to the existence of the note and admissions by Mr. Liveson as to his indebtedness thereon. The stipulation for substitution of another attorney in place of Mr. Rapaport, signed by both the latter and plaintiff, contained a provision that "Max Rapaport shall have a lien of $50 for his attorney fees on account of services rendered." On the day before the commencement of the trial, Messrs. Sherer and Young, the then attorneys of record of plaintiff, paid to Mr. Rapaport $50, and received from him a receipt in full of all demands for services in the cause, and a release "of any and all lien I may have in or on any judgment obtained" in the case. Subdivision 3 of section 1880, Code of Civil Procedure, renders incompetent as a witness:

"Parties or assignors of parties to an action or proceeding, or persons in whose behalf an action or proceeding is prosecuted, against an executor or administrator upon a claim, or demand against the estate of a deceased person, as to any matter or fact occurring before the death of such deceased person."

It seems clear to us that at the time he testified Mr. Rapaport did not come within the excluded class. Certainly he was not a party to the action or the assignor of a party as to any interest whatever in the claim in suit. All that he ever had, at best, was a lien on any judgment that might be recovered, as security for the payment by plaintiff of a debt due him from plaintiff. There was no assignment of the debt and no attempted assignment of this lien. There was simply an absolute release of the lien on payment of the debt by plaintiff's attorneys, and we can see no force whatever in the suggestion that such a release constituted an assignment, either to such attorneys or to plaintiff. Plaintiff has always been the sole owner of the claim, subject only to a lien on any judgment that might be recovered thereon, created by agreement, for his personal debt to Rapaport, which lien was absolutely extinguished prior to the trial by the payment of the debt by his attorneys, presumably for him and at his request. He was in no sense a successor in interest of Rapaport as to any interest in the claim. It is likewise clear that Mr. Rapaport cannot be held to have been at the time he testified a person "in whose behalf the action" was being prosecuted, for whatever possible claim he once possessed had then been fully satisfied. It may be that the reason for satisfying his claim was to forestall any objection to his testimony as a witness, but this would be altogether immaterial. The vital thing is that the claim was absolutely satisfied, with the result that the witness could no longer be held to be one upon whose behalf the action was being prosecuted, and therefore no longer within either the letter or the spirit of the statute.

[4] 4. Mrs. Badover, the wife of plaintiff, was a most important and material witness in plaintiff's behalf. Her testimony was admitted over the objection that it was incompetent under the same statute. Subdivision 3, § 1880, Code Civ. Proc. It is conceded that the alleged note is in part, at least, community property. She is not a party or the assignor of a party to the action, but it is urged that she is a person "in whose behalf" the action is prosecuted. It is not disputed that Mrs. Badover was a competent witness unless excluded by the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 1880, Code of Civil Procedure. Our statute makes all persons "without exception, otherwise than as specified" in sections 1880 and 1881, Code of Civil Procedure, competent witnesses, expressly declaring that, except as provided in those two sections, "neither parties nor other persons who have an interest in the event of an action or proceeding are excluded." Subdivision 3 of section 1880 has already been quoted in discussing the objection to Rapaport's evidence. It excludes "parties or assignors of parties" to such an action as this. Obviously Mrs. Badover is neither a party nor the assignor of a party to the action. It also excludes "persons in whose behalf" such an action is prosecuted. It is clear that appellant's claim must stand or fall upon the true meaning of these words as used in this statute. Is the wife, within the meaning of the statute, a person "in whose behalf" an action is prosecuted against an executor or administrator by her husband upon a claim asserted by him alone against the estate of a deceased person, based upon a note alleged to have been given him by the deceased and constituting, in part at least, community property?

That the other party to the marriage is a competent witness for the plaintiff in such an action where the property involved is the separate property of the plaintiff was expressly decided by this court in Cullen v. Bisbee, 168 Cal. 695, 698, 144 Pac. 968. In that case however there was apparently no suggestion of a claim that the action was brought by one party to the marriage on behalf of the other party and that particular portion of the statute was not specially discussed in the opinion. It seems obvious, however, in view of our statutory provision that neither husband nor wife has any interest in the property of the other (section 157, Civ. Code), that an action by a husband or wife involving his or her separate property is not one "on behalf of" the other. There was no suggestion or intimation in the opinion in Cullen v. Bisbee, supra, as to what the situation would have been if the property had been community property, and the precise question here involved is one that has never been decided by this court.

It was substantially held in Uhlhorn v. Goodman, 84 Cal. 185, 23 Pac. 1114, that one not a party to an action against an executor on a claim against a deceased person was not a competent witness where he was in fact jointly interested with the plaintiff in the contract on which the claim was based. He was the actual owner in part of the claim, and to the extent of his interest the action might well be held to be "on his behalf." We are not disposed to question the correctness of the ruling in this case, and accept it as establishing that an action against an executor or administrator on a claim against a deceased person is one brought "on behalf of" any person not a party to the action who, nevertheless, has an existing property right in the claim. It seems to us manifest, however, that these words cannot fairly be construed as including a person not a party who has no such present property right. We are further of opinion that in view of the well-settled doctrine in this state with relation to the status of community property, a doctrine, as said in Spreckels v. Spreckels, 172 Cal. 775, 782, 158 Pac. 537, 539, "that had become a fixed and well-understood rule of property," it must be held that the wife, during the marriage, has no existing property right in the community property. She may enforce certain limitations established by statute on the husband's control thereof, but this gives her no present interest in the property, or as put in Estate of Burdick, 112 Cal. 387, 393, 44 Pac. 734, 735, "no right or title of any kind in any specific property." As was said in Estate of Burdick, supra, the whole matter is one of statutory regulation, "and is, of course, just what the statute has made of it," and the discussion in Spreckels v. Spreckels, supra, and Estate of Moffitt, 153 Cal. 359, 95 Pac. 653, 1025, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 207, as to the settled construction of our statutes on this subject leaves nothing to be said in regard to the matter. Any change in this settled rule of property may properly be made only by the legislative department of government.

The action not being one on behalf of the wife, the learned judge of the trial court did not err in ruling that she was a competent witness in this action prosecuted by her husband.

The judgment is affirmed.

ERKENBRECHER v. GRANT. (L. A. 5921.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1921.)

1. Corporations ⇨174—Stockholders and corporation treated as identical to circumvent fraud.

Though a corporation is an entity separate and distinct from its stockholders, both law and equity will, when necessary to circumvent fraud, protect the rights of third persons, and accomplish justice, disregard this distinct existence and treat them as identical.

2. Limitation of actions ⇨49(6)—Purchase of notes by corporation did not constitute payment by a guarantor owning all of the corporation's stock.

The purchase of notes by a corporation of which one of the guarantors of the notes was the sole stockholder and to which such guarantor had transferred all his property did not, under Civ. Code, § 1473, constitute payment of such note by such guarantor on the theory that the corporation and the guarantor should be treated as identical, and not as separate entities, so as to set in motion the statute of limitations under Code Civ. Proc. § 339, against the claim of such guarantor for contribution against coguarantors, in the absence of a showing that the organization of such corporation by such guarantor and his transfer to it of his property or the purchase by the corporation of the notes was fraudulent or other than an open legitimate transaction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by Byron Erkenbrecher against Daniel G. Grant. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. L. Abrahams and P. B. D'Orr, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Isidore B. Dockweiler, G. C. O'Connell, and Dockweiler, Dockweiler & Finch, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHURTLEFF, J. This appeal is from a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought against him to enforce contribution as a coguarantor with plaintiff and others of three certain promissory notes.

The defense urged in the answer and at the trial, and insisted upon here, is that the statute of limitations has barred the action.

The case was heard by the District Court of Appeal (First District, Division 1), and the judgment of the lower court affirmed. Thereafter the cause was transferred to this court, and the judgment again affirmed. The judgment here, and likewise the judgment of the District Court of Appeal, was grounded upon the assumption, the record failing to show the date of the filing of the original complaint, that the action was commenced January 28, 1918, the date upon which the amended complaint was filed. The appellant, upon discovering this omission, sought a diminution of the record, and to that end produced and filed here a certified copy of the original complaint, at the same time moving, which motion was granted, for an order vacating the said judgment of this court. The record, as thus corrected, establishes, which is a controlling circumstance, that the date of filing the original complaint was December 13, 1917. The following are the material facts of the controversy, the statement of which, with some changes and additions, is taken from the opinion of the District Court of Appeal:

On September 17, 1913, at San Francisco, Cal., the Madera Realty Company, a corporation, executed its three certain promissory notes, each for $5,000, and payable as follows: One on or before December 15, 1913, and the remaining two on or before January 15, 1914. Each of said notes was indorsed, and its payment guaranteed by the plaintiff, defendant, and several others. Payments were made on account of the note due December 15, 1913, but no payment was made upon the other two. After their maturity the Navilla Investment Company, a corporation, organized under the laws of this state, and hereinafter called the company, took an assignment of the notes from the holders thereof, the note first maturing being assigned on April 1, 1914, and the others on January 17, 1914. At all the times embraced in the period covering the transactions material to the inquiry plaintiff was the owner of all the outstanding shares of the capital stock of the company, some of which, though standing upon its books in the names of others, was in fact held in trust for plaintiff. Plaintiff was at all times in control of and dictated the management and affairs of the company, and advanced it the moneys which it paid for said notes when they were assigned to it, the company having theretofore acquired all of the assets of plaintiff, who at that time and at all times mentioned in the pleadings was making use of the company for the purpose of conducting his business for his own personal convenience. The company purchased the notes for the reason that the then holder of them was pressing plaintiff for payment as an indorser. On November 17, 1917, plaintiff paid the company the full amount then due upon the notes, not in cash, but by the company charging the account of the plaintiff with such amount; his account at that time showing a credit balance in his favor in excess of the amount then due and unpaid on the notes.

The trial court found the foregoing facts, and also made a finding that plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which was the only provision of the statute of limitations set up in the answer, and rendered judgment accordingly in favor of defendant. It is from this judgment that this appeal is prosecuted.

Defendant contends that the foregoing facts establish that the company and plaintiff were not separate entities, but one and identical, and that, in legal effect, when the company took assignments of the notes, it amounted to payment by plaintiff, that such payment extinguished them for all purposes, and forthwith set the statute of limitations in motion against any claim or right he might have against defendant for contribution, and that the "only cause of action which accrued to plaintiff against the defendant was upon assumpsit, which the law implies, arising where one of two or more joint obligors is compelled to pay more than his share of the obligation, and therefore the plaintiff's cause of action was barred absolutely two years after he so took up the notes and had the same assigned to his company." We cannot concede the correctness of defendant's contentions.

[1] While it is the general rule that a corporation is an entity separate and distinct from its stockholders, it is also equally well-settled that both law and equity will, when necessary to circumvent fraud, protect the rights of third persons, and accomplish justice, disregard this distinct existence, and treat them as identical. As said in Colonial Trust Co. v. Montello Brick Works, 172 Fed. 310, 97 C. C. A. 144:

"While we recognize the legal principle that a corporation does not lose its entity by the ownership of the bulk or even the whole of its stock by another corporation, * * * yet it is equally well settled courts will look beyond the mere artificial personality which incorporation confers, and, if necessary to work out equitable ends, will ignore corporate forms."

To the same effect is the following language of Circuit Judge Lurton in Richmond & I. Construction Co. v. Richmond, N. I. & B. R. Co., 68 Fed. 105-108, 15 C. C. A. 289, 292 (34 L. R. A. 625):

"The contract company was a legal corporation, wholly distinct and separate from the railroad company. The fact that the stockholders in each may have been the same persons does not operate to destroy the legal identity of either corporation. Neither does the fact that the one corporation exercised a controlling influence over the other through the ownership of its stock or through the identity of stockholders operate to make either the agent of the other, or to merge the two corporations into one."

Again, in Home Fire Ins. Co. v. Barber, 67 Neb. 644, 93 N. W. 1024, 60 L. R. A. 927, 108 Am. St. Rep. 716, it is said:

"Equity will look behind the corporate entity, and consider who are the real and substantial parties in interest, whenever it becomes necessary to do so to promote justice or obviate inequitable results"

—and the law will follow equity in this respect.

[2] There is no occasion for the application of this rule of unity in the present case. The facts do not warrant, much less demand, it. There is no finding, neither is there any evidence, to the effect that the organization of the company by plaintiff and the transfer to it by him of all his property were in any manner fraudulent or prompted by dishonesty, or that the company, in purchasing the notes, which as we have seen were indorsed by both plaintiff and defendant, committed, or intended to commit, any fraud whatsoever. It is true that plaintiff personally advanced the money with which the company purchased the notes, but such advancement was entirely consistent with honesty and fair dealing, and bears no earmarks other than those of an open, legitimate transaction. It liquidated the obligation so far as the then owners of the notes were concerned, and in no respect whatsoever wronged or prejudiced the defendant, who was an indorser upon each of the notes, and upon failure of the maker to discharge them became responsible for the payment thereof.

The finding of the trial court that the company acquired the notes because the then holder of them was pressing plaintiff in his capacity as indorser for payment does not negative the separate entity of the company. In the absence of any dishonest motive or intention to accomplish a wrong, and as we have said, none was proven, we fail to discover any objection whatever to plaintiff directing the company to purchase the notes. If it be assumed that he caused their purchase for the reason that it was not then convenient for him to meet his obligations as indorser, there would still be wanting the elements to which we have referred, and the presence of which we hold is essential to justify treating plaintiff and the company as identical—as a unit. In order to cast aside the legal fiction of distinct corporate existence as distinguished from those who own its capital stock, it is not enough that it is so organized and controlled and its affairs so managed as to make it "merely an instrumentality, conduit or adjunct" of its stockholders, but it must further appear that they are the "business conduits and alter ego of one another," and that to recognize their separate entities would aid the consummation of a wrong. Divested of the essentials which we have enumerated, the mere circumstance that all the capital stock of a corporation is owned or controlled by one or more persons does not, and should not, destroy its separate existence; were it otherwise, few private corporations could preserve their distinct identity, which would mean the complete destruction of the primary object of their organization.

There is abundant authority in addition to the cases we have mentioned, sustaining our view of the law. Indeed, our attention has not been directed to a case holding the contrary. While some text-books contain passages pointing to a different conclusion, an examination of the cases cited by the author demonstrates that they not only do not support the text, but are predicated upon a version of the law similar to the one herein declared. Likewise, some of the decisions contain passages which, when taken alone, lend some basis for a different interpretation, but, when read in the light of the facts of the case, which is always essential when construing and applying judicial expressions, it is clear there was present the demand that corporate entity be ignored in order that fraud or some kindred wrong be defeated. All of the cases, so far as we are advised, in our own and other jurisdictions, which involved the abolition of corporate entity and the facts which warrant it, such as Kelly v. Ning Yung Ben. Ass'n, 2 Cal. App. 460, 84 Pac. 321, Chater v. S. F. Sugar, etc., Co., 19 Cal. 219, Shorb v. Beaudry, 56 Cal. 446, Deming v. Maas, 18 Cal. App. 330, 123 Pac. 204, and Rutz v. Obear, 15 Cal. App. 435, 115 Pac. 67, are in thorough accord with what precedes, and support the rule we announce.

Llewellyn Iron Works v. Abbott Kinney Co., 172 Cal. 210, 155 Pac. 986, is in harmony with what we have said touching the rule governing the rejection of corporate entity. In that case Abbott Kinney, the president of the Abbott Kinney Company, verified an answer of the latter in an action brought against it for an unpaid subscription to the capital stock of the corporation, notwithstanding, as Abbott Kinney then knew, the company had at a prior date forfeited its charter, the result of which was that Kinney had knowingly and deliberately led the plaintiff to believe that the corporation was an existing one, and induced plaintiff to prosecute its action to final judgment. An estoppel was asserted, concerning which the court said:

"To countenance this conduct would be to permit Abbott Kinney and the defendant corporation to escape the payment of a just debt, * * * by the concealment of a fact which it was incumbent on Abbott Kinney to disclose. * * * We entertain no doubt of their [findings] sufficiency to raise an estoppel against Abbott Kinney personally. And upon a proper showing that the Abbott Kinney Company, a corporation, was but the instrumentality through which Abbott Kinney for convenience transacted his business, by all of the authorities not only equity, looking through form to substance, but the law itself, would hold such a corporation bound as the owner of the corporation might be bound, or, conversely, hold the owner bound by acts which bound his corporation. [Citing cases.] But the evidence, however, is insufficient to establish this unity of interest and ownership, the only stipulation upon this matter being that 'Abbott Kinney was and now is the president of the Abbott Kinney Company, a corporation, and was and is the owner and holder of the greater portion of the stock of the said Abbott Kinney Company, a corporation.'

We have quoted thus at length from the Llewellyn Case, in order to point out that it involved an estoppel, which, had it been upheld and applied, would have thwarted a fraud which otherwise would have been effectual.

Counsel for respondent direct our attention to a number of decisions of this court, which they earnestly maintain support their contention that the assignments of the notes on the 17th of January and the 1st of April, 1914, to the company was in reality absolute payment, and accomplished their extinguishment, but we think each of such cases is clearly distinguishable from the one we are considering, and that none of them is controlling here.

The rule that payment by one of several joint obligors of the obligation, or by any one acting for him, or who takes an assignment of the obligation, extinguishes it, is not applicable here, for such payment or assignment is by, or runs to, one who is responsible, which was not the case here. There was no duty whatsoever resting upon the company to pay the notes in question, and it is for this reason that Wright v. Mix, 76 Cal. 465, 18 Pac. 645, Gordon v. Wansey, 21 Cal. 77, Yule v. Bishop, 133 Cal. 574, 62 Pac. 68, 65 Pac. 1094, and similar cases, are not decisive of this controversy. Equally without application, and for the same reason, are the numerous cases to the effect that payment by a surety puts an end to the obligation. In the instant case we repeat, the company was in no manner liable, but was a stranger to the obligation; it did not pay, but purchased the notes, and under such circumstances it cannot be said, upon reason or authority, they were extinguished.

The court found, and there is a similar finding, except as to dates, as to each of the notes:

"That on the 17th day of January, 1914, the Navilla Investment Company purchased said note."

Under the facts appearing, we hold it was an absolute, bona fide purchase by the company acting in its separate entity, and by reason thereof, as was its intention, it became, in its distinct capacity, the owner and holder of the notes. Frank v. Brady, 8 Cal. 47.

Having determined that the company and the plaintiff were separate entities, it follows that section 1473 of the Civil Code, which declares that "full performance of an obligation, by the party whose duty it is to perform it, or by any other person on his behalf, and with his assent, if accepted by the creditor, extinguishes it," is not applicable, for the reason that, as we have said, the transaction was a purchase and not payment of the notes by the company, and that there was no evidence of an intention upon the part of the company, or of the assignor and holder, to extinguish them. As we have said, there was no "duty" resting upon the company to pay the notes; neither was the act of the company a payment on behalf of the plaintiff and with his assent, one or the other of which conditions is essential to bring the transaction within the provisions of the section. Civ. Code, § 1473. There was manifest here a definite design on the part of the company to keep the notes alive and hold them as its property, all of which, we declare, did not or could not prejudice the defendant, and was not to his disadvantage.

While the court found that the payment of the notes by the plaintiff on November 17, 1917, was not made by him as indorser, we think such finding was error, and that there is no substantial evidence supporting it. In fact, the record establishes the contrary. The finding is predicated upon the theory, which we declare to be untenable, that the company and plaintiff were identical.

From what precedes, it follows that when, on November 17, 1917, plaintiff paid the notes to the company, which was then the sole owner of them, the effect was to vest in him the right to compel contribution from the defendant, his coindorser, for his proportion of the amount so paid, which he is endeavoring to do in this action, and the same having been commenced December 13, 1917, was in time. Code Civ. Proc, § 339.

Judgment reversed.

ROHN v. IRON CHIEF MINING CO.

I. Mines and minerals ⚡26 — Locator, who fails to do development work, may relocate and obtain title.

Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2324 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4620), the locator of a mining claim, who has not done any of the development work required by the section during the calendar year following the date of his location, immediately at the beginning of the next year may relocate the same claim, and claim title thereto under such location.

2. Mines and minerals ⚡38(15)—Evidence sufficient to support finding defendant's claims not valid, when plaintiff's conflicting claims located.

Evidence held sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that defendant's two claims were not valid and subsisting mining claims on January 1, 1901, when plaintiff's conflicting claims were located.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Orlando Rohn against the Iron Chief Mining Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Oscar Lawler, of Los Angeles, Sarau & Thompson, of Riverside, and James E. Degnan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Goodrich & Martinson and Alfred H. McAdoo, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Two actions were brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, in each of which judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff in the court below, after a consolidation of the cases for trial. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

In both cases the complaints set forth causes of action to quiet title to certain mining claims, 9 in number, of which he claimed ownership. In its answers the defendant set up a claim of ownership to 12 mining claims which conflicted with or overlapped the ground claimed by the plaintiff. The sole question in the case is whether or not the plaintiff or the defendant has the better title to the respective mining claims in controversy.

The main proposition involved in the case may be stated by the following question: Under section 2324 of the United States Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. St. § 4620), can the locator of a mining claim, who has not done any of the development work required by that section during the calendar year following the date of his location, immediately at the beginning of the next year relocate the same claim and obtain title thereto under such relocation? The provisions of section 2324, upon which that question must be decided, are as follows:

"On each claim located after the tenth day of May, eighteen hundred and seventy-two, and until a patent has been issued therefor, not less than one hundred dollars' worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year, * * * and upon a failure to comply with these conditions, the claim or mine upon which such failure occurred shall be open to relocation in the same manner as if no location of the same had ever been made, provided that the original locators, their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, have not resumed work upon the claim after failure and before such location. * * * Provided, that the period within which the work required to be done annually on all unpatented mineral claims shall commence on the first day of January succeeding the date of location of such claim."

The defendant insists that the intent of the law was that the person who had made the location and had failed to do the assessment work during the next ensuing calendar year should be incompetent to make a relocation of the same ground. The main reliance for authority for this position is found in Lindley on Mines, at section 405. The author there says that, if the original locator—

"has the same right as a stranger to relocate under these circumstances, he has the same length of time allowed to a stranger to perform the first year's labor after the date of relocation. * * * On January 2 * * * he must repeat this proceeding and obtain an additional two years, and so on indefinitely. It seems to us that this is a manifest fraud upon the government. It is a perversion of the law, and in direct violation of its spirit and intent, to say that the original locator may take advantage of his own dereliction, and use his own neglect and wrong as a foundation to either perpetuate an estate or create a new one. The law under which he obtained his first privilege provides the only method by which his neglect can be condoned, and that is by resuming work prior to relocation. It is illogical to say that he may accomplish this result in any other way than by strictly pursuing the methods provided for by the statute."

Mr. Lindley, in the section referred to, enters upon an elaborate discussion of the proposition and a review of the cases on the subject, all of which, except one, are against his position, in so far as they touch upon the question at all. The one he refers to as sustaining him, Ingemarson v. Coffey, 41 Colo. 407, 92 Pac. 908, is not in opposition to the doctrine of the other cases, as he contends. It does not refer to or construe section 2324 aforesaid, but is based on the provisions of the Colorado mining law, which required the performance of the development work there mentioned within 60 days after the posting of the location notice, and in that case the facts were that the relocater did not post a new notice, nor did he do any of the other things required by the Colorado law to accomplish a location, but merely erased the date on the original notice and inserted a new date.

We are of the opinion that the language of section 2324 does not have the effect contended for by the learned author above mentioned. It expressly declares that, if the work required is not done within the year specified, the claim or mine "shall be open to relocation as if no location of the same had ever been made." In other words, it is then to be considered as vacant public land of the United States, subject to entry by any qualified person, as provided in section 2319 (U. S.

Comp. St. § 4614). If the original locator is a qualified person, he is as eligible to make a relocation under this language as a stranger would be. The proviso immediately following this language, to the effect that a relocation cannot be made if the original locator has in the meantime resumed work upon the claim after the failure, was not intended to prevent such original locator from making a relocation, but was intended to give him an additional privilege, that of maintaining his title by a mere resumption of work.

The principal argument advanced in support of the appellant's claim is that the object of requiring $100 worth of labor or improvements to be performed upon the mine each year was to promote the development of mines, and that if by successive relocations a person could maintain his right to a mining claim from year to year without doing any development work, he would be able to act as a "dog in the manger," to use the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in Chambers v. Harrington, 111 U. S. 355, 4 Sup. Ct. 428, 28 L. Ed. 452; that is to say, to keep others away from the property while doing nothing with it himself. There may be some force in this argument. But the doing of $100 worth of work on an ordinary quartz mine would go but little way toward the development of such claim. It would not accomplish anything of importance in the way of development or production of precious metals. Its main purpose obviously was to compel the locator to do some work on the premises during the interval between the date of his location and the expiration of the time allowed, so as to leave visible evidence of his claim for the information of other prospectors, to enable them to avoid taking up the same ground. This purpose would be accomplished when the same person relocates the same ground, for the relocation must be made by him in the same manner as by any other person; that is, as the section declares, it "must be distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced." This evidence of relocation would be as effectual to warn others of the claim thereto as was the similar evidences of the original location, or as the similar evidences of the location by a third person after the forfeiture, would be. We perceive nothing in the language of the section purporting to abridge the rights of the original locator in this respect.

The right of the original locator, or one of several locators, to relocate the mine after the expiration of the time for doing development work without any having been done, has been recognized by the supreme court of this state in a number of decisions. Conway v. Hart, 129 Cal. 480, 62 Pac. 44; McCann v. McMillan, 129 Cal. 350, 62 Pac. 31; Strang v. Ryan, 46 Cal. 33; Thompson v. Spray, 72

Cal. 528, 14 Pac. 182; Richards v. Wolfing, 98 Cal. 195, 32 Pac. 971; In Warnock v. De Witt, 11 Utah, 324, 40 Pac. 205, the exact question here presented was before the court, and that court, in considering the interpretation of section 2324, said:

"The fact that a prior locator, after his right has lapsed, may renew it by resuming work, would appear to be a favor or right granted to such prior locator; but to give the proviso above quoted the effect claimed by appellant would be to deny to such prior locator a substantial right allowed to strangers. In other words, such a construction, while it would allow to a prior locator the right to resume work, would destroy his right to make a new location. We do not think the proviso to the act should be construed to mean anything more than that a prior locator, in addition to the rights of a stranger, should also have the right to resume work, and thus relieve himself from the forfeiture incurred."

In Legoe v. Chicago Fishing Co., 24 Wash. 175, 64 Pac. 141, the court was considering a statute of the state of Washington regarding the location of claims for fishing trap sites in the rivers of that state, the language of which is substantially identical with that of section 2324. With respect to the rule applying to such statutes the court said:

"The right to fish in the public waters, in the absence of express prohibitory legislation, is a right common to all of the citizens of the state; and while the Legislature has ample power to regulate the right, or grant it to one to the exclusion of others, for a limited time, at least, the statute expressing such intent must have the directness and certainty of a penal statute, or at least not be capable of a different construction, before it will be given that effect."

The court then refers to the argument in Lindley on Mines aforesaid, and repudiates the conclusion there reached, at the same time approving the decision in Warnock v. De Witt, supra. The right of the original locator to make a new location at the expiration of the time allowed for doing development work has also been recognized by the courts of the United States. Lockhart v. Johnson, 181 U. S. 528, 21 Sup. Ct. 665, 45 L. Ed. 979; Hunt v. Patchin, 13 Sawy. 304, 35 Fed. 818; Leedy v. Lehfeldt, 162 Fed. 304, 89 C. C. A. 184. See, also, Saunders v. Mackey, 5 Mont. 523, 6 Pac. 361.

[1] We are therefore of the opinion that the question first above stated, regarding the meaning and effect of section 2324, should be answered in the affirmative. It follows that the claims of the plaintiff under relocations made by him or his predecessors in interest in the year immediately following the expiration of the time for doing the development work upon a previous location of the same ground by the same person are valid and effectual as against persons subsequently attempting to locate the same ground prior to the expiration of the period allowed by section 2324 for development work after the date of the relocations under which plaintiff claims. This covers all of the locations claimed by the plaintiff, and supports the findings of the court in his favor, with the exception of two claims, designated as the Stratton and Electric claims, respectively. The right to these two claims depends upon other conditions, which we will proceed to discuss.

[2] The plaintiff claims ownership of the Electric and Stratton mining ground under locations thereof made on January 1, 1901, by one Robinson. The defendant claims the same ground under three locations, two of which were made on January 1, 1907, and the other on January 8, 1907. It is not disputed that the location of the Electric and Stratton claims were made in the manner required by the law, nor that the necessary assessment work has been regularly performed thereon in each year since the date of the location. The defendant challenges their validity on the ground that at the time the respective locations were made the ground embraced therein was not then open to entry or location, for the asserted reason that it was then covered by two valid subsisting mining claims, under locations previously made by other persons, designated, respectively, as the Bald Eagle claim and the Golden Eagle claim. Thus the question is presented whether or not the two claims last named were valid subsisting mining claims on January 1, 1901, when the plaintiff's claims were located. The finding of the court below was, in effect, that they were not on that date valid and subsisting claims. We think there is sufficient evidence to support this finding.

There was evidence showing a location of these two claims by one Bailey on January 1, 1896. On the question whether the required development work thereon was done for the year 1900 there is conflicting evidence. A witness for the defendant testified that he actually did work thereon to the value of $100 in that year. A witness for the plaintiff testified that no work whatever was done on these claims during that year. According to the testimony for the defendant, a large part of the work for 1900 on the two Eagle claims was done upon a tunnel designed to be used for the common benefit of a group of mines, 26 in number, including the two Eagle claims, situated near together. None of this work was done upon either of said claims, but it was done in pursuance of a contract between the six persons who were the respective owners of the 26 claims, to the effect that they would "do the assessment work for the year 1900 upon said claims by the construction of a tunnel." The evidence showed that only 60 linear feet of the tunnel was constructed, and that its value was $10 a foot, or $600 in all. Apportioning this among the 26 claims, there would be only $22 worth of work to apply to each,

The court was fully authorized, by the character of the evidence regarding this and the other work claimed to have been done upon these two claims, in concluding that work of the value of $100 had not been done on either of them. This evidence is sufficient to show that on January 1, 1901, when the Electric and Stratton claims were located by Robinson, the Bald Eagle and Golden Eagle claims were not valid and subsisting claims, and that the ground covered by the Electric and Stratton claims was open to location for mining purposes. The finding to that effect is therefore supported by the evidence.

The defendant contends that Robinson, the original locator of the Electric and Stratton claims, was estopped to make said location, and that plaintiff is estopped to assert their validity, because of the fact that Robinson was at that time in possession of the Bald Eagle and Golden Eagle claims under an option from the owners thereof under their previous location. We are not referred to any exhibit or testimony showing the terms of the option contract. Respondent's counsel assert that it had expired prior to January 1, 1901. Under these circumstances we will assume that the court below correctly held that there was no existing option to Robinson on January 1, 1901, and that no estoppel arises therefrom.

A considerable part of the defendant's argument is devoted to the proposition that the conduct of the plaintiff and his predecessors in interest in relocating some of the mining claims described in the complaint at intervals of two years each on the 1st day of January of the respective years, without doing any assessment work in the meantime, was made in pursuance of a conspiracy to defraud the government and other persons who might be desirous of locating the ground covered thereby as mining claims in their own behalf. It is sufficient to say that under the construction we give to section 2324, as above set forth, the United States has by its laws consented to the conduct which it is claimed constitutes the fraud, and consequently such conduct could not amount to fraud either upon the United States or persons desiring to claim under it.

The judgment is affirmed.

BIRCH et al. v. ORANGE COUNTY.
(L. A. 6018.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 29, 1921.)

1. Taxation $\S$ 40(8)—Property must be assessed on uniform valuation.

A taxpayer is entitled to have his property assessed on the same basis of valuation as that applied to other property of like character and similarly situated; inequality of taxation being produced as surely by inequality of valuation as by inequality of the rate of tax.

2. Taxation $\S$ 459—Assessment conclusive, in absence of disregard of law or fraud.

The decision of a taxing board as to the value of property and the fairness of an assessment, constitutes a judgment of a tribunal created by law for the determination of that question, which cannot be avoided unless the board has proceeded arbitrarily and in willful disregard of law, with the evident purpose of imposing unequal burdens on certain of the taxpayers, or unless there is something equivalent to fraud in their action.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 927(3)—All evidence favorable to plaintiff to be taken as true on nonsuit.

On appeal from a judgment of nonsuit, all evidence in favor of plaintiff must be taken as true, and all evidence in conflict therewith must be disregarded, and every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence produced must be considered as facts proved in favor of plaintiff, and where the evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, or if either of several inferences may reasonably be made, the court must take the view most favorable to plaintiff.

4. Taxation $\S$ 459—Grossly excessive overvaluation constructively fraudulent.

A grossly inequitable and palpably excessive overvaluation of property for taxation may be held constructively fraudulent.

5. Taxation $\S$ 543(2)—Verified claim before suit to recover taxes paid under protest unnecessary.

Presentation to the board of supervisors of a verified claim is not necessary before suit to recover taxes paid under protest, under Pol. Code, §§ 3819, 4075, 4078, in view of section 3804, even though permissible for the board to make payment on a verified claim in such cases.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Consolidated actions by A. Otis Birch and others, as copartners doing business under the firm name and style of the Birch Oil Company, against the County of Orange. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

See, also (App.) 195 Pac. 931.

George H. Woodruff and Clyde C. Shoemaker, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

L. A. West and W. F. Menton, both of Santa Ana, and A. P. Nelson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. These consolidated actions were brought by the plaintiffs against the county of Orange to recover first and second installments of taxes paid under protest, under the provisions of section 3819 of the Political Code. The complaints in both cases charge the county assessor and the county board of equalization with having acted arbitrarily and fraudulently in fixing a disproportionate and excessive valuation upon the property of the plaintiffs. Upon the trial, and after the plaintiffs had rested their case, the trial court made its order granting a judgment of nonsuit. This appeal is from the judgment.

The two suits covered, respectively, the first and second installments of state and county taxes for the year 1916. The assessment and levy were upon 20.16 acres of oil land in Orange county, the property of plaintiffs. The assessment complained of placed a valuation of $645,120 upon this tract. Following a hearing before the board of equalization, the above assessment was reduced to $600,000. The amount of taxes levied and paid under protest, and sought to be recovered in these actions, is $19,143.94.

The fact upon which appellants chiefly rely to maintain their allegations of an unfair, unjust, excessive, and exorbitant assessment, and of willful and fraudulent discrimination on the part of the assessor and board of equalization, is the extravagant disparity between the assessed valuation placed upon this tract and that upon adjacent lands of the same quality and value. The undisputed evidence on this point is such as to justify the expression "astounding," which was used by the trial judge who granted the judgment of nonsuit. The difference in valuation is, indeed, so astonishing, excessive, and unaccountable as to impress upon the transaction a very strong inference of discrimination, unfairness, and oppression, either through design or through such gross error or negligence as to amount to the "equivalent of fraud."

The evidence of plaintiffs presented on the hearing before the board of equalization, and on the trial, discloses that this tract is surrounded by other oil lands almost identical in character, development, production, and value, compared acre for acre of proved and producing oil lands alone, which, under the same assessment, were valued at a rate from 10 to 15 times less than was placed on plaintiffs' lands. The trial judge reviewing the evidence makes this further statement:

"There is no question that there has been a great disparity in assessing these properties by the assessor, and that the assessor has placed a valuation on plaintiffs' property out of all proportion with other contiguous properties similarly situated approximately of the same value per acre."

We take the following summary of the proved facts from appellants' opening brief, as it appears to conform to the evidence, and the accuracy of the statements is not questioned by the reply brief of respondent:

"The property of the Birch Oil Company [the appellant] in said field consists of 20.16 acres of oil land. It will be noted by reference to said Exhibit No. 14 that said property is surrounded by other developed oil lands owned by other companies. The record shows that the Fullerton Oil Company owns 61.52 acres of oil land adjoining the Birch property on the west; the Crown of the Valley Oil Company owns 108.91 acres of oil land under lease to the Columbia Oil Producing Company, adjoining the Birch property on the north; the Brea Canyon Oil Company owns 203 acres of oil land adjoining the Birch property on the east; and the General Petroleum Company owns 80 acres of oil land adjoining the Birch property on the south. Immediately east of the property of the Brea Canyon Oil Company, and adjoining the same, the Union Oil Company owns 670.89 acres of oil land.

"It also appears that all of the Birch Oil Company property, 20.16 acres, is proven oil land; that of the 61.52 acres belonging to the Fullerton Oil Company approximately 25 acres are proven oil land; that from 17 to 20 acres of the 108.91 acres owned by the Crown of the Valley Oil Company are proven oil land; that about 60 acres of the 203 acres owned by the Brea Canyon Oil Company are proven oil land; that of the 80 acres belonging to the General Petroleum Company about 15 acres are proven oil land; that approximately 500 acres of the 670.89 acres owned by the Union Oil Company are proven oil land. By 'proven oil land' is meant that the acreage specified has been proven by wells already drilled thereon to be oil-bearing and oil-producing land.

"On the first Monday in March, 1916, the day on which the assessment in question was made by the county assessor of Orange county, there were 9 producing wells on the Birch property, yielding a total monthly production of 44,686 barrels of oil [Tr. pp. 273-275]; there were 9 producing wells on the proven 25 acres of the Fullerton property, yielding a total monthly production of 47,154 barrels of oil [Tr. pp. 239-244]; there were 5 producing wells on the proven 17 acres of the Crown of the Valley or Columbia property, yielding a total monthly production of 31,724 barrels of oil [Tr. pp. 252-254]; there were 23 producing wells on the proven 60 acres of the Brea Canyon property, yielding a total monthly production of 48,619 barrels of oil [Tr. pp. 262-266]; there were 19 producing wells on the proven 500 acres of the Union Oil Company property, yielding a total monthly production of 59,987 barrels of oil [Tr. p. 308]; and there were 8 producing wells on the proven 15 acres of the General Petroleum property, yielding a monthly production of 28,124 barrels of oil [Tr. p. 199]. The evidence clearly shows that the oil produced from these various properties is of about the same quality and quantity, and that the formation and general geological structure, as well as the depth of the oil sand and the drilling conditions and all other surface and underlying features of the properties, are remarkably uniform and similar throughout the entire Brea Oil Field in which the properties referred to are located [Tr. fols. 927-1014; also fols. 1231-1283].

"The assessor of Orange county placed valuations upon the above respective properties for assessment purposes for the year 1916-1917, as follows:

Birch Oil Company, 20.16 acres, valued at	$645,120 00
Fullerton Oil Company, 61.52 acres, valued at	34,915 00
Crown of the Valley Oil Company, including leasehold interest of the Columbia Oil Producing Company, 108.91 acres, valued at	132,645 00
Brea Canyon Oil Company, 203 acres, valued at	130,000 00
General Petroleum Company, 80 acres, valued at	48,000 00
Union Oil Company, 670.89 acres, valued at	244,525 00
Total value of properties, exclusive of the Birch property.....	$590,085 00"

It will be observed that the assessment on this 20.16 acres of the appellants' land exceeds by $55,000 the assessment of the entire 1,123.43 acres of the adjoining oil properties, comprising 617 acres of proven or tested oil lands, and producing monthly 215,608 barrels of oil of like character as against 44,686 barrels from the plaintiffs' property. The only change made in these assessments by the board of equalization was a reduction of $45,000 on plaintiffs' lands, and an aggregate increase of $59,490 on the remaining 1,123 acres. The assessor testified that the basis of his real estate assessments throughout the county was one-third of its cash value; that in assessing oil properties he took into consideration the average production of oil for the three months next preceding March 1st; that he considered in each case the gravity of the oil, the water content, the drilling conditions, the portion of the land actually proven to be oil-bearing, as well as the unproven portion of the land and the cost of developing the property past and present, and probable future production of the property.

All of these elements of value are substantially covered in plaintiffs' evidence and on the very basis used by the assessor, the excessive and unreasonable disparity between the assessments upon plaintiffs' lands and others of like value and similarly situated is so obvious and inconsistent with any theory of fair dealing that it cannot be reconciled on the mere presumption that the assessor and board of equalization did their duty as they saw it. In the absence of any explanation or justification for this inequality (and there is none offered) it stands out so glaringly and out of all reason that of itself it raises an inference of bad faith.

[1, 2] What the taxpayer is entitled to is the exercise of good faith and fair consideration on the part of the taxing power in assessing his property, at the same rate and on the same basis of valuation as that applied to other property of like character and similarly situated. Inequality of taxation is produced as surely by inequality of valuation as by inequality of the rate of tax. Los Angeles Gas & Elec. Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 162

Cal. 164, 121 Pac. 384, 9 A. L. R. 1277. It is true, as said in the decision last cited:

"The board is exercising judicial functions, and its decision as to the value of the property and the fairness of the assessment so far as amount is concerned constitutes an independent and conclusive judgment of the tribunal created by law for the determination of that question," and that this adjudication "cannot be avoided unless the board has proceeded 'arbitrarily and in willful disregard of the law intended for their guidance and control, with the evident purpose of imposing unequal burdens upon certain of the taxpayers,' * * * or unless there be something equivalent to fraud in the action of the board."

See, also, So. Pac. Land Co. v. County of San Diego, 191 Pac. 931.

[3] In the case before us the board of equalization reviewed the action of the assessor and made a reduction of $45,000 in the assessments, but, in view of the evidence of comparative values presented on the hearing, its action only emphasizes the apparent lack of consideration given to an equitable equalization of the tax. This appeal is from a judgment of nonsuit and—

"All the evidence in favor of plaintiffs must be taken as true, and all the evidence in conflict therewith must be disregarded. 'Every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence produced must be considered as facts proved in favor' of the plaintiff and where the evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, or if either of several inferences may reasonably be made, the court must take the view most favorable to the plaintiff. If with all these aids the evidence is in such condition that a verdict or decision in favor of plaintiff would be held by an appellate court to have sufficient legal support in the evidence, a nonsuit should not be granted." Davis v. Crump, 162 Cal. 513, 123 Pac. 294; Freese v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc., 139 Cal. 392, 73 Pac. 172; Goldstone v. Merchants', etc., Co., 123 Cal. 625, 56 Pac. 776.

[4] "A grossly inequitable and palpably excessive overvaluation" of property for taxation may be held constructively fraudulent. First Thought Gold Mines v. Stevens County, 91 Wash. 437, 157 Pac. 1080; Southern Or. Co. v. Coos County, 39 Or. 185, 193, 64 Pac. 646; Danforth v. Livingston, 23 Mont. 558, 562, 59 Pac. 916; Olympia Water Works v. Stuckart, 286 Ill. 164, 121 N. E. 629.

[5] Respondent seeks to justify the nonsuit in this case on the ground that it was necessary that plaintiffs should have presented their claim or demand to the board of supervisors under the provisions of section 4075 of the Political Code before commencing suit. It would appear from the opinion of the learned judge who tried the case that his decision was largely influenced by this contention. We do not reach the same conclusion. Section 4075 does not purport to declare what claims shall be presented to the board of supervisors as a prerequisite to bringing suit, but prescribes the manner in which certain claims shall be itemized and presented before the board may pass upon them. It requires that the board shall not—

"credit or allow any claim or bill against the county or district fund, unless the same be itemized, giving names, dates and particular service rendered, character of process served, upon whom, distance traveled, where and when, character of work done, number of days engaged, supplies or materials furnished, to whom, and quantity and price paid therefor."

These are not particulars which would seem to relate to the sort of demand sued on in this action. Section 4078 of the same Code, which provides when claimants may sue on demands under section 4075, provides that on failure or refusal or neglect of the board to allow or reject a claim for a period of 90 days the claimant may treat it as rejected and sue the county therefor at any time within 6 months after the final action of the board. Section 3819, providing for the recovery of taxes paid under protest, under which this action is brought, makes no reference directly or indirectly to any demand upon the board of supervisors, but provides that after the disputed taxes have become payable, and are paid under written protest, the protesting taxpayer may at any time within six months after such payment bring his action against the county. (Italics ours.)

If he must first present his claim to the board of supervisors it is plain that he is precluded from bringing suit at "any time" after payment, and that he could not have the full 6 months after such payment in which to commence his action. It was held in Clear Lake W. W. Co. v. Lake County, 45 Cal. 90, under a special statute for recovering damages from a county for property destroyed by a mob, that the limitation of the time to bring action to 6 months negated any presumption that the Legislature meant to require the claim to be presented to the board of supervisors before suit was begun. The reason, moreover, for a previous claim and demand upon the supervisors would seem to be lacking in this class of demands, as the facts upon which they are based must necessarily already have been considered and passed upon by the supervisors as a board of equalization. Henne v. County of Los Angeles, 129 Cal. 297, 61 Pac. 1081.

Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Los Angeles, 151 Cal. 655, 91 Pac. 795, cited by respondent, was an action brought to recover taxes paid to the city of Los Angeles under protest, and it was there held that the claim should have been presented to the city council before suit was commenced. But that decision was in pursuance of an express provision of the Los Angeles charter that—

"No suit shall be brought for any claim for money or damages against the city of Los Angeles * * * until a demand has been presented as herein provided and rejected in whole or in part. * * *"

That action was not brought directly under the state law, but under a similar ordinance of the city of Los Angeles, which, of course, was subject to the limitations of the city charter. Under earlier decisions in this state the same rule was applied in suits against a county, but these decisions were under a statute which expressly required such presentation to be made to the board of supervisors in all cases before action could be maintained. McCann v. Sierra County, 7 Cal. 121; Alden v. Alameda County, 43 Cal. 272; Rhoda v. Alameda County, 52 Cal. 350; Keyes v. San Francisco, 177 Cal. 313, 319, 173 Pac. 475. We have no such sweeping requirement at the present time which would hold against a reasonable implication under a special statute to the contrary.

In Western Ranches v. Custer County (C. C.) 89 Fed. 577, it was held, under an enactment in Montana similar to section 3819 of our Code, that the statute provided a special remedy as to taxes paid under protest, and that a condition to bringing suit, not named in the statute, was not required, and that therefore the claim did not require presentation before suit.

In addition to the foregoing reasons for holding that the presentation of a claim to the board of supervisors is not necessary, attention may be called to the fact that section 3804 of the Political Code, amended in 1913 by the same Legislature that amended section 3819 of the Political Code (Stats. 1913, p. 228, § 3804, and Stats. 1913, p. 948, § 3819) provided two different methods for the recovery of taxes paid. Section 3804 of the Political Code authorized boards of supervisors to return—

"any taxes, penalties or costs thereon heretofore or hereafter paid more than once, or heretofore or hereafter erroneously or illegally collected, or any taxes heretofore or hereafter paid upon an assessment in excess of the actual cash value of the property so assessed by reason of a clerical error of the assessor as to the excess in such cases, or any taxes heretofore or hereafter paid upon an erroneous assessment of improvements on real estate not in fact in existence when said taxes became a lien, may, by order of the board of supervisors, be refunded by the county treasurer. * * * No order for the refund of taxes, penalties or costs under this section shall be made except upon a verified claim therefor verified by the person who has paid said tax, * * * which said claim must be filed within three years after the making of the payment sought to be refunded. * * *"

No similar provision is contained in section 3819. There is no authorization to the board of supervisors to refund taxes recoverable under section 3819 and no provision for the filing of a verified claim for the recovery thereof. The fact that in section 3804 express provision is made for the filing of a verified claim for the recovery of taxes so paid is an indication that the Legislature did not consider that section 4075 included such a claim. In view of the express authorization in section 3804 to the supervisors to refund such taxes erroneously or illegally collected as therein specified, and the omission of a similar provision in section 3819 of the Political Code, it would seem clear that the filing of such a claim was not necessary under the provisions of section 3819 of the Political Code, even if it is permissible for the board of supervisors to make such a payment upon a verified claim in cases where the tax sought to be recovered comes within the purview of both cases. In such cases the remedy provided by the two sections is cumulative. Stewart, etc., Co. v. County of Alameda, 142 Cal. 660, 665, 76 Pac. 481; Brenner v. City of Los Angeles, 160 Cal. 72, 78, 116 Pac. 397; Connelly v. City and County of San Francisco, 164 Cal. 101, 103, 127 Pac. 834. See, also, Perrin v. Honeycutt, 144 Cal. 87, 77 Pac. 776.

In this case, the tax being void, section 3819 applies, and suit is authorized without presentation of a verified claim.

The judgment is reversed.

NUSBICKEL et al. v. STEVENS RANCH CO.

1. Boundaries ⚡46(3)—Boundary established by agreement and acquiescence, where parties were uncertain as to the true location.

When two adjoining owners of land, being uncertain as to the true location of the boundary lying between their contiguous land, agree upon its true location, mark it upon the ground, or build up to it, occupy on each side up to the place thus fixed and acquiesce in such location for a period equal to the period of the statute of limitation, or under such circumstances that substantial loss will be caused by a change of its position, such line becomes, in law, the true line called for by the respective descriptions, regardless of the accuracy of the agreed location as it may appear by subsequent measurements, and notwithstanding that the true position of the dividing line could always have been determined by a correct measurement or by a survey.

2. Boundaries ⚡46(3)—That adjoining owners did not intend to claim land beyond true line held not to preclude them from claiming to agreed line.

The fact that adjoining owners did not intend to claim beyond the true line does not preclude them from claiming to a line which for more than the statutory period of limitations had been the agreed boundary.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Frederick Henry Nusbickel and others against the Stevens Ranch Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Nicols, Cooper & Hickson, of Pomona, for appellant.

Newmire & Watkins, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The defendants appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants to quiet their title to a strip of land lying along the eastern side of the land in their possession.

The real point in dispute at the trial was the location of the dividing line between the plaintiffs' land on the west and the defendants' land on the east. Plaintiffs' land is a part of the southeast quarter of section 34, township 14 north, range 9 west, in Los Angeles county. The defendants' land is the north half of the southwest quarter of section 35 in said township and range. These sections join each other, section 35 being the easterly of the two. The common boundary line between them would be the common boundary line between the lands of the plaintiffs and defendants, respectively. The true line between the sections, according to private resurveys of the official government survey, is the line now claimed as the boundary line by the plaintiffs. The defendants, owning the tract on the east, claim up to a line situated west of that claimed by the plaintiffs, and which has been treated and considered as the dividing line between the two parcels for more than 30 years prior to the beginning of the action. The distance between the two lines is 11.35 feet at the south end and 32.2 feet at the north end.

[1] The law on the subject of agreed boundaries differing from the true line is well settled by the decisions of this court. When two adjoining owners of land, being uncertain as to the true location of the boundary line between their contiguous land, "agree upon its true location, mark it upon the ground, or build up to it, occupy on each side up to the place thus fixed, and acquiesce in such location for a period equal to [the period of] the statute of limitations, or under such circumstances that substantial loss would be caused by a change of its position, such line becomes, in law, the true line called for by the respective descriptions, regardless of the accuracy of the agreed location, as it may appear by subsequent measurements." Young v. Blakeman, 153 Cal. 481, 95 Pac. 890; Loustalot v. McKeel, 157 Cal. 640, 108 Pac. 707; Price v. De Reyes, 161 Cal. 484, 119 Pac. 893; Silva v. Azevedo, 178 Cal. 495, 173 Pac. 929.

The fact that the true position of the dividing line "could always have been determined by a correct measurement," or by a survey, does not prevent there being an uncertainty, within the meaning of this rule, in the minds of the parties as to the position of the line on the ground. "This condition exists in virtually every case in which the aid of the rule is sought." Silva v. Azevedo, 178 Cal. 498, 173 Pac. 930; Loustalot v. McKeel, 157 Cal. 641, 108 Pac. 707; Price v. De Reyes, 161 Cal. 489, 119 Pac. 893.

The land claimed by the plaintiff was originally in the possession of one Marjory Shuler, who entered the same as a homestead about the year 1879. Her death occurred a year or two thereafter, and thereupon her son, Eli W. Shuler, occupied the premises as an entryman under the United States, and subsequently obtained the patent therefor. He remained in possession thereof until 1915, when he conveyed the land to the plaintiffs. The land claimed by the defendants was in the possession of one Cunningham as a pre-emptioner in the year 1880, and in the year 1883 he sold his claim to John A. Stevens, who afterwards received a patent from the United States under his claim as pre-emptioner. When Stevens got possession of the land on the east he put up a fence on the line marked as hereinafter stated. From 1883 until 1917 Stevens and his successors in interest, the defendants herein, occupied the premises, and used and cultivated the same on the easterly side of the fence, and Eli W. Shuler occupied, used, and cultivated the land on the westerly side of the fence until 1915, when he conveyed the same to plaintiffs, and thereafter, until 1917, plaintiffs occupied and used the land up to said fence, but no further, and they did not claim title east of said fence until the year 1917.

The court found that Marjory Shuler, while she was in possession under the United States, employed some person to make a survey to establish a dividing line between the land so occupied by her and that so occupied by Stevens' predecessor in title, and thereupon caused furrows to be plowed along the line of stakes set up by the person employed to make said survey, and that said Stevens' immediate predecessor in title inspected the same and acquiesced in their location; also, that more than 30 years ago a fence was built by Stevens along a part of the line so located as aforesaid, and that thereafter plaintiffs' predecessor, Eli W. Shuler, completed a portion of the same; that thereafter said fence was kept in repair by the respective occupants on both sides thereof, and that it has ever since remained on the line upon which it was originally constructed; that said fence was recognized and accepted by both Stevens and Shuler "so long as they remained the occupants and owners of their respective properties, and was treated by them as being on the line between their respective properties, and each of them occupied and cultivated and farmed the lands on their respective sides of said fence up to the same"; and that said Stevens and Shuler, "so long as they remained the owners of their respective properties, believed that said fence was located upon the true line."

The findings also state that the line so located was not the true location of the section line as laid out by the government surveyors, and that the surveyor employed by Marjory Shuler did not mark the true division line between said sections. The findings also state that there was not at that time any uncertainty in the true location of said line, but that "solely by and through the mistake of said surveyor the said true east line of said section 34 was not ascertained by the plaintiffs' predecessors, or themselves until the year 1917," at which time a new survey disclosed the error. There is another finding that the strip of land between the true section line as subsequently ascertained "and the fence so built and maintained as aforesaid has been, for a long time past, cultivated by the defendants, but that said cultivation was done solely through a mistake in the locating of the said fence line aforesaid, and not otherwise. The court finds that it has never been the intention of the plaintiffs and their predecessors to claim anything east from the east line of said section 34, and that it has never been the intention of the defendants to ever claim any land west of said east line of section 34."

It will be observed that all the findings aforesaid, except the one last mentioned and the one to the effect that there was no uncertainty in the line, bring the case precisely within the rule set forth in the authorities heretofore cited.

The finding that "there was no uncertainty in the true location of the said east line of section 34," at the time the survey was made for Marjory Shuler, must, in view of the other findings, be understood merely as a statement of the abstract proposition that it was possible to ascertain the true location thereof by a correct resurvey of the line as marked by the government surveyors. This finding is immaterial in the application of the doctrine under consideration. The word "uncertainty" is used in the statements of the rule in the decisions to convey the idea that at the time of the location of the division line neither of the coterminous owners knew the true position of the line on the ground. In Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 626, in which the doctrine was first laid down in this state, the word "uncertainty" is not used. Even if the parties knew the position of the government monument at the southeast corner of the section, it would not necessarily follow that they knew the position of the line at a point a quarter of a mile north of that monument, especially where, as in this case, the ground between the north and the south ends of such section line is mountainous and extremely rough and steep. It should be remembered, in applying the doctrine, that it is only resorted to where the line agreed on is different from the true line. It is this fact that creates the necessity for the doctrine. 9 Cor. Jur. 231. The belief of the parties for the long period of 30 years following the location as shown by the findings, is a sufficient reason for the application of the doctrine, so far as that state of mind is essential thereto. The fact that it was founded on a mistake always appears, and must appear, else there would be no occasion to invoke the doctrine.

GUARANTY LOAN CO. et al. v. TREADWELL et al. (Civ. 3905.)

[2] The facts, as found, that the plaintiffs and Shuler never intended to claim anything east of the true section line, and that the defendants never intended to claim anything west of the true section line, may have been taken by the learned judge of the court below to have the effect of nullifying the doctrine above stated concerning the agreed boundary, since otherwise he could not have given judgment for the plaintiffs in the action for the strip of land in controversy. This intention, however, is entirely consistent with the doctrine of agreed boundaries. Having agreed upon the line as the true line, and believing that it is, it follows that neither one would intend to claim any land beyond that line, unless he was dishonest in making the agreement. The finding is therefore wholly without effect to justify the conclusion of law that plaintiffs are the owners of the strip of land in controversy. Our conclusion is that the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs was not justified by the findings.

The judgment is reversed.

1. Corporations ⇨ 283 (1) — Stockholders' meeting and election of directors shown valid.

Evidence, in mandamus by a corporation against its ousted directors and officers, held to show that a meeting of the stockholders of another corporation, the beneficial owner of the stock of the first corporation, was valid, and consequently that the election thereof of a board of directors was regular and valid, so that any subsequent proceedings by the prior board, including the attempted removal of the office of the company, was a nullity.

2. Corporations ⇨ 194—Nominal stockholders cease to be entitled to notice of meeting after demand by beneficial owner for transfer of certificate.

Where the beneficial ownership of all the stock of the L. company was in the E. company, but certificates for 3 shares were issued, 1 to each of three persons, solely to enable them to act as directors of the L. company, they ceased to be stockholders in name in the L. company, and so were not entitled to notice of a subsequent meeting of the stockholders thereof, when pursuant to resolution of the directors of the E. company demand was made on them that they transfer the certificates to certain others; and this though they refused to make the transfer.

3. Corporations ⇨ 194—Notice of stockholders' meeting unnecessary, where all the real stockholders are present and acting.

Notice of stockholders' meeting required by statute is for the benefit of the real stockholders, and so is unnecessary where they are all present and acting.

Application by the Guaranty Loan Company and another for writ of mandate to James W. Treadwell and another. Peremptory writ ordered.

A. E. Shaw and Edwin H. Williams, both of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Fabius T. Finch, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Application for a writ of mandate to compel respondents to deliver over to petitioners papers, seals, and other documents belonging to the above-named corporation.

It is alleged that the company has issued an outstanding capital stock of 324 shares, of which amount 321 shares thereof are in the name of the Goewey Estate Company, the others being issued in three certificates for 1 share each, in the names of James W. Treadwell, Bernard E. Tormey, and R. H. Briare, respectively. These latter shares, it is recited, were issued for the sole purpose of qualifying the person in whose name it stood to act as a director of the corporation, and for no other purpose, the beneficial ownership in the entire stock being in the Goewey Estate Company, which is a holding concern for its subsidiary, the Guaranty Loan Company.

On or about the 16th day of April, 1921, the Goewey Estate Company, by and through resolution duly passed, called a meeting of the board of directors of that concern, and at such meeting ordered and directed that the three certificates for 1 share of stock each in said Guaranty Loan Company standing in the names of the persons aforesaid be canceled and reissued in the names of Edwin H. Williams, Chalmer Munday, and Ernest Gendotti, and that thereafter and prior to April 23, 1921, written demand was served on respondents by said Goewey Estate Company, demanding that respondents transfer said certificate of stock in accordance with said resolution, but that they neglected and refused to comply with such demand, and still do so.

By further allegation it appears that on April 20, 1921, the Goewey Estate Company called a meeting of that concern, and at such meeting ordered and directed that a stockholders' meeting of the Guaranty Loan Company be called at its office located at 607 Bank of Italy building, San Francisco, for the purpose of ousting the board of directors of the Guaranty Loan Company, and electing a new board in its place. At this meeting Edwin H. Williams was duly authorized and empowered to vote the stock of the Goewey Estate Company in the Guaranty Company for the purpose of ousting the old board of directors and electing a new board in its place. Accordingly, on April 25, 1921, a meeting was held, at which time there appeared and was present Edwin H. Williams, said Williams being present as proxy and attorney in fact for the Estate Company, and Williams, Munday and Gendotti representing the remaining 3 shares of the outstanding stock of the Guaranty Company. Notice of the time and place of the meeting was waived, and consent to the holding of such meeting was given in writing by all the stockholders of the company represented as aforesaid. Thereupon, by resolution, Treadwell, Tormey, and Briare were ousted as directors and officers, and Williams, Munday, and Gendotti were chosen in their place. Immediately thereafter Williams was elected president and Munday secretary and they ever since have been and now are the duly acting president and secretary of such company. At this last-mentioned meeting a resolution was passed, instructing the president to demand and receive the books, records, papers, and seal of the corporation, and empowering him to do any and all acts necessary to procure possession of the same. Then follow allegations of demand on respondents for the records and their refusal to comply therewith, which are followed by allegations that petitioners will suffer damage in consequence of such refusal.

Respondents by their return deny that the office of the Guaranty Loan Company was or is now located at the place mentioned, and allege in this connection that on April 12, 1921, and at all times subsequent thereto, it was and is located at the Hotel Wilson, No. 125 Mason street, and except as to the beneficial ownership of all of the stock of the Guaranty Loan Company being in the Goewey Estate Company, the allegations of the petition hereinabove enumerated, are denied. They further plead that no notice was ever given to them or R. M. Briare of any alleged or called meeting of the Guaranty Loan Company, notwithstanding, as they assert, that they and Briare were and had been continuously for more than ten days prior thereto stockholders of record of said company, and that no notice of any meeting was ever given as required by sections 301 or 310 of the Civil Code, or otherwise.

[1] The case is another of the many actions brought by the Goewey Estate Company and its subsidiary companies involving their internal management. It appears from the record that Williams and Gendotti, who control the new board of directors of the Goewey Estate Company, own out of the 1,000 shares of the issued stock of that corporation 598 shares thereof, and that respondents own 50 shares, and further, that all of the capital stock of the Guaranty Loan Company is owned by the Goewey Estate Company. The situation is thus presented of the minority stockholders seeking to control the affairs of the involved corporations. The solution of the situation depends for the most part upon the validity of the meeting of the Goewey Estate Company in April, 1921. A review of those proceedings therefore becomes necessary. It appears in evidence that a stockholders' meeting of that company was held on the 11th day of April, 1921, at its place of business, 607 Bank of Italy building, San Francisco. On that day the meeting was called to order by Treadwell, the then president of the company, and B. B. Tormey acted as secretary. The roll of stockholders being called, Williams answered as being the holder of 349 shares of the capital stock of that company and Gendotti answered as holding 249 shares, Tormey as holding 1 share and Treadwell as holding 50 shares.

Immediately after the calling of the meeting, Treadwell presented to Gendotti a restraining order issued in an action pending in the superior court by the Goewey Investment Company, another subsidiary concern of the Goewey Estate Company. This order restrained Gendotti from voting his stock at the meeting, the ownership of which was questioned in the action referred to. Upon receiving the injunction, all parties seem to have been under the impression that the writ was directed against the meeting, and that an adjournment was necessary. Upon examining the order, however, Williams ascertained therefrom that such was not its purpose, and he thereupon announced that, a quorum being present, the meeting could proceed to the election of a board of directors. He then opposed a motion to adjourn put by Treadwell, but his right to do so was denied. Williams appealed from this ruling, voting his 349 shares of stock in support thereof, which shares constituted a majority vote. Notwithstanding this action on the part of Williams, Treadwell declared the meeting adjourned, Williams voting his stock against such adjournment. Treadwell and Tormey then left the meeting. Williams thereupon nominated himself chairman, and nominated and elected himself, Gendotti, and Tormey as directors, voting his majority stock in both instances. The meeting was then adjourned until April 16, 1921. The injunction in the meantime had been dissolved. The adjourned meeting was held, and the election of directors had on the meeting of April 11, 1921, was confirmed, Williams and Gendotti voting their 598 shares in favor of a resolution to that effect. To save all question and out of precaution, a new election was again held at this adjourned meeting, both Williams and Gendotti voting their stock for the same directors elected previously. From this evidence we think it clearly appears that the meeting of April 11, 1921, was a valid one, and that the election of the Williams board at that time was consequently regular and valid. This being so, any subsequent proceeding had by the Treadwell board, including their attempted removal of the office of the company, was a mere nullity.

[2, 3] We are of the further opinion that the evidence shows that the members of the Treadwell board received the demands made by the Williams board to transfer the stock held by them in the Guaranty & Loan Company, in accordance with the resolution of that company. Upon receiving these notices respondents ceased to be stockholders in name in the company, and were therefore no longer concerned with its management, and they were not entitled to notice of the meeting held by it on April 25, 1921, of the absence of which they complain. Even assuming that the giving of notice of such meeting was necessary, where, as here, all of the stock was present and represented, they owned no beneficial interest in the stock, and were therefore not such parties who could complain. See 14 Corpus Juris, p. 894. Statutes requiring notice are for the benefit of the real stockholders, and this necessity does not arise when all are present and acting. Thompson on Corporations, p. 1009, § 824. Nor does the fact that respondents refused to make the transfer avail them. Their refusal was wrongful, and they cannot profit thereby. Guaranty Loan Co. v. Fontanel, 190 Pac. 177.

Further discussion is unnecessary. It is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue, commanding respondents to turn over to petitioners the records, papers, seal, and other documents belonging to said corporation petitioner.

MARKS v. JOS. H. RUCKER & CO.
(Civ. 3794.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. July 16, 1921.)

1. Principal and agent ⇨ 136(1)—Agent not liable if party dealing with him had actual knowledge of principal's identity.

To relieve an agent from liability to one dealing with him, it is sufficient that such person have actual knowledge, however acquired, of the identity of the principal.

2. Brokers ⇨ 106—Buyer, seeking to recover purchase money paid to agent, must sue principal.

Whether or not an agent to whom was paid a sum of money to be applied on the purchase price of an apartment belonging to his principals paid over such sum to them, the remedy of the buyer, seeking to recover such amount, on rescinding the contract, because of the agent's false representations, is against the principals, not the agent, in the absence of proof that they were undisclosed, or that the parties intended to rely on the agent's personal responsibility; such amount being the property of the sellers regardless of whether it had been actually paid over to them at the time of the action.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Abram M. Marks against Jos. H. Rucker & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Lent & Humphrey, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Joseph E. Bien, and Abram M. Marks, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an action by the assignee of Mrs. K. F. Merrill and Mrs. O. J. Schwab to recover $500, alleged to be money had and received by the defendant for the use and benefit of said assignors.

The facts of the case are: Mrs. Schwab and Mrs. Merrill had agreed to become partners in the enterprise of purchasing a furnished apartment house in San Francisco. Mrs. Merrill had been negotiating with the defendant company, as agent, for the purchase of various apartments in the city, and had made offers upon some of these and deposited sums of money in accordance with such offers, all of which offers had been rejected by the owners, and on that account her various deposits had been returned to her from time to time. Mrs. Merrill discussed with Mr. Chambers, who was acting for the defendant company, the matter of the purchase by her of the Martinique Apartment House in San Francisco. Mr. Chambers testified that Mrs. Merrill told him at that time that she was thoroughly familiar with this apartment house, and had been through it with another agent, but wished to deal with the defendant company, and in order to avoid liability for commissions to the first agent she desired the contract to be signed by her partner, Mrs. Schwab, and not by herself. Mrs. Schwab corroborates this testimony of Mr. Chambers, testifying to substantially the same facts with relation to this matter. The contract was accordingly taken to Mrs. Schwab by the agent, and she signed it. Mrs. Merrill gave her check for $500 as a deposit upon the purchase price. Mr. Chambers also testified that Mrs. Merrill discussed with him the reasons why the sellers, Mesdames Splane and Warford, were selling their property. He stated that Mrs. Merrill was aware that the sale was being made because of a disagreement between said owners, and was thoroughly informed about the condition of the property and of its furnishings. Mrs. Merrill contradicts this testimony in part, and states that at the time of making the deposit she had only seen the portion of the apartment house which was occupied by the manager's office. She testified that she had gone to this office with a friend. She was asked:

"Up to that time (the time of making the deposit) had you seen the house other than a visit to the owners of the apartment? A. No, I had not."

She also testified that when Mr. Chambers first spoke to her of this apartment house she told him that she "had been in the house a few days previously with a lady who was calling on one of the managers; I was in the manager's apartment only." She was asked in her deposition if Mr. Chambers had said anything to her about seeing the house. She answered:

"No. * * * Q. Did you ever see that house? A. I saw it afterwards. Q. When? A. First with Mrs. Schwab and Mr. Bernhard. Q. That is the first time? A. Yes, after going in with a lady to call on the owner of the building in her apartments."

From the foregoing it appears that Mrs. Merrill had visited the owner and manager of the building before Mr. Chambers began his negotiations for the sale of the property, and must have been aware of the identity of the principal for whom the agent was dealing. Furthermore, Mr. Chambers testified positively that he had told Mrs. Merrill who were the owners of the Martinique Apartments, and this statement is nowhere contradicted in the record.

[1] It therefore appears that plaintiff's assignors were informed by the agent of the names of its principals. But even though we were to assume that the names of the principals were not actually disclosed to the purchasers by the agent, nevertheless it is apparent from the record that the identity of such principals was known to the purchasers from Mrs. Merrill's previous visit to the owner of the apartment house, and that they contracted with the defendant merely as an agent. To relieve the agent of liability, it is sufficient that the other contracting party have actual knowledge of the identity of the principal; it is immaterial how such knowledge was acquired. Chase v. Debolt, 2 Gilman (Ill.) 371; Forrest v. McCarthy, 30 Misc. Rep. 125, 61 N. Y. Supp. 853; Johnson v. Cate, 77 Vt. 218, 59 Atl. 830.

There is absolutely no evidence in the record that the defendant dealt with plaintiff's assignors as a principal, or that the parties intended that he should be held personally liable. On the contrary, the offer contained in the letter signed by Mrs. Schwab, which was later accepted by the owners of the apartment, and became the contract of purchase, was addressed to "Jos. H. Rucker & Co., Agent," and stated, "I hereby offer to purchase through you as agent. * * *"

[2] It is claimed in the present action that the plaintiff's assignors rescinded this contract of purchase because the furnishings of the house were not as represented by the defendant, as agent of the owners. The testimony concerning the condition and value of the furniture was conflicting, and it would be improper to discuss it here, because of the fact that, under our view of the case, a retrial will be necessary, at which time the testimony upon this question may vary somewhat from the testimony in the present record. But, merely for the purposes of this opinion, let us assume that the testimony shows facts warranting a rescission of the contract. Under such circumstances, it is apparent that the remedy is against the principal and not against the agent. Respondent attempts to support the judgment against the agent by invoking the rule applied in case of undisclosed principals, but the facts heretofore recited clearly show that the present case is not one of an undisclosed principal; nor is it a case where the parties intended to contract relying upon the personal responsibility of the agent.

Whether or not the agent has paid over this $500 to his principal, or whether or not he yet retains it, is immaterial, and there is no evidence in the record upon this point. The agent did not produce a purchaser ready to buy, and has not earned the commission of $500 agreed to be paid him by the sellers in their written acceptance of the offer of purchase, and is therefore not entitled to retain such sum. The $500 paid by the purchaser was paid to the agent to be applied by it upon the purchase price of the apartment. It was so stated in the contract of purchase and in the receipt given for the money. This amount is therefore legally, the property of the sellers, regardless of whether it had been actually paid over to them or not at the time of the present action. If the purchasers desire to recover back their deposit upon a rescission of their contract to purchase, the question of whether or not they had legal grounds for a rescission of such contract would be an issue to be tried between them and the owners of the apartment, on whose behalf and in whose interests the representations regarding the apartment were made by the agent, and the action should have been brought against such owners.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

53 Cal. App. 545

BRASHER v. WHITE. (Civ. 2286.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 15, 1921.)

1. Judgment ☞ 163—Merits not tried on motion to set aside default.

Merits of the action cannot be tried on affidavits on motion by defendant to set aside default judgment; the only question being whether or not the affidavit of the defendant of merits is sufficient in form and statement of facts.

2. Judgment ☞ 160—Affidavit of merits held sufficient in form and substance; "action"; "cause of action."

An affidavit of merits, filed with a motion by defendant to set aside a default judgment, held sufficient in form and substance; a statement that defendant stated to his attorney "all the facts pertaining or relating to said action" being the equivalent of the statement that he has so stated "all the facts of the case" to his attorney, and the term "action" meaning the "cause of action" stated in the complaint, and the phrase "cause of action" in law being generally understood as meaning the whole cause of action; that is, every fact which is material to be proved to entitle the plaintiff to succeed, and which the defendant would have the right to traverse.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Action; Cause of Action.]

3. Judgment ☞ 139—Statute making vacation of defaults discretionary liberally construed.

While applications for relief from default judgments under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, on the ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, are addressed to the discretion of the trial court, with which discretion when once exercised in a case interference by a reviewing court will not be justified, except upon a satisfactory showing that it has been abused, still the provisions of the section, like all others of the Code, are to be liberally construed, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice, in view of section 4.

4. Judgment ☞ 139—Court abused discretion in refusing to set aside default.

Where defendant delivered copy of summons and complaint to attorney, and erroneously informed him as to the date of service, and by reason thereof attorney did not appear and prepare and file papers in defense within time, and default judgment was taken, held that court abused its discretion in denying motion to set aside the default judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by F. F. Brasher against E. J. White. From an order refusing to set aside a default judgment, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Chester A. Pinkham, of San Francisco, for appellant.

David Cosgrave, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. The defendant having failed to answer or demur to the plaintiff's complaint herein within due legal time, a default therefor and thereupon a judgment were entered against him.

It appears that the default of the defendant for his failure to answer or demur to the complaint and judgment upon such default were entered against him upon the 13th day of September, 1920; that the defendant first received information of the default and the judgment having been entered on the 24th day of September, 1920, and that, on the 27th day of September, 1920—three days after the receipt of notice of said default—upon the authority of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, he filed and served upon the plaintiff a notice that he would, on the 11th day of October, 1920, move the court for an order setting aside said default and said judgment. The motion was heard, being supported by affidavits and the records and files of the case, and the same was denied. This appeal the defendant prosecutes from the order denying said motion.

The action was brought by plaintiff by an unverified complaint to recover the sum of $1,180.92, being the balance alleged to be due him on account of services performed and moneys paid out by him to meet the current expenses in managing as superintendent the ranch of defendant in San Joaquin county, which services and moneys were so performed and disbursed "at the special instance and request" of the defendant. The complaint also counts on two other distinct claims against the defendant, which, it is alleged, were assigned to the plaintiff by the respective owners thereof prior to the commencement of the action.

The affidavits filed with the motion to open the default were by the defendant and his attorney, Chester A. Pinkham, and the facts as stated therein are not controverted by the plaintiff.

The affidavit of defendant is, in substance, as follows:

That at the time of the commencement of this action and ever since said time he has resided in the city and county of San Francisco, and that at no time did he ever reside in the county of San Joaquin; that the plaintiff in said action well knew that at the time of the commencement of said action defendant was a resident of said city and county; that in the month of August, 1920, the summons and the copy of the complaint in this action were served upon this defendant in the city and county of San Francisco, and that "within two or three days" after such service, and on or before the 19th day of August, 1920, he took the copy of the summons and complaint so served upon him to his attorney, Mr. Chester A. Pinkham, at his office, which was located in said city; that at that time defendant retained said Pinkham as his attorney, and instructed him to appear for him in this action and to answer the complaint herein and to make such motions in the action as he might deem proper; that he delivered to said Pinkham a copy of said summons and complaint, and "believed that he had informed his said attorney that the same were served on the 7th day of August, 1920, but that he is now informed that his said attorney inadvertently and mistakenly supposed and believed that this defendant stated to him that the date of service was on the 17th day of August, 1920, and that his said attorney by reason of inadvertence and mistake misunderstood this defendant, and believed and understood that the said summons and complaint had been served upon this defendant on the 17th day of August, 1920, instead of on the 7th day of August, 1920; that this defendant's said attorney undertook and agreed to appear for said defendant in said action within the time allowed by law therefor; that thereafter and on sundry occasions between the 19th day of August, 1920, and the 14th day of September, 1920, the said Chester A. Pinkham informed this defendant that he had until the 16th day of September, 1920, within which to plead or appear in said action, and that he would see that the proper papers and pleadings were prepared and filed in due and sufficient time, and that this defendant relied upon said promises and undertaking of his said attorney, and because of the advice and statements of his said attorney this defendant at all times believed that he had until the 16th day of September, 1920, within which to plead or appear in said action; that this defendant at all times desired and intended to contest the plaintiff's cause of action; that this defendant, at the time of employing said Chester A. Pinkham as his attorney to defend said action, fully and truly and fairly stated to said Chester A. Pinkham all the facts pertaining or relating to said action, or to this affiant's defense thereto, and that this defendant was then informed by his said attorney * * * that he had a good and meritorious defense to said action, and that this defendant has been advised by his said attorney, and he verily believes and now states, that he has a good and sufficient defense to said action on the merits."

The defendant further deposes:

That he believed and understood at all times that his attorney would appear in said action at the proper time and plead to the complaint therein, and would do all things necessary and proper for the purpose of pleading to the complaint in said action within the time allowed to this defendant by law therefor. That prior to the 14th day of September, 1920, his said attorney prepared on behalf of the defendant the following papers in said action, to wit: A demurrer of this defendant to the complaint in said action; a demand upon the plaintiff in said action for a bill of particulars; a notice of motion for change of place of trial of said action; an affidavit as to the residence of this defendant; an affidavit of merits; and a demand for change of place of trial of said action. That each of said papers was on the 14th day of September, 1920, subscribed to by deponent, and the affidavits were sworn to before a notary public in said city and county of San Francisco, and each and all of said documents delivered to the said attorney for the defendant. That on the same day the said attorney signed each of the documents or papers just named as the attorney for defendant, and mailed the same to the clerk of the county of San Joaquin, in which county the action was instituted, together with the sum of $5 as the clerk's fee for filing the same. That each and all of said papers were received by said county clerk and filed in his office in this action on the 16th day of September, 1920. That the attorney for the plaintiff, Samuel K. King, was, at the time of the commencement of the action, and at all times mentioned in the affidavit, a resident of and maintained and had his office at Escalon, in the said county of San Joaquin. That on said 15th day of September, 1920, a full, true, and correct copy of each and all of the aforesaid documents and papers was mailed in the city and county of San Francisco to the said Samuel K. King by inclosing the same in a sealed envelope addressed to the said King at his office in the said town of Escalon and by depositing the same so inclosed in said sealed envelope addressed as aforesaid, with the postage thereon fully prepaid in the United States post office in said city and county of San Francisco. That on the 16th day of September, 1920, "the said clerk of the county of San Joaquin wrote to the said attorney for this defendant in San Francisco, and acknowledged receipt of said clerk's fee of $5, and informed this defendant's said attorney that the said demurrer and other papers had been filed in said action on said 16th day of September, 1920, and did not mention or state that any default had been entered in said action against said defendant. That thereafter, and on the 21st day of September, 1920, this defendant, by and through his said attorney, sent to the said county clerk $2 as and for the calendar fee in said action for placing the said demurrer of this defendant upon the calendar of said court for hearing. That on the 23d day of September, 1920, the said county clerk wrote to the said attorney for the defendant, acknowledging the receipt of said calendar fee, and stating that a default had been filed and entered on September 13, 1920, in said action, and that a judgment had been entered upon said default. That the said letter of said county clerk was not received by said attorney for said defendant until the 24th day of September, 1920. That neither the defendant nor his said attorney had any notice, information, or knowledge concerning said default or the entry of any judgment thereon until said letter from said county clerk was received by said attorney for this defendant on said 24th day of September, 1920. That immediately upon receiving the same the said attorney for this defendant wrote to this defendant and notified him of the fact that a default had been entered in said action, and that said notice was not received by this defendant until to-day, and not until this date did the defendant have any knowledge or information concerning the said default. That at all times up to the present time this defendant verily believed that his said attorney had appeared and pleaded in said action within the time allowed by law therefor, and that neither this defendant nor his said attorney knew or had any reason to believe that any default had been entered in said action until the said letter from said county clerk was received by said attorney for this defendant on the 24th day of September, 1920."

The defendant further deposes:

That the demurrer and the motion for a change of place of trial of this action were made and filed in good faith; that, "without waiving his said demurrer to the said complaint, and without prejudice to said demurrer, this defendant by and through his said attorney, has prepared his answer to the said complaint in said action, and his cross-complaint against the said plaintiff in said action, and that a copy of the said answer and cross-complaint of this defendant is attached hereto, and is hereby referred to and made part hereof; and that this defendant proposes to file the said answer and cross-complaint in said action; that the said default of this defendant in said action, and the said judgment by default taken against this defendant in said action, were entered and taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect."

The attorney for defendant, in his affidavit, states:

That the defendant called upon affiant at his office in the city and county of San Francisco, and delivered to him a copy of the summons and complaint in this action and then and there stated to affiant that the said summons and copy of said complaint had been served on him (defendant) in the city and county of San Francisco; that this affiant thereupon asked said defendant the date of said service, and that this affiant understood the said defendant to reply that the said papers had been served upon him on the 17th day of August, 1920, "and thereupon this affiant immediately made a memorandum upon the back of said copy of said summons which reads as follows: 'Served on White in S. F. Aug. 17/20'—and made in his office register of the proceedings in the above-entitled action the following entry, to wit: 'Aug. 17, 1920, summons and complaint served on defendant in S. F.'; that the said notation and entry were made by this affiant because this affiant understood the said defendant to say that the 17th of August was the date upon which said summons and complaint were served upon him, but this affiant is now for the first time informed by said defendant that the said defendant said the '7th and not the 17th,' but this affiant at all times from and including the date on which the said copy of said summons and complaint were delivered by said defendant to this affiant, and from and including the 19th day of August, 1920, verily believed and understood that the date on which the said summons and complaint were served upon the said defendant was the 17th day of August, 1920; that at no time prior to the 24th day of September, 1920, did this affiant have any information, notice, knowledge, or understanding which would lead him to believe, or which did lead him to believe or suspect, that he was mistaken in understanding that the said summons and complaint had been served upon said defendant on the 17th day of August, 1920; * * * that until September 24, 1920, this affiant never had any reason to believe or suspect that he had misunderstood said defendant, or that the entry made in his office register or indorsed on said copy of said summons, was erroneous."

The attorney further deposes:

That, in pursuance of instructions from the defendant given on the said 19th day of August, 1920, to prepare the necessary papers for an appearance in said action, he did thereafter, and between the 10th and 14th days of September, 1920, prepare on behalf of said defendant the demurrer and other papers above mentioned; that, laboring under the honest belief, based upon his misunderstanding of the defendant in stating to him the day upon which the summons and copy of complaint were served, that he still had time within which to file said papers and appear in said action on behalf of defendant, he mailed each and all of said aforesaid papers, properly subscribed and sworn to on the 15th day of September, 1920, to the clerk of the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, to wit, the county clerk of said county, and served by mail a copy of each and all of said papers upon attorney for plaintiff in said action; "and that a full, true, and correct copy of each and all of said papers was actually received in Escalon, San Joaquin county, Cal., by the plaintiff's attorney on the 16th day of September, 1920, and that each and all of said original papers were actually filed in the above-entitled action, and in said court on said 16th day of September, 1920, and that each and all of said papers are now on file in said court in said action, and are hereby referred to and made a part hereof." The attorney's affidavit then proceeds with a statement of facts corroborative of the statement of defendant in his affidavit as to the sending of the $2 calendar fee for placing the demurrer on the calendar of the court for hearing, and the receipt of a letter by him thereafter from the county clerk of San Joaquin county, stating that a default had been entered in said action on September 13, 1920, against the defendant, and that a judgment had on said day been entered upon said default. The attorney also deposes that the said defendant at all times relied upon him to make the appropriate appearance in this action; " * * * that because of said mistake and inadvertence of this affiant he believed that the 16th day of September, 1920, was within 30 days from the date of such service, and that he acted accordingly, and informed and advised the said defendant that the said papers would be served and filed within the time allowed by law therefor; and that the said judgment in the above-entitled action was taken within said date through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect."

The answer (unverified) proffered by the defendant, and which, with an unverified cross-complaint, likewise proffered, was filed with the papers and affidavits on the motion to set aside the default, specifically denied each and every material allegation of the complaint, except the allegation that defendant had, during the period referred to in the complaint, paid the plaintiff the sum of $2,557.46, which said sum, so the answer stated, was in full payment of any and all indebtedness of the defendant to plaintiff, and except also that, as to one of the claims alleged in the complaint to have been assigned by the owner thereof to plaintiff, of which it is said in the answer that full satisfaction thereof was made by defendant prior to the commencement of plaintiff's action.

The cross-complaint referred to above alleges that, upon the representations of plaintiff that he was a farming engineer and skilled in agricultural and horticultural pursuits, and in all matters pertaining to the planting and cultivation of fruit trees, and, relying upon the representations so made, the defendant entered into an agreement with plaintiff, whereby the latter agreed, for a certain specified consideration, to furnish, set out, and plant upon the ranch of defendant, in San Joaquin county, white Adriatic fig trees and such other trees and vines as the defendant might desire, and that he would skillfully and properly cultivate and irrigate the same for one year. It is then charged, with considerable detail, that the plaintiff negligently failed to cultivate properly said ranch for the purposes stated, and that, although there was conveniently available for the proper irrigation of the trees which the cross-complaint states that plaintiff did plant on said ranch, an ample supply of water, the plaintiff negligently failed to irrigate said trees, or any of them, properly; that by reason of such failure and neglect on the part of plaintiff in the carrying out of his part of said agreement the defendant was damaged in the sum of $5,000, for which, by way of affirmative relief, defendant prayed judgment as against the plaintiff.

The defendant, after the motion was partly heard, filed by leave of the court, a supplementary affidavit, correcting his original affidavit, in the following particular: That, in his former affidavit, he deposed that he delivered the summons and copy of the complaint to his attorney "two or three days after said summons and complaint had been served," whereas he should have deposed, and intended to depose, that he gave the documents named over to his attorney "within a few days after" the service thereof upon him. This inaccuracy, he further stated in his supplementary affidavit, was due to the fact that he was greatly harassed by business reverses and financial losses and difficulties, "and was sick and under great mental strain and threatened with a nervous breakdown," and as a consequence was unable properly to attend to his business or personal affairs. He, however, stated therein that, notwithstanding his mental and physical condition as so described, he did deliver the summons and copy of the complaint to his attorney on the 19th day of August, 1920.

Thus there has been presented a résumé of the showing made by the defendant on his motion for an order opening up the default entered against him. To that showing there was not, as before stated, a counter showing made or attempted. The plaintiff, though, did file an affidavit, but therein he did not deny or controvert, or make any attempt at or pretense of denying or controverting, the facts set out in the affidavits filed by the defendant. Said affidavit amounted only to this: (1) An attempted impeachment of the statement contained in the defendant's later affidavit as to his mental and physical condition at the time the summons and the copy of the complaint were served upon him; (2) the negating of the defendant's claim, as set forth in his proposed answer to the complaint, that one of the assigned claims counted on in the complaint had been fully satisfied before plaintiff commenced his action; (3) reaffirming the validity of another of the assigned claims alleged in the complaint; and (4) justification for the alleged cutting down, destruction of, and carrying away from defendant's ranch and converting to his own use certain live oak trees and timber growing on said ranch, without accounting to defendant therefor, as set out in detail in the cross-complaint as a part of the second cause of action for affirmative relief to defendant.

[1] It is plainly manifest that the statements embraced in the affidavit of the plaintiff are wholly without relevancy to the issue before the court in this proceeding. They do not bear upon the question at issue, to wit: Whether the defendant's failure to appear in the action in legal time was or was not excusable. Indeed, the affidavit, in the latter part thereof, contained averments which are addressed to the merits of the action, and in effect constituted an attempt to try the merits of the controversy as it is stated in the complaint in this proceeding by way of affidavits. The rule that the merits of the action cannot thus be tried is not only sound in principle, but has been time and again affirmed and reaffirmed by the cases. See Francis v. Cox, 33 Cal. 323; Gracier v. Weir, 45 Cal. 53; Douglass v. Todd, 96 Cal. 655, 31 Pac. 623, 31 Am. St. Rep. 247; Rauer's Law & Collection Co. v. Gilleran, 138 Cal. 352, 71 Pac. 445.

[2] That the affidavit of merits made by the defendant is sufficient in form, as well as in the statement of facts, there can be no doubt. The affidavit, it will be noted, declares that—

Defendant "fully and truly and fairly stated to said Chester A. Pinkham [his attorney] all the facts pertaining or relating to said action, or to this affiant's defense thereto, and that this defendant was then informed by his said attorney * * * that he had a good and meritorious defense to said action, and that this affiant has been advised by his said attorney, and he verily believes and now states, that he has a good and sufficient defense to said action on the merits."

The statement that affiant (defendant) has stated to his attorney "all the facts pertaining or relating to said action" is the equivalent of the statement that he has so stated "all the facts of the case" to his attorney. The term "action," as used in the affidavit, means the "cause of action" stated in the complaint, and the phrase "cause of action," in law, is generally understood as meaning the whole cause of action—that is, every fact which is material to be proved to entitle the plaintiff to succeed, and which the defendant would have the right to traverse. 1 Cyc. p. 641; Cooke v. Gill, L. R. 8 C. P. 107. In Larocque v. Conhaim, 45 Misc. Rep. 234, 92 N. Y. Supp. 99, the affidavit of merits read:

"Deponent has fully and fairly stated his defense to said action and all the facts relative thereto to his counsel."

The court held that the word "thereto" referred to the word "action," and that the word "action" is in law synonymous with the word "case"; hence, so the court proceeded, the clause should read, "and all the facts relative to the action, i. e., 'case.'" See, also, Hughes Mfg. & L. Co. v. Elliott, 167 Cal. 494, 500, 140 Pac. 17; Carter v. Broder, 194 Pac. 527.

The single question here, then, is: Did the court below remain within the bounds of a reasonable judicial discretion, or did it transcend such bounds in its order denying the defendant relief upon the showing made? A painstaking consideration of the record has persuaded us to the conclusion that the court below, upon the uncontroverted showing made by the defendant, should have relieved him from the serious consequences which would necessarily follow from the default entered against him should it be permitted to stand.

[3] While applications for relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, on the ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, are addressed to the discretion of the trial court, with which discretion, when once exercised in a case, interference by a reviewing court will not be justified except upon a satisfactory showing that it has been abused, still the provisions of the section, like all others of the Code, are to be "liberally construed with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice." Civ. Code Proc. § 4. The particular provision of said section upon the authority of which the defendant asks for relief is of a remedial nature, and the design of the entire section was to enable the courts to call into requisition their equitable powers in this respect, and thus authorize them, where it is manifest that it is only in furtherance of justice to do so, to relieve against an honestly made mistake or an inadvertence or excusable neglect.

From the very earliest history of the jurisprudence of California to the present time it has been held that the power vested by section 473 in the nisi prius courts should be freely and liberally exercised by said courts to the end that they might "mold and direct its proceedings, so as to dispose of cases upon their substantial merits, and without unreasonable delay, regarding mere technicalities as obstacles to be avoided, rather than as principles to which effect is to be given in derogation of substantial right." Roland v. Kreyenhagen, 18 Cal. 455.

The case of Reidy v. Scott, 53 Cal. 69, is as to the facts quite similar to the present case. There the defendant was served with process in Merced county, where the suit was pending, on April 25th, and delivered the papers to his attorneys in San Jose a few days thereafter, and erroneously stated to them that the service was on the 26th. The attorneys, acting on the information so given them, prepared an answer and sent it to Merced by express in time to reach that place on the morning of the 7th of May, which would have been ample time in which an appearance could have been made by the defendant in the action. The answer was given to the clerk shortly after 9 o'clock on the morning of the 7th, but default had just been entered, and the motion by defendant to set aside the default was denied by the court, and on appeal the Supreme Court held that, since the affidavit of merits disclosed a meritorious defense to the action, the defendant under the circumstances should have been relieved of his default, and reversed and remanded the cause.

In Mitchell v. California, etc., S. S. Co., 156 Cal. 576, 578, 579, 103 Pac. 590, 592, the court in reversing an order denying defendant's motion for relief under section 473, said:

"The tendency of this court has always been to relieve parties from their defaults and mistakes, upon proper showing, to the end that matters may be heard upon the merits. Treating of this subject, and particularly of the interpretation of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the following language was used by this court in Nicoli v. Weldon, 130 Cal. 667, 63 Pac. 64: 'Section 473 * * * is a remedial provision, and is to be liberally construed so as to dispose of cases upon their substantial merits, and to give to the party claiming in good faith to have a substantial defense to the action an opportunity to present it. Buell v. Emerich, 85 Cal. 116, 24 Pac. 644; Harbaugh v. Honey Lake, etc., Water Co., 109 Cal. 70, 41 Pac. 792; Melde v. Reynolds, 129 Cal. 308, 61 Pac. 932. It is for this reason that we more readily listen to an appeal from an order refusing to set aside a default, than where the motion has been granted, since in such case the defendant may be deprived of a substantial right, whereas it may be assumed, if nothing to the contrary is shown, that the plaintiff will be able at any time to establish his cause of action. If, for any reason, he will be unable to do so, that fact should be made to appear; but if he is merely subjected to delay or inconvenience by having the default set aside, he can be compensated therefor by the terms which the court would impose as a condition to granting the motion.'"

In addition to the authorities above mentioned, we cite the following upon the proposition in hand: Vinson v. Los Angeles Pac. R. R. Co., 147 Cal. 479, 483, 82 Pac. 53; O'Brien v. Leach, 139 Cal. 220, 72 Pac. 1004, 96 Am. St. Rep. 105; Watson v. San Francisco & Humboldt Bay R. R. Co., 41 Cal. 17; Grady v. Donahoo, 108 Cal. 211, 41 Pac. 41; Jergins v. Schenck, 162 Cal. 747, 748, 124 Pac. 426.

[4] As shown there was no attempt by plaintiff at contradicting the showing made by the defendant, and we know of no just reason why, upon the record as it thus stands in this proceeding, he should not be granted the relief he has asked for. To the contrary, it seems to us, from the face of the showing made, that the denial of relief would not be in furtherance of justice. The answer and the cross-complaint proposed by defendant are attached to the defendant's affidavit of merits, and are by proper reference made a part thereof, and while those pleadings are not themselves verified (for the reason, no doubt, that the complaint is not verified), they are nevertheless as much a part of defendant's affidavit as any other statement of facts contained therein. They themselves are a sufficient affidavit of merits—that is, they clearly show upon their face that the defendant not only has a defense to the merits of the action but is entitled to affirmative relief as against the plaintiff. Moreover, they clearly disclose the good faith of the defendant in making his application to be relieved from the default.

The fact should also be emphasized that there was no delay on the part of the defendant in applying for relief against the default, for he gave notice of his intention to apply for such relief on the 27th day of September, 1920, three days after the receipt of information by him and his attorney that the default had been entered.

Our conclusion, as previously stated, is that the learned trial court went beyond the limits of a sound judicial discretion in refusing the defendant relief in this proceeding, and the order appealed from is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to the court below to grant the defendant the relief asked for by him upon such terms as may be just and equitable.

SAN RAMON VALLEY BANK v. WALDEN CO. et al. (Civ. 3864.)

1. Corporations ⇨415—Mortgage executed by officers of corporation held authorized.

Officers of a corporation, authorized by resolution of the directors to execute a mortgage for $1,000 to secure a temporary loan, which the resolution showed was to be repaid by loan of $1,500 from another party with whom they were then negotiating, held authorized to execute a mortgage securing the loan for $1,500.

2. Corporations ⇨432(4)—Presence of seal prima facie evidence of power of officers affixing it to documents.

The presence of the seal of a corporation is prima facie evidence of the power of the officers affixing it to transact the business evidenced by the documents to which the seal is affixed.

3. Corporations ⇨425(4)—Vendees held estopped to deny validity of a mortgage executed by vendor.

Where purchasers from a corporation agreed that vendor might execute a mortgage for $1,500 on the premises, which they agreed to assume and pay as part of the consideration, they are estopped to deny the validity of the mortgage for want of power in the vendor's officers to execute it.

4. Corporations ⇨482(6)—Findings held sufficient to support judgment of foreclosure of mortgage by corporation.

Findings that plaintiff made to defendant corporation a loan secured by mortgage to the full amount of $1,500, and that the sum of $1,250 remained due and unpaid thereon, is sufficient to support a judgment of foreclosure against the corporation and subsequent purchasers.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. L. Latimer, Judge.

Action by the San Ramon Valley Bank, a corporation, against the Walden Company, a corporation, and R. S. N. Burdick and wife. From a judgment of foreclosure for plaintiff, defendants Burdick appeal. Affirmed.

J. N. Young, of Oakland, for appellants.

J. E. Rodgers, and A. F. Bray, both of Martinez, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action was instituted for the foreclosure of two mortgages covering a tract of land described as lot 21 in the Walden tract in the county of Contra Costa. The first of these mortgages was one purporting to have been executed by the Walden Company, a corporation, to the plaintiff herein on May 1, 1918, as security for a promissory note for the sum of $1,500; the second mortgage was one executed on November 25, 1918, by the Walden Company to one C. R. Hook, as security for its promissory note for the sum of $250, which last-named note and mortgage were assigned to the plaintiff herein on December 20, 1918. The defendants R. S. N. Burdick and Mary Burdick, his wife, who are the appellants herein, appeared in said action and filed their answer therein, setting forth certain defenses which they are now urging upon this appeal. A consideration of these defenses requires a brief recital of the facts showing the relation of the defendants Burdick to their codefendant, the Walden Company, and to the premises affected by these mortgages and by the foreclosure thereof. On and prior to the 5th day of April, 1918, the Walden Company was the owner of lot 21 in the Walden tract, and on that day entered into an agreement with R. S. N. Burdick and Mary Burdick, which, while of a somewhat involved nature, disclosing past dealings and differences between the parties to it, amounts in substance to an agreement for the conditional sale of said lot 21 in the Walden tract by the Walden Company to the Burdicks for a purchase price totaling $2,659.10, which was to be made up in the following manner: The Walden Company was to negotiate a loan of $1,500 secured by its mortgage upon the premises in question, upon obtaining which it was to deed the premises to the Burdicks, subject to the incumbrance thus created, which they were to assume and pay; and, in addition to this, they further agreed to pay the Walden Company the sum of $1,159.10 in monthly installments of $150 as the balance of the purchase price of said premises until the same was fully paid. Thereafter, and on May

1, 1918, the Walden Company, through its vice president and secretary, borrowed the sum of $1,500 from the San Ramon Valley Bank, the plaintiff herein, giving the promissory note and mortgage therefor, signed by its aforementioned officials and attested by the seal of the corporation, which is the main subject of this foreclosure suit.

[12] It was the contention of the Burdicks at the trial, and is their contention upon this appeal, that the said officials of the Walden Company who executed said note and mortgage had no authority so to do. This contention is based upon a certain resolution of the directors of the Walden Company, passed by them on May 1, 1918, authorizing the vice president and secretary of the corporation to borrow the sum of $1,000 from the San Ramon Valley Bank, to be secured by a mortgage upon the premises in question. This resolution, according to the appellants' contention, defines the limit of power of the said officials of said corporation to engage in the transaction with the San Ramon Valley Bank; but the resolution, when read in full, does not sustain this contention, since it not only shows that the loan of $1,000, which it purports to authorize, was a temporary matter, but also expressly shows that these very officials of the Walden Company who were by the terms of the resolution to consummate this temporary loan from the plaintiff had already in process of negotiation a loan of $1,500 from another party, which, when completed, would furnish the means of paying off the said temporary loan; in other words, the resolution, far from being or even suggesting a limitation upon the power of these officers of the Walden Company to borrow the sum of $1,500, and execute a note or notes, secured by a mortgage or mortgages therefor, discloses the possession and exercise by them of such power, and this is further and most fully borne out by the fact that they affixed the seal of this corporation to the final transaction with the plaintiff, the presence of which is of itself prima facie evidence of the power of the officials affixing it to consummate the transaction evidenced by the documents to which it was affixed. Mills v. Boyle Mining Co., 132 Cal. 97, 64 Pac. 122; McKee v. Cunningham, 2 Cal. App. 687, 84 Pac. 260; Schallard v. Eel River Navigation Co., 70 Cal. 146, 11 Pac. 590.

[3] In addition to the foregoing, however, we are of the opinion that upon the facts as shown by the record in this case the defendants and appellants, Burdick, are in no position to question or dispute the authority of the officials of the Walden Company to make and execute the said note and mortgage to the plaintiff herein, since by the terms of their express agreement they had stipulated that the Walden Company might create an indebtedness in the sum of $1,500 to be secured by a mortgage upon the said premises, and which indebtedness they had agreed to assume and pay as a consideration in part for receiving a conveyance to them of said premises. Having so agreed, and having received such conveyance, they are estopped to call into question the validity of the transaction to which they have thus assented, and of which they have thus received the benefit. Alvord v. Spring Valley Gold Co., 106 Cal. 547, 40 Pac. 27.

The foregoing reasoning and conclusions apply also to the subsequent note and mortgage to Hook for the sum of $250, assigned to plaintiff. The authority of the same officials of the Walden Company to execute these documents is also shown by the affixed seal of the corporation, and while this small loan does not seem to have been in contemplation at the time the original papers between the Walden Company and the appellants were drawn, the result is the same, since the total sum with which the property in question is charged, by virtue of these two mortgages, amounts to less than the sum which the said appellants had agreed might be placed as an incumbrance upon said property, and which indebtedness to the full extent of $1,500 they had agreed to assume and pay.

[4] With respect to the appellant's plea and claim that they have been defrauded in the course of these transactions, there is not the slightest evidence in support of this contention; for, while it is true that there is some little confusion in respect to the transactions between the Walden Company and the plaintiff, as to the time and manner of the receipt of the money borrowed by it from the bank and as to the repayment by it of a small portion of the loan, the findings of the trial court, which are sufficiently sustained by the evidence, clear up this confusion. By the findings, the loan to the full amount of $1,500 was made by the plaintiff to the Walden Company, and the sum of $1,250 remains due and unpaid thereon. This finding is sufficient to fully support the judgment of foreclosure herein. The appeal is without merit.

Judgment affirmed.

PROPER v. SUTTER DRAINAGE DIST. et al. (Civ. 2311.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 19, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 17, 1921.)

1. Judgment ⚡239—Torts ⚡22—May be had against one or more joint tort-feasors.

Two or more persons who jointly commit a tort are jointly and severally liable to the injured party, and the court may render judgment against one or more of them in its discretion, under Code Civ. Proc. § 579, and this applies to persons acting in official capacity.

2. Drains ⚡63—Drainage district not liable for negligence, but officers are.

Drainage district organized under the statute of 1885 was not liable for negligence resulting in the flooding of crops, but trustees of such a district having the management of the affairs thereof are liable for negligent maintenance resulting in such damage.

3. Drains ⚡63—Trustees of district held to owe duty to use ordinary care to prevent repetition of injury to adjoining lands.

Trustees of a district organized under the law of 1885 (St. 1885, p. 204), who knew of defective condition of a lateral and of prior flooding of adjoining lands therefrom, owed the duty to the landowner to use ordinary care to prevent a repetition of the injury, negligence not consisting simply in originating that which may be the cause of mischief or injury, but also in failing to control this cause so as to prevent inflicting of injury.

4. Drains ⚡63—Trustees of district held sued in individual capacity for negligent maintenance of ditch.

Where in an action by landowner whose crop was flooded through negligent maintenance of drainage ditch by trustees of drainage district, wherein the title indicated the trustees were sued as individuals, and it was alleged that "said defendants and all of them, in their management, control, and operation of said main and lateral drainage canals, collected therein large bodies of water," etc., held that the trustees were sued as individuals, and not in their official capacity, and a judgment against part of them without proper citation as to others was valid.

5. Officers ⚡116—Official individually liable for negligence.

One acting in his official capacity is individually liable for the negligent discharge of his duties.

6. Pleading ⚡407—Technical ambiguity waived by failure to demur.

Where no demurrer was interposed to a complaint in which there was a technical ambiguity, such ambiguity was waived.

7. Appeal and error ⚡1039(2)—Ambiguity in complaint not prejudicial unless misleading.

Where defendants were not misled to their prejudice by a technical ambiguity in the complaint, the ambiguity cannot be said to affect their substantial rights.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by E. E. Proper against the Sutter Drainage District and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed as to the Drainage District and affirmed as to other defendants.

A. H. Hewitt, of Yuba City, for appellants.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff recovered judgment against all of the defendants excepting Hauss for damages to plaintiff's crop of barley, alleged to have been caused by water from the drainage canals of the defendant district. The defendants Giblin, Walton, and Hauss were trustees of the district at the time of the alleged damage.

The lands on which the crop of barley was growing were protected on the west by a ridge and on the east by an old railroad embankment, prior to the construction of the district's canals. The main canal of the district runs in a general southwesterly direction on the west side of the ridge. Lateral No. 4 was constructed immediately adjacent to plaintiff's south line, and was cut through the railroad embankment and the ridge. It was designed to drain some 1,500 acres of land lying northeasterly from plaintiff's land, and to carry the water therefrom to the main canal. In excavating lateral No. 4 the earth was thrown to the south, forming a levee, and leaving the north side of the lateral without any embankment other than the natural ground surface. The lateral was not cut down to grade at certain points to the west of the lands flooded, the bottom being a few inches higher in elevation than farther east. The flooding of plaintiff's land was largely by surface waters carried through the lateral from the east.

As bearing upon defendants' knowledge of the conditions described, it was shown that in the year 1911 the plaintiff filed an action against the defendants for damages from the flooding of the same lands in a manner similar to that set forth in this action. The defendants compromised that case by paying for the crop destroyed and agreeing to construct a levee along the north side of lateral No. 4 to protect the plaintiff's land. The levee on the north side, however, was not constructed until after the damages complained of herein, alleged to have been suffered between January 1 and June 1, 1914. Under the foregoing outline of the facts it is evident that a private individual would be held accountable for negligence. It only remains to consider whether, under existing laws, the defendants are so liable.

[1] Prior to the trial the defendant Hauss died. The administratrix of his estate was substituted, but she was not served with summons or notice or brought into court, and she did not appear in the action. Seasonable objection was made by the other defendants to proceeding with the trial until the administratrix had been served with appropriate process. Their objection was overruled, and the ruling of the court is assigned as error. Two or more persons who jointly commit a tort are jointly and severally liable to the injured party, and the court may render judgment against one or more of them in its discretion. Code Civ. Proc. § 579; Cole v. Roebling Construction Co., 156 Cal. 447, 105 Pac. 255; Lang v. Lilley & Thuston Co., 20 Cal. App. 231, 128 Pac. 1028; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 248, 116 Pac. 513; McNeely v. Superior Court of Los Angeles Co., 36 Cal. App. 602, 173 Pac. 102. There was no error in overruling the objection made.

[2] It is contended that the drainage district is not liable for negligence. Under an unbroken line of decisions in this state relative to reclamation districts, this contention must be sustained. The district was organized under the statute of 1885. Relative to the provisions of that statute it was said in Laguna, etc., Dist. v. Chas. Martin Co., 144 Cal. 212, 77 Pac. 934:

"Testing * * * the provisions of this act of 1885 by the provisions of the act of 1868, * * * we find no substantial difference in their respective provisions as to the purposes for which the respective organizations could be created. In fact, the only difference in them is, that the act of 1868 in terms referred to the reclamation of 'swamp and overflowed, salt, marsh, or tide lands' as such, and authorized the formation of a reclamation district upon petition of the owners of one-half of any such body of land 'susceptible of one mode of reclamation.' The act of 1885 in question is not, however, limited to the creation of districts for the drainage of any particular kind of land, but provides that on the petition of 'the owners of two-thirds of any body of land susceptible of one mode of drainage' and compliance with further provisions, they may be created. * * *. Both acts, too, provide for the reclamation—because the term 'drainage of land' has practically the same application as 'reclamation'; the one is the means employed, the other the result—of bodies of land susceptible of one mode of reclamation."

In San Francisco Savings Union v. Reclamation Dist., 144 Cal. 639, 79 Pac. 374, the court had under consideration the question of the right to sue a reclamation district organized under the act of 1868, the district not being one against which suit was authorized by law. The court said:

"If it is a corporation, it is necessarily a quasi public corporation, similar to a county or school district, and therefore it could not be sued until such time as an action against it was authorized by law. * * *. The same rule would apply if it should be declared a public agency of the state. * * *. The right to maintain such an action is an exception, existing only when the right is expressly or by necessary implication authorized by law."

The act of 1885 does not authorize a suit against a district organized under its provisions or a suit by the district except for the collection of assessments and the condemnation of land. In the case of Perkins v. Blauth et al., 163 Cal. 782, there is dictum to the effect that a reclamation district of the character there under consideration is liable for negligence. Section 3453 of the Political Code, however, provides that reclamation districts organized under the chapter in which that section appears "shall have power to sue and be sued." There is much force in the reasoning of the court in the case of Bradbury v. Vandalia Levee & Drainage District, 236 Ill. 36, 86 N. E. 163, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 991, 15 Ann. Cas. 904, wherein it is said:

"To deny to the plaintiffs a recovery of the damages which they have suffered by the effort of the owners of lands within the district to benefit themselves would be against natural right and every sentiment of justice."

The law under which that case was decided authorized such districts to sue and be sued. Until suits are authorized against such districts in this state, arguments in that regard must be addressed to the Legislature rather than to the courts.

[3] It is next urged that the trustees of the district are not liable for negligence. The trustees had the management of the affairs of the district and the maintenance of its system of canals. They knew of the condition of lateral No. 4 and of the prior flooding of the plaintiff's lands therefrom. A duty was cast upon them to use ordinary care to prevent a repetition of the injury. The court was justified in holding that they did not exercise such care. "Negligence is not simply in originating that which may be the cause of mischief or injury, but * * * consists also in failing to control this cause so as to prevent inflicting injury." Chidester v. Consol. Ditch Co., 59 Cal. 205. As to whether such trustees are liable under the law for the results of their negligence, the case of Perkins v. Blauth, 163 Cal. 782, 127 Pac. 50, cited by both parties, is decisive of the question contrary to the contention of the appellants. This is not a case of error of judgment in the construction of the canal system, but of continuing its use with knowledge of its defects and without reasonable effort to correct them.

[4-7] It is claimed that the defendants Giblin, Hauss, and Walton are not sued as individuals, but in their official capacity as trustees, and that therefore the judgment against Giblin and Walton as individuals must be reversed. The title indicates that they were sued as individuals. It is alleged in the body of the complaint that at all times therein mentioned they were trustees. In charging the acts complained of it is alleged that—

"Said defendants and all of them, in their management, control and operation of said main and lateral drainage canals, collected therein large bodies of water for the purpose of draining the territory traversed by said main canal, * * * and said defendants in their said conduct and management of said canals did collect and convey down through said main canal where the same crosses the said lands of plaintiff and into said lateral canal a large volume of water far in excess of the carrying capacity of said canals, and did overflow the banks of both thereof, and did thereby, by the conveyance of such water down such canals, overflow the banks of said canals, and did precipitate water upon and flood the said lands of plaintiff," etc.

One acting in his official capacity, is individually liable for the negligent discharge of his duties. Perkins v. Blauth, 163 Cal. 787, 127 Pac. 50. It was negligence on the part of the trustees to collect and convey through the canals of the district "water far in excess of the carrying capacity of said canals." Since the trustees are individually liable for the negligent discharge of their duties, it was not inappropriate to allege that they were such trustees, and that the acts complained of were performed in their conduct and management of the affairs of the district. In any event, the most that can be said in support of appellants' contention is that the complaint is ambiguous. The case was tried upon the theory that the action was against the persons named as trustees in their individual capacities. No demurrer was interposed to the complaint. If there was technical ambiguity, it must be held to have been waived. The defendants were not misled thereby. Where a party has not been misled to his prejudice the ambiguity cannot be said to affect his substantial rights. Gassen v. Bower, 72 Cal. 555, 14 Pac. 206; Alexander v. Central L. & M. Co., 104 Cal. 537, 38 Pac. 410; Hawley Bros., etc., Co. v. Brownstone, 123 Cal. 646, 56 Pac. 468.

The judgment as against the defendants Giblin and Walton is affirmed. The judgment as against the defendant Sutter Drainage District is reversed, with direction to the trial court to enter judgment, upon the findings as made, in favor of said district.

FORD v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 3628.)

1. Master and servant ⇨405(2)—Evidence in Workmen's Compensation proceeding held insufficient to show employment not casual.

In proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917 against owner of house for compensation for injuries received in making interior repairs by paperhanger who had not been employed for any definite time, evidence held insufficient to show that the work which the employee had been engaged to perform was not to be completed in a period of time less than 10 working days within section 8, making act inapplicable to casual employment, and subdivision c, defining such employment as work contemplated to be completed in not exceeding 10 working days.

2. Master and servant ⇨361—Owner, who rents house, not engaged in a "trade" or "business" within Workmen's Compensation Act.

An owner, who lets house for profit, and at irregular times, when demanded, has labor performed in the repair thereof, is not engaged in the prosecution of a "trade" or "business" within the Workmen's Compensation Act, upon which a charge as compensation for injury sustained by an employee casually engaged in doing such work can be imposed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Business; Trade.]

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act for compensation for injuries by George J. P. Ford, opposed by T. B. Cowan, employer. Award for petitioner, and employer brings certiorari. Award annulled.

Guy S. Pratt, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Certiorari to review an award made to T. B. Cowan by the Industrial Accident Commission pursuant to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 831).

Petitioner owned several storerooms and flats which he kept in repair and let to tenants. Other than this, he was engaged in no business, trade, or occupation. He employed Cowan at $3.50 per day to do the work required in hanging paper and tinting the walls of the rooms in one of the flats. While so engaged his attention was directed to a leaky toilet in the building, which petitioner told him to repair, and while so engaged in the repair thereof he sustained injuries for which the award of compensation was made.

The particular finding attacked is as follows:

"T. B. Cowan, applicant, while employed at interior repair on April 23, 1920, at Los Angeles, Cal., by defendant George J. P. Ford, said employment not being casual and being in the course of the employer's business, and the parties being then subject to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act of 1917, sustained injury occurring in the course of and arising out of his employment, as follows: He fell down a stairway, sustaining injury to the back and hips."

Petitioner's contention is that the work was both casual and not in the course of trade, business, profession, or occupation of Cowan's employer. In our opinion this contention must be sustained. Section 8 of the act excludes from its operation persons whose employment is both casual and not in the course of the trade, business, or occupation of the employer. Subdivision (c) of the section provides that—

"The term 'casual' as used in this section shall be taken to refer only to employments where the work contemplated is to be completed in not exceeding ten working days."

It also provides that—

"The phrase 'course of the trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer' shall be taken to include all services tending toward the preservation, maintenance or operation of the business, business premises or business property of the employer"; and that "the words 'trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer' shall be taken to include any undertaking actually engaged in by him with some degree of regularity."

[1] It appears that, in response to a question as to how long he had been working on the job for which he was employed, Cowan said: "Well, I had been working on that house perhaps a couple of weeks." And again replying to the question, "And you had been working on that particular house how long?" he answered, "Some two or three weeks; I couldn't hardly tell unless I had brought my books." And to the question, "You testified that you had been on this particular job where you were injured between two and three weeks?" he answered, "Yes, sir." On cross-examination, in response to the injury as to how many days he worked, he replied, "I cannot tell you." Whereupon he was asked, "Was it less than 10 days?" to which he replied: "Maybe it was not 10 days, but it was right in there; I won't say positive." In our opinion, since it appears the employment was not for any definite time (Blood v. Industrial Accident Commission, 30 Cal. App. 274, 157 Pac. 1140), this testimony is insufficient to establish the fact that the work which the applicant was engaged to perform was not to be completed in a period of time less than 10 working days. His testimony upon the subject was not only vague, indefinite, and uncertain, but he himself expresses grave doubt upon the question as to whether his employment was other than casual, as defined by the act. On the contrary, if the burden of showing the employment was casual, devolved upon the employer, his testimony is positive to the effect that the employment contemplated the completion of the work within 10 days, and that in its performance Cowan worked less than 10 days thereon.

[2] The question whether the making of repairs necessary and incidental to the upkeep of a building or buildings which the owner lets for hire constitutes a business within the meaning of the statute, was before this court in the case of Lauzier v. Industrial Accident Commission, 185 Pac. 870, wherein it was said:

"The mere owning and renting of a house or houses by an individual for purposes of investment, conceding that such owner has no particular or principal business, does not come within the purview of the act," as amended in 1917.

As in that case, the petitioner herein had no business other than renting the building for profit. Upon the authority thereof we can but repeat that where an individual invests his money in a house or houses which as owner he lets for profit, and at irregular times when demanded has labor performed in the repair thereof, he is not engaged in the prosecution of a trade or business, within the meaning of the act and upon which a charge as compensation for injury sustained by an employee casually engaged in doing such work can be imposed. Miller & Lux Incorporated v. Industrial Accident Commission 179 Cal. 764, 178 Pac. 960.

The award is annulled.

RUSSELL v. H. W. JOHNS-MANVILLE CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 3799.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 16, 1921.)

1. Master and servant §72—Notice of bonus held not binding.

A notice by employer to all employees, "In recognition of efficient service during the year, the company will pay as additional compensation for 1918 to all salaried employees who have been in the company's employ for the calendar year of 1918 20 per cent. of the yearly salary in each case," did not entitle an employee, discharged during such year, to the increased compensation, there being nothing to show that employee was legally bound to remain, or that he in so remaining did anything other or further than that which he was willing to do and would have done if such notice had never been issued by his employer, or received by himself, there being no consideration to render the employer's offer binding in law; and a suggestion in such notice that the bonus would aid in purchase of Liberty Bonds was immaterial.

2. Master and servant §72—Notice of bonus held not to affect employer's right to discharge.

A notice by employer that salaried employees remaining with the company during the year would receive a bonus, being in the nature of a voluntary gratuity, did not affect employer's right to discharge an employee, hired from month to month, at any time before the expiration of the year.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Caba-niss, Judge.

Action by Samuel P. Russell against H. W. Johns-Manville Company of California. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

James M. Thomas, of San Francisco, for appellant.

W. J. Hayes, of Oakland, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment rendered and entered in the plaintiff's favor in an action brought by him to recover the sum of $600 alleged to have become due and payable by virtue of the following state of facts: The plaintiff in the month of October, 1918, was a salaried employee of the defendant upon a month to month employment, at a monthly salary of $250, and had been such for several years prior to that time. In October, 1918, the defendant issued to all of its salaried employees the following notice:

"Office Notice No. 1451

"October 15, 1918.

"To all Employees S. F. & L. A.:

"Mr. —: In recognition of efficient service during the year the company will pay as additional compensation for 1918 to all salaried employees who have been in the company's employ for the calendar year of 1918 20 per cent. of the yearly salary in each case, payable 10 per cent. January 1, 1919, and 10 per cent. March 1, 1919.

"We are notifying you at this time so that it may help you in making your subscription for Liberty Bonds.

"[Signed] W. S. Greenfield."

After receiving this notice the plaintiff continued in the employ of the defendant until the 16th day of November, 1918, when he was discharged, and on November 30, 1918, was paid his salary in full to that date, according to the terms of his former employment. He thereafter commenced this action to recover the sum of $600, alleged to have become due by virtue of the above-written notice received by him in common with all the rest of the defendant's salaried employees.

Upon the trial of the cause the plaintiff testified and the court found:

"That said plaintiff, relying upon the additional compensation promised by said defendant, in said notice, remained in the employ of said defendant, and intended to remain in its employ for the balance of the year 1918, and subscribed through said defendant for $700 worth of said Liberty Bonds, which subscription said defendant, subsequently, and after plaintiff's discharge, hereinafter alleged, canceled without the knowledge or consent of said plaintiff."

Having made the foregoing finding, and having also found that the plaintiff on or about November 16, 1918, was discharged from his said employment by the defendant without just or any cause, the trial court gave its judgment in the plaintiff's favor for the amount sued for, and from such judgment the defendant has prosecuted this appeal.

[1] We are unable to perceive upon what theory this judgment in the plaintiff's favor can be sustained. The written notice issued to its salaried employees was in form and upon its face a voluntary gratuity to such of said employees as might be in its service during the entire year 1918. It did not purport to change the terms of their past, present, or future employment, nor in the case of month-to-month employees did it purport to bind the corporation issuing it to a different term of employment than that already existing; nor did it exact or require of such employees that they should make any surrender of their right to quit the corporation service at the close of any month thereafter. The respondent himself does not here contend that he was either required to make, or did in fact make, any such surrender, his utmost claim and proof being that he was willing to remain, and did in fact remain, in the employ of the defendant after receipt of said notice and up to the time of his discharge; but he neither pleaded nor testified, nor did the trial court find, that he was legally bound to so remain or that he in so remaining, did anything other or further than that which he was willing to do and would have done if such notice had never been issued by his employer or received by himself. We do not discover any real distinction between the facts of this case and those of the case of Davis & Co. v. Morgan, 117 Ga. 504, 43 S. E. 732, 61 L. R. A. 148, 97 Am. St. Rep. 171, upon which the appellant chiefly relies for a reversal of this judgment, for while in that case the plaintiff's employment was for a year instead of from month to month, as in this case, the difference is not material, since in each case there was lacking the essential element of a sufficient consideration to render the defendant's offer one which, however binding in conscience, it was bound in law to perform. The language of the court in the case cited is quite apt in its application to the instant case:

"When one receives a naked promise and such promise is broken, he is no worse off than he was. He gave nothing for it, he has lost nothing by it, and on its breach he has suffered no damage cognizable by courts. No benefit accrued to him who made the promise, nor did any injury flow to him who received it. Such promises are not made within the scope of transactions intended to confer rights enforceable at law."

In the case of Duncan v. Cone, Inc., 16 Ga. App. 253, 85 S. E. 203, the court also uses the following apt expression regarding offers by employers similar to that presented in the case at bar:

"Where, during the pendency of a term of employment at a stipulated salary per month, a voluntary agreement, entirely apart from the contract of employment, is made by the employer, to pay the employee as a bonus some indefinite and undetermined share in the profits of the business, 'contingent on continuous and satisfactory services,' and this voluntary agreement is not supported by any change in place, hours, character of employment, or other consideration, the agreement is not enforceable at law, as it is nudum pactum, and the grant of the bonus so promised is altogether optional, because dependent upon whether the services of the employee are 'satisfactory' to the employer, and of this he is in such a case the sole judge."

The case of Haag v. Rogers, 9 Ga. App. 650, 72 S. E. 46, cited by the respondent as supporting his contention, is clearly distinguishable from the case at bar, since in that case the obligation to pay the added compensation of the employee arose from an express contract between the employer and employee to that effect and was not in the nature of a voluntary gratuity. The Georgia Court of Appeals in the case just cited expressly notes the distinction between it and the case of Davis & Co. v. Morgan, supra, in these words:

"In that case the extra compensation was purely a promised gift or bonus; in this case it was a part of the wages promised, though it was only conditionally promised."

[2] That portion of the notice issued by the defendant and above quoted, which relates to the purchase of Liberty Bonds by its employees, while referred to by the trial court in its findings to the effect that the plaintiff, relying upon the terms of said notice, did invest in Liberty Bonds, has not been and could not well be relied upon by the respondent as a basis for this action or as a ground for upholding this judgment, since plaintiff's pleadings allege and the findings of the court show that whatever investment in Liberty Bonds the plaintiff made through his said employers and after the issuance of said notice was subsequently canceled by the latter, and even though it is alleged and found that such cancellation was without the plaintiff's knowledge and consent, it nowhere appears that he suffered any detriment either by his subscription to said bonds or by his employer's cancellation of such subscription after his discharge. It may be finally noted that neither in the plaintiff's complaint or proofs, nor in the findings of the court is there any showing or claim that the defendant acted fraudulently or in bad faith in respect to the plaintiff's discharge from its employment further than the plea and finding that his said discharge was without cause. Under its month-to-month employment of the plaintiff, unaltered as we think it was by the offer of this bonus, the defendant had and retained the full legal right to discharge the plaintiff at any time without cause, and, this being so, we are of the opinion that the judgment in this case cannot be upheld.

Judgment reversed.

BRASELTON v. VOKAL et al. (Civ. 2275.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 19, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 17, 1921.)

1. Evidence ⚡432—Parol evidence admissible to show want of consideration for option.

Want of consideration in written executory contracts may be shown by parol proof, under Civ. Code, §§ 1614, 1615, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 2, and such is true as to a written option to purchase land.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⚡18(1)—Presumption that written option was supported by consideration.

A written option to purchase land is presumed to be supported by consideration under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 39.

3. Evidence ⚡591—No claim of presumption against own admission.

No party can claim the right of a presumption against his own admission under oath.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⚡18(1)—Option without consideration may be withdrawn.

A written option to purchase land, not supported by consideration, is a mere offer of performance on the part of the owner, which may be withdrawn before it has been accepted and acted upon by the other party, while it cannot be withdrawn if given for a valuable consideration, whether adequate or not.

5. Specific performance ⚡49(1)—Option without consideration may be specifically enforced if accepted before withdrawn.

A written option to purchase land, although not supported by a consideration, may be specifically enforced when accepted before withdrawn, and the party to whom the offer is made may manifest his acceptance by payment, or tender of payment, of the consideration mentioned in the written option.

6. Specific performance ⚡121(10)—Finding that option was not withdrawn supported by evidence.

In an action for specific performance of a written option to purchase land, a finding that the option was not withdrawn held sustained by the evidence.

7. Frauds, statute of ⚡129(3)—Parol agreement to convey sufficiently executed to take case out of statute.

Where a deed was signed and acknowledged and put in a bank where grantee was to deposit money, and when the title was clear grantor was to receive the money and grantee was to receive the deed, and the money was so deposited, and grantee waived his right to demand a clear title, there was a sufficient execution of a parol agreement to convey to take the case without the statute, or, at any rate, to estop grantor from a repudiation of the oral agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by W. A. Braselton against J. J. Vokal and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Clyde Thomas, of Chico, for appellants.
Lon Bond and Bond & Deirup, all of Chico, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Plaintiff brought the action to compel defendants, J. J. Vokal and Mary Vokal, to execute a conveyance to him of a certain lot in the city of Chico, and he had judgment, from which said defendants have appealed. The action was based upon a certain written instrument, executed by said defendants in the following form:

"For and in consideration of the sum of ten dollars, paid the undersigned, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, I agree to sell and convey to W. A. Braselton free from any lien and incumbrance whatever, on demand, within thirty days from date, at his option, the following described property, to wit [describing the property], and in consideration of fifteen hundred fifty dollars cash, upon delivery of deed having clear title. Dated at Chico, county of Butte, state of California, this 28th day of October, 1919."

There is no contention that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, or that the findings are insufficient to support the judgment, but appellants do claim: (1) That the option was given without consideration; (2) that it was revoked before the tender of performance; and (3) that the whole transaction was vitiated by the fraudulent representations of plaintiff, and therefore the purported contract should not be enforced by a court of equity.

As to the first the court found:

"That it is not true that said option contract set out in the complaint and in paragraph 3 of these findings was made and executed without consideration."

Respondent insists that the statement of consideration in the so-called option cannot be questioned in this suit, his position being:

"That the amount of consideration as recited in an instrument is never conclusive, but where it is attempted to defeat the instrument by showing it had no consideration in the face of a recital in the instrument that there was a consideration, the courts have uniformly held that this cannot be done, in the absence of fraud or mistake."

In support of this contention he cites certain cases, among them being the following California decisions: Hendrick v. Crowley, 31 Cal. 471; Coles v. Soulsby, 21 Cal. 47; Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525, 21 Pac. 984, 4 L. R. A. 826, 12 Am. St. Rep. 162; Arnold v. Arnold, 137 Cal. 291, 70 Pac. 23; Aitchison v. Carruthers, 161 Cal. 8, 118 Pac. 239; Dollar v. International Banking Corporation, 13 Cal. App. 338, 109 Pac. 499; Burkett v. Doty, 32 Cal. App. 338, 162 Pac. 1042. Concerning these decisions we deem it unnecessary to say more than that they have no application to a case like this involving an executory and not an executed covenant. In Page on Contracts, the distinction is clearly made between deeds or other conveyances and executory covenants. On page 3790 (2d Ed.) it is stated:

"The recital of a valuable consideration in a deed or other conveyance cannot be contradicted for the purpose of destroying the legal effect and operation of the deed."

On page 3796 in reference to simple executory contracts containing the recital of a consideration as a fact, we find this:

"The weight of authority is that such recital of a consideration may be contradicted for the purpose of showing that such apparent contract was in reality a gratuitous, unenforceable promise. * * * The recital of a consideration, such as $1, in an option to purchase realty, may be contradicted for the purpose of showing that such offer was not for value."

[1] That the law in California permits parol proof to show the want of consideration in written executory contracts is beyond question. This follows from a consideration of section 1614 and 1615 of the Civil Code and section 1962, subdivision 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure. Moreover, it has been so decisively held by the courts of this state. In Stanton v. Weldy, 19 Cal. App. 374, 126 Pac. 175, the court points out that the rule is the same whether the named consideration be money or any other article of personal property. Therein it is said:

"On principle, we can discover no reason for allowing proof of no consideration where money is the consideration named and denying it where some article of personal property is named as the consideration. If the promisor received nothing in either case, he may show the fact in defense."

The latest decision upon the subject is found in Royer v. Kelly, 174 Cal. 70, 161 Pac. 1148. The case involved two contracts, both reciting facts which would constitute valuable considerations. The court said:

"The recitals of the two agreements furnish presumptive evidence of a valuable consideration. But the rule is that the parties are not estopped by recitals in agreement with respect to its consideration. The true consideration, or the want of consideration, may always be shown by extrinsic evidence for the purpose of impeaching a contract, notwithstanding that it states facts which show a valuable consideration. Chaffee v. Browne, 109 Cal. 220, 41 Pac. 1028; National Hardware Co. v. Sherwood, 165 Cal. 1, 130 Pac. 881; Stanton v. Weldy, 19 Cal. App. 374, 126 Pac. 175. The question must, therefore, be determined by an examination of the evidence."

[2, 3] In viewing the evidence we can hardly escape the conclusion that there was no valuable consideration to support the option. The consideration, of course, would be presumed, since we are concerned with a written instrument. Section 1963, subd. 39, Code Civ. Proc. This presumption is evidence, and might be sufficient to support the finding of the court under ordinary circumstances. But in the case at bar it would seem to be entirely overcome by the testimony of the plaintiff himself to the effect that there was no consideration for said option. His statement under oath was that of an interested party in whose favor said presumption would have to be indulged. No party can claim the right of a presumption against his own admission under oath. If the testimony as to the want of consideration had come from the opposite party alone, this court would be justified in upholding the finding upon the strength of said presumption. Keating v. Morrissey, 6 Cal. App. 163, 91 Pac. 677.

[4] But notwithstanding that we must hold that said finding is unsupported, it does not follow that the judgment must be reversed. In some jurisdictions it is held that specific performance may not be compelled in case of an option not founded upon a valuable consideration, even though accepted by the holder. However, in 25 R. C. L. 37, the true rule is stated as follows:

"Unilateral contracts are not favored in equity, and the want of mutuality of obligation and risk may generally be urged as a bar to their specific enforcement. But while great care is observed in enforcing unilateral contracts, certain contracts are constantly recognized as legal and binding, such as bonds and similar obligations which are unilateral in form if not in effect. Options constitute an important class of unilateral contracts which form an exception in certain respects to the general rule as to the necessity of mutuality. The privilege given in options to the holder either to enforce or cancel the contract does not prevent him from obtaining the specific performance of the contract, provided the option itself is founded on sufficient and valuable consideration. The right of a holder of an option, based on a valuable consideration, to the specific enforcement thereof is not lost by the fact that the vendor refuses to perform the contract before the purchaser demands performance. A mere naked option, not supported by any consideration, is not enforceable. It may be withdrawn at any time before it is accepted. By his election to accept and exercise the option the contract becomes binding on the holder, and any objection to its enforcement on account of want of mutuality is removed. The contract may then be specifically enforced in equity."

The above quotation shows the distinction between an option founded upon a valuable consideration and one not so supported. In the latter, the option is a mere offer of performance on the part of the owner, which may be withdrawn before it has been accepted and acted upon by the other party. This distinction is clearly made in section 125 of Warvelle on Vendors, wherein it is said:

"A mere proposal or offer, though made in writing and signed by the proponent, creates no obligation on the part of the person making the same, unless accepted by the person to whom the same is made according to its terms. Being made without consideration, and not possessing the essential element of mutuality, the party making an offer has a right to withdraw it at any time before the one to whom it is made accepts it. * * * If the option is given for a valuable consideration, whether adequate or not, it cannot be withdrawn or revoked within the time fixed, and it will be binding and obligatory upon the owner, or his assigns with notice until it expires by its own limitation."

[5] That a voluntary offer in writing to convey may be enforced when accepted before withdrawal is the undoubted rule in this state. Mitchell v. Gray, 8 Cal. App. 423, 97 Pac. 160; Brown v. San Francisco Savings Union, 134 Cal. 448, 66 Pac. 592; Smith v. Bangham, 156 Cal. 359, 104 Pac. 689, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 522. Up to the time of acceptance, it is characterized as a nudum pactum, but when the proposal is assented to and acted upon it assumes the aspect of a valid and binding contract. It is equally true that the party to whom the offer is made may manifest his acceptance by payment or tender of payment of the consideration.

[6] These principles are conceded by appellants, but they claim, as before stated, that they withdrew the offer before it was accepted by respondent. It may be admitted that a finding to that effect would be supported, but such conclusion is not compelled by the evidence. There is a sufficient legal showing to the contrary. Plaintiff's testimony justifies the finding of the court in that respect. It is true that he was asked on cross-examination, "When did Mr. Vokal first tell you, Mr. Braselton, that he would not sell the property?" and he answered, "That was the 27th of November, Thanksgiving." But that he did not understand the question as construed by appellants is quite plain, not only from his direct-examination, but also from a following statement on the cross-examination that Mr. Vokal "never mentioned such a thing." What he referred to in said answer was the disinclination of Mr. Vokal to renew the option. But that Mr. Vokal did not withdraw his offer, or, if he did, he waived his withdrawal, is evidenced by the undisputed testimony of plaintiff that on November 28th, when plaintiff tendered the money Mr. Vokal said "he would not do anything then, that he would be up in the afternoon and see me," that he came in the afternoon, and he said "he would see about it and talk it over with his wife;" and in a day or two afterward he said, "Well, make out the deed and bring it down, and they would sign it;" and as a matter of fact, appellants did sign such deed. This conduct was manifestly inconsistent entirely with the theory of a repudiation or revocation of said option. In view of the whole record it seems utterly out of the question to hold that there is no support for the finding of the court that—

"It is not true that defendants, or either of them, thereupon or ever elected to rescind said agreement hereinbefore referred to, or that they immediately thereafter, and before any tender of performance by the plaintiff, or at any other time, notified the plaintiff that they or either of them would not be bound by said contract or agreement, or would not sell the said property."

[7] Moreover, if we assume that said finding is unsupported as far as the first offer is concerned, then another feature of the case justifies an affirmance of the judgment. As we have seen, Mr. Vokal agreed that he and his wife would execute a deed to the premises. This deed was signed and acknowledged on November 28th, under an agreement between Mr. Vokal and plaintiff that the former was to put it in the First National Bank of Chico, and the latter was to deposit the money in the same bank, and, as stated by plaintiff, "when the title was clear he was to receive the money, and I was to receive the deed." The deed and the money were so deposited. After the deed was executed Mr. Braselton made a trip to Hamilton City, and secured the release of an old mortgage against the property, and subsequently waived his right to demand a clear title, expressing his willingness to accept the conveyance subject to a certain tax lien. The court made a finding upon this phase of the case, and we discover in the record ample evidence to support it. We thus have, according to familiar principles, a sufficient execution of a parol agreement to convey, to take the case without the statute of frauds, or at any rate, to estop the appellants from a repudiation of such agreement.

The principles which must prevail in cases like this have been set forth in many of the text-books and decisions of the courts, and, of course, are well known to the profession. We would look in vain for a more felicitous and cogent expression of them than is found in the quotation made by appellants from Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, volume 1, paragraph 400. But, manifestly, in applying these principles we must remember that the trial court has given credit to the testimony in favor of plaintiff's position. That testimony justifies the conclusion that plaintiff's conduct was not "unconscientious, inequitable, or characterized by bad faith"; to the contrary, that the transaction was "fair and just," and not "harsh and oppressive upon the defendant." We may add that the agreed price was the fair market value of the land.

In brief, whatever testimony may appear to the contrary, a careful reading of the record warrants the declaration that the evidence constitutes a rational basis for the conclusion that no advantage was taken of appellants, that no imposition was practiced, that it was within the discretion of the trial court to decree a specific performance, and that no just ground exists for interfering with that discretion.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal and error ⚡477—Supersedeas cannot be granted to stay execution sale which court below refused to enjoin.

The Supreme Court is without power to grant an application for a supersedeas to stay an execution sale which the court below refused to enjoin.

In Bank.

Action by John A. Wollenshlager and others against Andrew Riegel and others for an injunction. Injunction denied, and plaintiffs apply for a supersedeas. Application denied.

See, also, 193 Pac. 160.

John B. Haas, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank L. Sobbs, and Hyman Schwartz, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The petition of appellants for a supersedeas shows that the action in the court below was to procure an injunction to stay an execution sale. The injunction was refused. Appellants ask a supersedeas to stay the execution which they sought to have enjoined in the court below. The effect would be that this court would grant the injunction which the court below refused to grant. It is well established that this court is without power to exercise original jurisdiction of this character. Napa, etc., Co. v. Calistoga, etc., Co., 174 Cal. 411, 163 Pac. 497; *Hicks v. CORDTS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR MENDOCINO COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2348.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 20, 1921.)

1. Criminal law ⚡614(3)—Nonappearance after continuance of witness for whom subpoena had been issued not ground for further continuance.

Where witness for the state, who had been subpoenaed to appear on certain date, was informed by the district attorney that trial had been continued, and that his attendance would be required on the date to which it had been continued, but was not subpoenaed or required by order of the court to attend on such date, though the district attorney knew his address, the failure of such witness to appear on date to which the trial had been continued was not ground for discharge of the jury and further continuance over objections of defendant.

2. Criminal law ⚡576(2) — Defendant not tried within 60 days after filing information entitled to dismissal, where no cause for delay shown.

Where the trial was continued over defendant's objections beyond the 60-day period following the filing of the information within which the defendant was entitled to be tried, under Pen. Code, § 1382, without a showing of sufficient cause for such continuance, the defendant was entitled, under such statute, to dismissal of the prosecution.

3. Criminal law ⚡576(11) — Good cause for holding defendant more than 60 days without trial must be shown by prosecution on defendant's motion for dismissal.

On motion of the defendant not tried within 60 days after the filing of information for dismissal of prosecution under Pen. Code, § 1382, requiring the court to order the prosecution to be dismissed where defendant is not brought to trial within 60 days after filing of information, good cause for holding the defendant for a longer time without a trial cannot be presumed by court, but must be shown by the prosecution.

Application for writ of mandamus by E. Cordts against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Mendocino, and Hon. H. L. Preston, Judge of said court. Writ granted.

Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, for petitioner.

Hale McCowen, Jr., Dist. Atty., of Ukiah, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. This is an application for a writ of mandate directed to the superior court of the county of Mendocino, requiring the dismissal of an information for misdemeanor filed on the 16th day of February, 1921.

The petition alleges that the trial of the action was set for April 18th, and prior to said date was continued to May 2d; that on May 2d both parties answered "ready"; that thereupon "a jury was impaneled, but just prior to being sworn, upon motion of the district attorney, based upon the absence of the witness Bailey," the court "discharged the jury and continued the matter for trial and refused to try the said matter; all against the objections and against the protests of your petitioner." It is further alleged that the said Bailey is a material witness for the prosecution; that he was subpoenaed to attend the trial on April 18th; that on the 15th day of April he went from his home in Eureka to attend the trial at Ukiah, and was then informed by the district attorney of the continuance of the trial, and that his attendance would be required on May 2d, whereupon the witness returned to Eureka; that the district attorney knew the street address of the witness in Eureka, and on the 27th day of April wrote him that he would be required to attend the trial on May 2d, but that no subpoena or order of court was issued or served upon the witness to attend the court on May 2d; that no showing of any character was made by the district attorney in support of his motion for a continuance; that no continuance of the trial was had at the request of the defendant; that thereafter the defendant moved the court for a dismissal of the action on the ground that he had not been brought to trial within 60 days after the filing of the information, and, upon the denial of said motion by the court, this application was made.

The district attorney filed a demurrer herein on behalf of respondents on the ground that the petition does not state facts sufficient to warrant the issuance of the writ. On June 13th the matter was submitted on briefs, the petitioner being given 15 days to file his points and authorities and the respondents 15 days after the filing of petitioner's brief within which to reply. Petitioner's brief was filed June 17th, and the district attorney has offered nothing in reply, and has made no request for permission to make a counter showing herein. The fair inference is that no cause can be shown in opposition to the facts alleged in the petition.

[1-3] The petition shows that there was good cause for the continuance of the trial to May 2d. From the facts stated in the petition, it appears that no sufficient cause was shown for the discharge of the jury on May 2d, and the further continuance of the case. Section 1382 of the Penal Code provides:

"The court, unless good cause to the contrary is shown, must order the prosecution to be dismissed * * * if a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within 60 days after the * * * filing of the information."

"The statute is imperative. * * * Here no cause for delay was shown. It was enough for the defendant to show that the time fixed by the statute, after information filed, had expired, and that the case had not been postponed on his application. If there was any good cause for holding him for a longer time without a trial, it was for the prosecution to show it. The court could not presume it." People v. Morino, 85 Cal. 517, 24 Pac. 893; In re Begerow, 133 Cal. 351, 65 Pac. 828, 56 L. R. A. 513, 85 Am. St. Rep. 178; Matter of Ford, 160 Cal. 334, 116 Pac. 757, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 882, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1267; Ford v. Superior Court, 17 Cal. App. 1, 118 Pac. 96.

The right of petitioner to a dismissal of the action seems clear.

It is therefore ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue out of and under the seal of this court to the superior court of the county of Mendocino, and to the Honorable H. L. Preston, judge thereof, commanding and directing that the action herein referred to against petitioner be forthwith dismissed.

PEOPLE v. BROWN. (Cr. 754.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 26, 1921.)

1. Homicide — 230—Evidence held to prove that automobile driver intentionally ran down deceased.

In prosecution of automobile driver unlawfully transporting liquor, for murder of officer of the United States immigration service run over by automobile, evidence held to prove that driver intentionally swerved automobile at great speed toward the deceased with intent to run him down.

2. Criminal law — 371 (4, 12)—Testimony as to defendant's unlawful transportation of whisky held admissible in prosecution for homicide.

In prosecution of automobile driver for murder of an officer of the United States immigration service, stationed at a point on the highway to apprehend persons engaged in the unlawful transportation of liquor, in which it was claimed that such driver swerved automobile toward such officer with intent to run over him, the admission of testimony as to the transportation of whisky by the defendant, the hiding thereof after the killing, and of the whisky itself, held admissible to show motive and to present a theory inconsistent with defendant's claim that the killing was accidental.

SHAW, J. Upon an information charging him with the crime of murder, defendant was convicted of murder in the second degree, followed by a judgment of imprisonment from which he appeals.

[1] It appears from the record that, in the performance of their duty as officers of the United States immigration service, Alphonse G. Bernard and Henry Y. Hackett were, on the night of July 10-11, 1920, stationed at a point near Campo on the highway leading from Calexico to San Diego, for the purpose of apprehending persons engaged in the unlawful transportation of liquor by automobile, the drivers of which they signaled to stop by the waving of flash lights, with which both were equipped. At about 3 o'clock on the morning of the 11th of July, at which time Hackett's position was on the north side of the highway and that of Bernard was on the south side at a point a short distance west of the former, an automobile driven by defendant approached from the east, going westerly toward San Diego. When first seen by them it was distant about one-fourth of a mile and was being operated at a speed of 30 to 35 miles per hour. By waving their flash lights they signaled defendant as the driver thereof to stop the car, but instead of doing so he increased the speed thereof, and, when near the point where Hackett stood, swerved his car toward him, to escape a collision with which he was compelled to jump back to the side of the roadway, whereupon defendant immediately turned his car to the left or south side of the road, to the place farther west where Bernard was stationed, at which point he caused the car, traveling at high speed, to collide with Bernard, as a result of which the latter was instantly killed. At the time the car contained 244 pints of whisky which the defendant was unlawfully transporting from the town of Mexicali, in Mexico, to some place in the United States. After striking deceased, whose body, being badly crushed and stripped of its clothing, was dragged some 200 or 300 feet, the car, at increased speed, was run a distance of a mile or so over the highway, when it was driven off the road into the brush, and the liquor taken therefrom and cached, after which the automobile returned to the highway, over which it proceeded to San Diego. It further appears that, some two or three weeks prior to the time in question, defendant, in discussing the efforts of officers to apprehend whisky smugglers, had said:

"If anybody undertakes to stop me, I will put on all the gas I have and run them down."

That defendant knowingly refused to recognize the stop signals of the officers and intentionally swerved his car at great speed, first toward Hackett on the right of the roadway and then to the left, where deceased was standing, and with the purpose of causing the same, which in both instances as shown by the wheel tracks left the driveway, to collide first with Hackett and then with Bernard, admits of no doubt; indeed, his counsel does not question the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict of guilty reached by the jury.

[2] The alleged errors complained of, and upon which appellant bases his claim for a reversal, are rulings of the court in admitting testimony of the transportation of the whisky, the hiding thereof after the alleged killing, and its introduction in evidence, all of which evidence was admitted over defendant's objections. That the evidence was material and competent, in our opinion, admits of no doubt. While defendant admitted the killing, he claimed it was not intentional, but accidental. Hence any evidence was material that tended to show the commission of the act was prompted by a motive inconsistent with defendant's innocence of the offense for which it was sought to apprehend him. As said by Mr. Wharton in his work on Criminal Evidence (section 899):

"Facts and circumstances are relevant on a homicide charge, to show that the motive for the homicide was the concealment of a prior crime, when they tend to prove that the accused was guilty of a prior crime, and knew that he was suspected by the deceased to be so guilty, or that the deceased was likely to discover the fact." Id. § 897.

In People v. Pool, 27 Cal. 575, it is said that—

"Whenever it is important to determine the character of the act perpetrated and to ascertain the intent of the accused, the existence of any motive likely to instigate him to the commission of the crime may be proved, and is relevant and competent for the purpose of fixing or tending to fix the crime upon him."

Conceding the attempted smuggling and transportation of the liquor by defendant was not illegal under the laws of this state, it nevertheless constituted a criminal offense, for which he was punishable under the federal statutes. The evidence offered tended to show that defendant, with full knowledge of such fact, and knowing that if he stopped his car a search thereof would be made, and conclusive evidence of his unlawful act obtained, sought to avoid discovery of the crime and apprehension therefor by escape, and as a means to such end propelled his car against Bernard and killed him. Its effect was to present a theory inconsistent with defendant's claim that the killing was accidental.

The fact that defendant was engaged in transporting the 244 pints of liquor in the car appeared from the testimony of the witness Miller, who also testified to the fact that the liquor was cached at a certain point near the highway by defendant. Upon going to the point designated, officers found the liquor, and it was properly introduced in evidence as corroborating the testimony so given by Miller.

The appeal based upon the grounds stated is without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

OLDERSHAW v. KINGSBAKER BROS. CO.
(Civ. 3829.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 26, 1921.)

1. Sales ⇐32—Letters held to evidence binding contract.

Letters held to evidence a binding contract to take plaintiff's entire output of hothouse tomatoes for a given period.

2. Contracts ⇐10(4)—Agreement to take entire output not void for want of mutuality.

A contract to purchase the entire output of a plant for a given period is not void for want of mutuality.

3. Sales ⇐384(5)—Measure of damages for refusal to accept stated.

In action for damages for refusal to accept plaintiff's entire output of hothouse tomatoes during a certain period, plaintiff was entitled to recover the contract price for tomatoes actually delivered, and the difference between the contract price and the market price for those not accepted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County;
J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by C. D. Oldershaw against the Kingsbaker Bros. Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ingle Carpenter and M. J. Finkenstein, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant for $3,754.55 damages for breach of contract to purchase the entire crop of hothouse tomatoes grown by plaintiff in his plant at Bakersfield during the winter of 1917-18. The contract is found in a series of letters passing between the parties following the sale by plaintiff of a large amount of tomatoes during the previous winter on a basis of 15 cents a pound. While these deliveries were being made, the plaintiff, on February 7, 1917, wrote to defendant that he was contemplating the construction of two new hothouses in order to increase his output for the 1917-18 season, and asked if defendant would be able to take the increased supply. To this defendant replied:

"We will have no trouble in disposing of 50 lugs or more every day, and mention this to assure you that we have the distribution for the full capacity you will be able to turn out."

On March 10th following, defendant wrote to plaintiff that it preferred to have deliveries begin close after the 1st of December; that the most desirable period for hothouse tomatoes was in December, January, and February, and advised him to plant his seed so that the tomatoes would mature for shipment during that period. On April 2d following, the plaintiff wrote defendant that he would construct four instead of two new hothouses and hoped to be able to give defendant plenty of tomatoes during the next season. Also that "I will plant my seed in time to have ripe tomatoes for you on December 1." On April 7th defendant replied:

"We will look forward to receiving all your tomatoes next year, and trust that your contemplated plans will materialize."

From this correspondence it is apparent that the parties intended the plaintiff should increase his production adding four new hothouses, and that the defendant would purchase the entire output on the basis of the transactions of the previous winter—that plaintiff should ship the tomatoes, when ready, to the defendant in Los Angeles, and that the defendant should receive them—up to 50 lugs a day at least—paying therefor 15 cents a pound on semimonthly statements.

Relying upon this agreement plaintiff made the contemplated improvements, and on October 14, 1917, wrote the defendant that he had about three times the acreage in tomatoes over the last season, and that the crop looked like a big yield. He also stated that some of the tomatoes would be ready for shipment about November 15, but that the main crop would come in about December 15. Not having received any reply to this letter, plaintiff again wrote to defendant on October 25th, and in reply to this defendant stated:

"Wish to say that we have anticipated and still expect to handle your entire crop of tomatoes this coming season."

At that time defendant also notified plaintiff that it would be able to handle his tomatoes when the crop started about the middle of November. On November 6th defendant's agent called on plaintiff to look over the crop, and expressed himself as well pleased at the prospect of a large yield. This call was made in answer to plaintiff's written request that defendant send some one from the firm for that purpose. During the conversation plaintiff notified the agent that, owing to the advanced cost of fertilizer, he would have to charge 16 cents that season instead of 15. To this the agent agreed, and some tomatoes were shipped and billed to defendant on that basis.

Soon thereafter the agent informed plaintiff that his firm was unable to sell the tomatoes at a profit if billed at 16 cents, and asked that he sell at the market price. Plaintiff informed the agent that he would write the defendant, and on November 21st did write, offering to reduce the price to 10 cents a pound for all shipments prior to December 1st. This was accepted by defendant in a letter of November 24th, in which defendant stated that it had no trouble in disposing of plaintiff's tomatoes, but that on account of local weather conditions there were so many field-grown tomatoes on the market that plaintiff's tomatoes were being sold at a loss.

"We are perfectly willing to lose a little on these first shipments and appreciate your attitude in reducing the price to 10 cents per pound on certain mentioned shipments up to December 1."

Shipments were continued throughout the month of November, billed at 10 cents a pound, and from December 1st to December 30th, billed at 16 cents. No objection was made by defendant, except that its agent requested plaintiff to make a further extension of the reduction in price, which was not agreed to. On December 29th, the market for hothouse tomatoes still being poor because the warm southern California weather, which was not anticipated, was still producing field-grown tomatoes, defendant wired plaintiff asking his permission to sell his tomatoes to best advantage on the market. When plaintiff replied that he would insist upon fulfillment of his contract, defendant, on December 30th, refused to accept further shipments. Plaintiff then endeavored to sell the remainder of his crop in other markets. The proceeds of such sales as were made were taken into consideration in estimating plaintiff's damages, and the judgment covered the price of the shipments made to defendant and not paid for and the loss of profits from those which defendant refused to accept.

[1, 2] The facts recited do not constitute mere negotiations preliminary to the execution of a formal contract. There is no evidence that any formal contract was contemplated, but, on the other hand, it is apparent that the parties at all times treated the correspondence as the contract, and intended it to be such. There was no essential feature which was either indefinite or uncertain except the matter of price, and that was supplied by oral evidence. Though there was a conflict in this evidence the court was justified in finding that the 16-cent price was agreed to. The contract called for the entire output of plaintiff's plant; there was no estimate of the amount which defendant might take—it agreed to take the entire crop. The defendant was notified that plaintiff contemplated the construction of four new hothouses and agreed to take the output of the entire plant. Then its agent was shown the plant while the tomatoes were ripening, and expressed satisfaction over the prospect of a large yield. Such a contract to take the entire output of a plant for a given period is not void for want of mutuality. McIntyre Lumber Co. v. Jackson Lumber Co., 165 Ala. 268, 271, 51 South. 767, 138 Am. St. Rep. 66, 67; Bartlett Springs Co. v. Standard Box Co., 16 Cal. App. 671, 672, 117 Pac. 934; 13 Corpus Juris, 338.

[3] Defendant insists that the trial court erred in awarding damages above the amount tendered in defendant's answer. The argument is that for the 6,783 pounds received by defendant prior to the repudiation of the contract plaintiff was entitled to recover the current market rate of 6 cents, which would make $406.98, the amount tendered. Then it is said that, because plaintiff endeavored to sell the remainder of the crop in Bakersfield and Fresno only, and did not seek other markets in San Francisco and Los Angeles, he should be denied any damages for the loss suffered by the breach.

As to the tomatoes actually delivered to defendant, they were sold under an express contract for 16 cents a pound, and plaintiff was entitled to recover on that basis. As to the portion of the crop not taken, the court awarded damages at the contract price for such of the crop as was marketable, less the sum received by plaintiff through other sales. In this there was no error. There was evidence which would have supported a larger award of damages for the portion of the crop not taken, and defendant is in no position to complain of the judgment on this score.

Judgment affirmed.

KOENIGSTEIN v. KOENIGSTEIN.
(Civ. 3540.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 27, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Divorce ⚭129(9)—Circumstantial evidence of adultery requires showing of criminal disposition and opportunity to commit crime.

In proving adultery by circumstances, a criminal disposition or desire in minds of both alleged guilty parties and an opportunity to commit the crime must both be established.

2. Husband and wife ⚭297—Evidence held sufficient to support findings of adultery.

In an action for divorce, evidence held sufficient to support finding of adultery on part of plaintiff as charged by cross-complaint for separate maintenance.

3. Husband and wife ⚭300—Finding of trial court supported by substantial evidence not disturbed.

The court's finding of adultery being supported by substantial evidence, it will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action for divorce by William A. Koenigstein against Minnie B. Koenigstein, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint for separate maintenance. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Warren L. Williams, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Mulford & Dryer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. In this action the plaintiff sought a divorce. The defendant answered and filed a cross-complaint for separate maintenance. The cross-complaint alleged habitual intemperance and adultery on the part of plaintiff. The case was tried, and the court gave judgment against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendant. The court found both the allegations of adultery and habitual intemperance to be true. The grounds of the appeal are that the evidence does not support certain findings.

Finding VI is as follows:

"That plaintiff, at divers times, did commit adultery with one Rose L. Geist Lee, formerly Rose L. Geist, at the city of Norfolk, Neb., and elsewhere; that each and all of said acts of adultery were committed without the consent, connivance, procurement, or previous knowledge of defendant, and that defendant has not lived or cohabited with plaintiff since she became cognizant of the commission by plaintiff of the said several acts of adultery."

In the case of Goldsmith v. Goldsmith, 26 Cal. App. 458, 147 Pac. 214, cited by appellant, it was held that the evidence was insufficient to support a finding of adultery. In that case the entire evidence concerning that matter was contained in certain letters written by defendant to a man named Gordon. The decision is expressly based upon the provisions of our Civil Code, section 130, and our Code of Civil Procedure, § 2079, to the effect that a decree of divorce cannot be based upon the uncorroborated statements, admissions, and testimony of the parties to the action. These sections apply to divorce cases only and the case is therefore not in point in this action for separate maintenance.

[1] With reference to the degree of proof required to establish adultery we may quote the language of the court in Hartshorn v. Hartshorn (Okla.) 168 Pac. 822, as follows:

"The party relying on the charge of adultery has the burden of proving it by a fair preponderance of the evidence. In proving adultery by circumstances two facts must be established, a criminal disposition or desire in the mind of both the defendant and the particeps criminis, and an opportunity to commit the crime."

[2] In the case at bar, the principal evidence to support finding VI is a letter written by Koenigstein to Rose L. Geist Lee. It refers to a telegram sent by her and which Mrs. Koenigstein had opened. The letter is a long one and it would serve no useful purpose to quote it here in full, but throughout it contains a strong inferential admission that the defendant and "Dearest Rose," to whom it is addressed, had occupied so close a relationship as to permit a reasonable and just man, viewing the matter with guarded discretion, to be satisfied that both opportunity and the desire to commit adultery had existed between them.

From the letter it appears that the defendant had visited "Rose" on different occasions in Omaha; the writer asserts that he had been square with her; had sent her 10 dollars a week since she had left; that he "had no one else all the time I have been with you"; that somebody had "spilled the whole thing" of defendant going to see her.

The trial court, no doubt, also considered the fact that this letter was written by a married man to one not his wife, and the entire circumstances, involving guilty conduct of the defendant, such as his immediate departure from his home as soon as he knew that his wife had the information he mentioned in his letter to "Rose."

[3] Where there is substantial evidence to support the decision of the trial court, it is a familiar rule that its finding will not be disturbed. Clopton v. Clopton, 162 Cal. 27, 121 Pac. 720. On this principle, we are satisfied that a reversal would not be justified, upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support finding VI. It will be unnecessary to consider the contentions of appellant concerning the other findings of which complaint is made because the existence of a cause for separate maintenance under the finding which we have examined is sufficient to justify the judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff on her cross-complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

ORLY v. RUSSELL. (Civ. 3504.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 25, 1921.)

1. Forcible entry and detainer §29(4)—Evidence insufficient to show entry by defendant.

In a forcible entry and detainer proceeding by tenant against another person, evidence held insufficient to show entry on the premises or unlawful detainer thereof by the defendant.

2. Landlord and tenant §120(1)—Tenancy at will terminated in 30 days.

Tenure of a tenant at will may be legally terminated in 30 days, under Civ. Code, § 789.

3. Forcible entry and detainer §30(2)—Tenant at will entitled to damages only for one month.

Since tenant at will's tenure may be terminated in 30 days under Civ. Code, § 789, the longest period of time for which he is entitled in a forcible entry and detainer case to charge a loss of profits as an element of damages is 30 days, under Civ. Code, § 3334.

4. Forcible entry and detainer §30(4)—Verdict held not to be considered as including exemplary damages.

In forcible entry and detainer case, where plaintiff asked for exemplary damages, and maximum damage shown by the evidence could only have been $258, a verdict for $450 cannot be considered as including exemplary damages, as the jury should have fixed the damages, and then, if plaintiff so desired, he should have appealed to the court to have the damages trebled.

5. Forcible entry and detainer §30(4)—No exemplary damages in absence of overt or malicious act.

Plaintiff in forcible entry and detainer was not entitled to exemplary damages where no evidence was introduced showing any overt or malicious acts on the part of the defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by George Orly against Charles O. Russell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

John H. Riordan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Daniel Barton, of Richmond, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff sued the defendant in an action of forcible entry and unlawful detainer; a trial was had before the court sitting with a jury; the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the restitution of the premises and $450 damages. The defendant moved for a new trial on all of the statutory grounds, the motion was denied and the defendant has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

One Hamble owned a building on Macdonald avenue in the city of Richmond, which building was divided into two compartments, one known as 1100 and the other as 1102 Macdonald avenue. In February, 1919, R. H. Curry held a lease on the building. While he was lessee the plaintiff rented, for no specified term, the compartment known as No. 1102. and paid his rent to the lessee in the sum of $18 per month—that is, from the 17th day in the month to the 17th day of the next month. The lease which Curry held from the landlord contained an option that the lease could be canceled on the request of the lessee whenever prohibition was about to take effect. Accordingly the lessee took such steps that his lease was canceled July 1, 1919. Thereafter, during the month of July, the landlord leased some part of the building to Charles Russell, and on the same day the landlord called on the plaintiff and collected in cash one-half of one month's rent; at the same time the landlord and the plaintiff had a conversation in which it was discussed that the lease had been or was about to be made to Russell, and the future tenure of the plaintiff was discussed as being problematical. The record shows no conversation or communication between the plaintiff and the defendant except as will presently be stated. Between 7 o'clock Saturday, August 29, 1919, and Monday morning following, some one entered the premises known as No. 1102 by means of breaking off some hooks on a back door which led into the premises known as No. 1100. After so entering a board was so fastened across the front door as to prevent an entrance. On September 2d the plaintiff and his attorney served a notice on the defendant requiring the defendant to surrender possession to the plaintiff within five days. At that time the defendant is quoted as stating, "I can't give up that way, up the place;" in another part of his testimony the plaintiff quotes the language as being, "It is a nice way I could give you back now your place;" and in another place he uses the expression, "Fine way I could restore the shop now to you."

[1] Except as stated above, there is not a scintilla of testimony in the record showing who it was that entered the back door and barred the front door, nor is there a scintilla of evidence showing who, if any one, was in possession from August 29, 1919, down to and including the date that the action was commenced. There is evidence that after demand was made on him the defendant did not deliver possession of the premises, but there is not a word in the record showing that he was in possession, or that he had the least authority or power to deliver the same. It is patent, therefore, that the most material allegations of the charging part of the plaintiff's complaint are not sustained by the evidence. His proof showed a trespass on the part of some one, but did not even show a trespass on the part of this particular defendant. Polack v. McGrath et al., 25 Cal. 54; Preston v. Kehoe, 10 Cal. 445; Castro v. Tewksbury, 69 Cal. 562, 11 Pac. 339; Frazier v. Lynch, 97 Cal. 370, 32 Pac. 319; Davies v. Stark, 25 Cal. App. 519, 144 Pac. 315.

In what we have said above we have not overlooked testimony to the effect that John B. Azevedo and the defendant desired to install an ice cream stand in the building, that they desired the use of the entire premises, and that the defendant entered and made some alterations in the building. When the defendant entered to make said alterations there is no evidence he entered through No. 1102. Conceding he committed a trespass against the plaintiff in altering the wall, this is not an action for a mere trespass.

[2-5] Plaintiff was a tenant at will. As such his tenure could have been legally terminated in 30 days. Civ. Code, § 789; Martin v. Splivalo, 56 Cal. 128. The longest period of time for which he was entitled to charge a loss of profits as an element of damage was therefore 30 days. The plaintiff testified that he was earning $240 per month. He had been paying $18 a month rental; the maximum damage shown by the evidence introduced by him was therefore $258. Civ. Code, § 3334; Hawthorne v. Siegel, 88 Cal. 159, 25 Pac. 1114, 22 Am. St. Rep. 291. However, the jury brought in a verdict for $450. The amount was clearly excessive. True it is that the plaintiff asked in his complaint for exemplary damages, but the jury should have fixed the damages, and then, if plaintiff so desired, he should have appealed to the court to have the damages trebled. No such proceeding was had, and therefore the verdict cannot be considered as including exemplary damages. San Francisco, etc., Soc. v. Leonard, 17 Cal. App. 254, 119 Pac. 405. Furthermore as no evidence was introduced showing any overt act on the part of this defendant, far less was there any evidence showing malicious acts on his part, and there was no basis for awarding exemplary damages.

The judgment is reversed.

MOODY v. GOODWIN et al. (Civ. 3465.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 28, 1921.)

1. Factors — Person intrusted with automobile held not a "factor."

One permitted by the owner of an automobile to drive it to a prospective buyer's place of business for exhibition, without authority to sell or deliver it to the latter was not clothed with the authority of a factor, defined by Civ. Code, § 2026, as an "agent who, in the pursuit of an independent calling, is employed by another to sell property for him, and is vested by the latter with the possession or control of the property."

2. Sales — 233(1)—Purchaser of registered automobile may sue for conversion, though failing to comply with statutory conditions of transfer of ownership.

Notwithstanding the requirement of Code Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by W. E. Moody against H. K. Goodwin, R. B. Moore, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Moore appeals. Affirmed.

Jackson Mahon, for appellant.

E. F. Brittan, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action for the recovery of damages for defendants' alleged conversion of an automobile. Plaintiff had judgment, from which defendant Moore has appealed.

While there is some conflict in the evidence, it sufficiently appears therefrom that plaintiff was in the rightful possession of the car as a purchaser thereof from the registered owner; that on or about September 18, 1919, he, for the purpose of having it shown to defendant R. B. Moore, who was represented to be a prospective buyer, permitted H. K. Goodwin to drive the same to Moore's place of business for exhibition. No authority, however, was given Goodwin to sell or deliver the car to Moore, but it was to be returned to plaintiff. Notwithstanding the fact that he was without authority so to do, Goodwin sold and delivered the car to Moore.

[1] Upon the facts so established, there is no merit in appellant's contention that Goodwin was clothed with the authority of a factor, which, as defined by section 2026, Civil Code, is "an agent who, in the pursuit of an independent calling, is employed by another to sell property for him, and is vested by the latter with the possession or control of the property." Having, as appears from plaintiff's testimony, no authority to sell or dispose of the car, but intrusted with it for a special purpose only, Goodwin was not a factor, and had no more right to sell the car to Moore than if he had stolen it from plaintiff.

[2] At the time of the transaction section 8 of the Vehicle Act, as amended by the Legislature in 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 391), prescribed certain things to be done, the performance of which is required as a condition of the transfer of ownership of a registered motor vehicle, and provided that, in the absence of a compliance therewith, title to the same should not pass, and the intended transfer should not be effective for any purpose. While the car was registered in the name of the vendor of plaintiff, there was no compliance on his part with the provisions referred to. Hence, by reason of such omission, appellant, relying upon the provision of section 367 of the Code of Civil Procedure that "every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, * * *" insists that, conceding the conversion by defendant, no cause of action existed in favor of plaintiff therefor.

The general rule is that "actual possession of a chattel at the time of a conversion thereof will sustain trover, except as to the true owner, or one claiming under him, even though the title be conceded to be in a third person" (38 Cyc. 2046 and 2047), in support of which principle, among numerous cases cited, is that of Sutton v. Buck, 2 Taunt. 302, wherein it was held that possession of a ship under a transfer void for noncompliance with the register acts is a sufficient title in trover against a stranger. Therefore, assuming that by reason of noncompliance with the conditions prescribed by section 8 of the Vehicle Act, plaintiff was not the owner of the car, nevertheless he was, with the consent of the true owner, in the actual and rightful possession thereof; and hence by virtue of such possession, under the rule stated, he was entitled to maintain an action either in replevin or to recover damages for the conversion of the chattel.

We find no merit in the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

Under a contract requiring the completion of a building in 120 working days, but providing that the time during which the contractor was delayed by the act or neglects of the owner or by inclement weather should be added to the time for completion, where only 131 days, after deducting Sundays, holidays, and Saturday afternoons, elapsed between the date of the contract and the date of practical completion, during which time considerable extra work was done, a finding of the court that the building was completed within a reasonable time and that any delay was acquiesced in by the owner, and was not due to the contractor's failure, default, or neglect was fully warranted.

5. Mechanics' liens §309—Judgment for lien claimant not reversed for failure to furnish written guarantee before final payment where ready and able to furnish same.

In an action to foreclose a mechanics' lien, where the court found that at the time final payment was demanded and at all times since plaintiff was ready, and able to furnish his personal guarantee, under the terms of the contract, to keep the building water tight for five years, and had filed such guarantee in court, and the evidence showed that plaintiff furnished a guarantee of the roofing contractor which was accepted by defendant's architect, there being some uncertainty as to whether the contract called for a guarantee by the roofing contractor or by the general contractor, a judgment for plaintiff should not be reversed because he failed to properly comply with a provision of the contract requiring him to furnish the guarantee before final payment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by Hans P. Nelson against L. B. Hoge and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. F. Riley, of San Francisco, for appellant.

H. F. Craig, of Oakland, for respondent Nelson.

Grant & Bailey, of Woodland, for respondent Bank of Yolo.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien upon property owned by the defendant Hoge. The defendant, Bank of Yolo, is the mortgagee of the property, and as its rights were fully protected by the judgment of the trial court, it is not a party to this appeal.

The plaintiff is a general contractor who constructed for the defendant, under a written contract, an apartment house in Oakland. Payments were made by the defendant, from time to time, according to the terms of said contract, as the building operations progressed. On October 28, 1918, defendant accepted said building, and on October 29, 1918, made the completion payment to the plaintiff and recorded notice of completion in the office of the county recorder. According to the terms of the contract between the parties, the final payment of the balance of $7,173.75 due upon the contract price of the building, was to be made 35 days after acceptance, i. e., on December 3, 1918. Defendant failed and refused to make said final payment, and on December 17, 1918, plaintiff filed for record his claim of lien, and later commenced this action to enforce the same.

[1] We shall consider first appellant's objection that the lien was not filed in time. This objection is based upon the finding of the court that the building was "on the 4th day of October, 1918, practically and substantially completed and ready for occupancy, and was thereafter, and to wit, on the 29th day of October, 1918, and from that time forward, actually occupied by said defendant Hoge." The building was actually accepted on October 28th, and notice of completion filed for record on October 29th. Claim of lien was filed December 17, 1918, which was well within the time allowed if computation be made from October 29th, but would be too late, if computation be made from October 4th. It has been expressly decided in the case of Hughes Mfg. Co. v. Hathaway, 174 Cal. 44, 161 Pac. 1159, that the time allowed a materialman within which to file his claim of lien begins to run from the date of the filing of the notice of completion. See, also, Pioneer Paper Co. v. Hathaway, 39 Cal. App. 405, 179 Pac. 227.

[2] Appellant argues that the contractor failed in many particulars to fulfill his contract; that in the matter of painting and plastering and roofing, and in the quality of the materials furnished, and in many other particulars, plaintiff failed to do what was required of him under the terms of his contract with the defendant. It would serve no useful purpose for us to discuss in detail the evidence regarding these various matters, nor to discuss each objection separately. It is admitted that there were some defects in the building, and that there were some particulars in which it did not conform to specifications. In the light of the findings, however, we must accept as true the testimony which is in harmony with plaintiff's contentions. That testimony, given by the plaintiff and by Mr. Hall, representative of the bonding company, and by Mr. Doell, was to the effect that there had been numerous complaints by the defendant as to the manner in which the plaintiff had performed his part of the contract, and that a conference was held between these gentlemen and the owner, at which the owner pointed out, on the premises, the various matters of which he was complaining; that the parties then went to the Builder's Exchange, where the entire situation was discussed, the conference lasting the entire day; that at this conference, it was agreed between the parties hereto that certain allowances in money should be made to the defendant for some of the defects which he claimed, and that, in addition, the plaintiff should make certain changes and remedy certain defects, and that the defendant would accept the building and make the completion payment, after deducting therefrom the amount allowed for defects, etc.

By the terms of the contract between the plaintiff and defendant, payments were to be made only upon certificate of the architect employed by the defendant. The architect, after this conference and compromise agreement of the parties, gave his certificate for the completion payment, less the amount of the deductions allowed defendant. This payment was accordingly made by the defendant, who then accepted the building and agreed to pay the balance due within 35 days. After the expiration of this time, plaintiff received from the architect the required certificate, entitling him to the final payment of $7,173.75. He presented this certificate to the defendant and requested payment. According to plaintiff's testimony defendant stated that he did not have his check book with him, but would bring it from San Francisco the next day. On the next day, plaintiff went to see the defendant, who again made an excuse for not making the payment, and said he would make it on the following Friday, but failed to make it at any time.

Appellant quotes numerous extracts from the record to show that there were many particulars in which the work of the contractor was not satisfactory, nor according to contract. This is, of course, obvious from the record; but the court has found that the building was accepted by the defendant after an adjustment of all differences between the parties and an allowance to the defendant. The appellant contends that this acceptance was conditioned upon the plaintiff remedying certain defects. The plaintiff testified that he has done the things required of him by this compromise agreement. Defendant contents that by the compromise agreement plaintiff was to remedy all defects and make the work conform to the standard established by the contract. Taking this view of the situation, it is met by the findings of the court. The trial judge personally inspected the premises with counsel, and examined all the alleged defects in the building, and after such personal inspection and the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses, finds:

"That the work performed in the construction of said building and material furnished and used in the construction thereof under a fair interpretation of the contract, plans and specifications taken as a whole, was done and performed in a workmanlike manner and in substantial compliance with the plans and specifications throughout, and that such imperfections as appear or exist in the work are trivial in their nature and effect, both as to appearance and workmanship."

Under such circumstances, we may not inquire anew into the facts, but must accept the findings of the trial court.

[3] Appellant also contends that allowance should have been made to him for damage suffered by reason of delay in completing the building. The contract provided that the building should be completed in 120 working days. It was also provided in the contract:

"The time during which the contractor is delayed in said work by the acts or neglects of the owner or his employees, or those under him by contract, or otherwise, or by stormy and inclement weather which delays the work shall be added to the time for completion as aforesaid."

It appears that there was added to the contract extra work amounting to $580, which would, of course, allow additional time. It is to be noted that deducting Sundays, holidays and Saturday afternoons, the total number of days which elapsed between April 16th, the date of the contract, and October 4th, the date of practical completion, was 131 days. This was only 11 days more than the time allowed by the original contract, and in that time extra work, amounting to $580, was done. Furthermore, the testimony showed that there had been rain on September 12 and on September 23, which would also allow more time to the plaintiff within which to perform his contract. Under these circumstances, we think the finding of the court that the building was completed within a reasonable time, and that any delay in the time of completion was acquiesced in by the defendant, and was not due to the failure, default or neglect of the plaintiff was fully warranted.

[4] The only other point argued by the appellants is that the payment for which this action was brought was not due to the plaintiff, because he did not properly comply with a provision of the contract requiring him to furnish to the owner, before the final payment, a written guarantee agreeing to keep the entire building perfectly water tight for a period of five years from the date of its final acceptance. The court found with relation to this matter that on December 7, 1918, plaintiff offered to make, execute, and deliver to said defendant his personal guarantee under the terms of the contract to keep the building water tight for a period of five years from date of completion, and did then and there demand from said L. B. Hoge payment to him of said sum of $7,173.75, which payment, or any part thereof, said defendant Hoge failed, neglected, and refused to make. While the evidence on this question, perhaps, does not go to the extent of the finding made, nevertheless, it does appear from the evidence that the plaintiff furnished a guarantee of the roofing contractor which was accepted by the architect without objection as to its form or substance. It appears that there was some uncertainty in the minds of the parties as to whether the contract called for a guarantee by the roofing contractor or by the general contractor. The refusal of the defendant to make the final payment was not based upon the absence of the guarantee of the plaintiff with reference to the roofing, and it appears from the testimony of plaintiff that he was at all times ready, willing, and able to furnish his personal guarantee according to the terms of the contract.

The trial court has found that, at the time the final payment was demanded and at all times since, the plaintiff has been ready, willing, and able to furnish and deliver said guarantees according to his agreement, and has, in the course of the trial, produced, offered, filed and delivered in open court said written guarantees, and each thereof, and the same are now on file in the action for the use and benefit of said defendant Hoge. The record discloses that the personal guarantee with relation to the roofing, so filed in the trial court, is in strict conformity with the terms of the contract. It is apparent, therefore, that no injustice has been done the defendant in the matter of the guarantees and that the judgment should not be reversed upon that account.

There are no other matters in the briefs requiring discussion. The judgment is affirmed.

KINNEY v. JOS. HERSPRING & CO. et al.
(Civ. 2317.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 22, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 19, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 1011(1)—Findings of fact based on conflicting evidence conclusive.

A finding will not be disturbed on appeal where based upon conflicting evidence, no inherent discrepancies or weaknesses appearing in the testimony supporting it.

2. Guaranty $\S$ 36(3)—Telegram held unqualified guaranty of payment of note.

A telegram from creditor of maker of note to payee, "Advise you to indorse and make your note payable to me mailing same immediately I will guarantee payment on it you will have to do this so that I will be able to protect you otherwise I have no authority to hold out and honor any draft you may draw immediately upon settlement which will be next ten days I will mail you our check attend to this matter at once I will make F. (maker) believe I purchased the note from you at discount this is strictly confidential," held an unqualified guaranty of payment of the note, and not a mere agreement to pay if property in the hands of the sender should sell for more than the maker's indebtedness to the sender.

3. Frauds, statute of $\S$ 125(3)—Requirement of written guaranty mere rule of evidence and contract not per se invalid.

The provision in Civ. Code, § 2793, that a guaranty shall be in writing, is in effect a statute of frauds, and involves a mere rule of evidence, and such a contract not in writing is not per se invalid, simply being unenforceable in a judicial proceeding.

4. Guaranty $\S$ 16(4)—Agreement not to garnish consideration for guaranty of note.

An agreement of guaranty of payment of promissory note by creditor of maker having property in his hands, was supported by a valid consideration, where the payee of the note agreed not to put into execution a threat made by him to the creditor that he would garnish to satisfy the note, whether such payee could or could not have realized anything or obtained any benefit from an attachment of the property.

5. Guaranty $\S$ 25(3)—Held supported by consideration for previous oral agreement.

Where creditor orally guaranteed payment of a note executed by debtor to third person in consideration of payee's agreement to forego attachment of property in the hands of the creditor, held that court did not err in finding that a subsequent writing evidencing the guaranty embraced the terms of the oral agreement, and the consideration upon which it was made.

6. Guaranty $\S$ 50—Indorsement of note to guarantor for collection held not to transfer the guarantee.

Where promissory note was indorsed to the guarantor thereof merely for purpose of collection from the maker, such guaranty of payment of the note did not pass to the indorsee so as to prevent the indorser from recovering on the contract of guaranty, the indorser never at any time parting with his beneficial interest in the note.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by A. T. Kinney against Jos. Herspring & Co., and Jos. Herspring, individually. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Robert H. Schwab, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Wachhorst & Wachhorst, of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. This action is against Joseph Herspring & Co. and Joseph Herspring, individually, the complaint alleging that—

"Jos. Herspring is the sole owner of and the sole person interested in the firm known and designated as Jos. Herspring & Co."

The action is upon an alleged guaranty for the payment of a promissory note executed by one H. A. French to the plaintiff. Said note was dated at Sacramento, July 12, 1917, and was payable "one day after date, without grace," and provides that "in case suit is instituted to collect this note or any portion thereof" the maker would pay any additional sum as the court may adjudge reasonable as attorney's fees in said suit. The note is set out in the complaint. After stating that "the whole of said note is due, owing and unpaid," the complaint proceeds:

"That on the 14th day of February, 1918, at Sacramento city, county of Sacramento, state of California, defendants, for a valuable consideration received prior to said date, made and subscribed a memorandum in writing of which the following is a copy:

"Western Union Telegram

"Sacramento Cal Feb 14

"A. T. Kinney 1523 Rockefeller Bldg. Advise you to indorse and make your note payable to me mailing same immediately I will guarantee payment on it you will have to do this so that I will be able to protect you otherwise I have no authority to hold out and honor any draft you may draw Immediately upon settlement which will be next ten days I will mail you our check attend to this matter at once I will make French believe I purchased the note from you at discount this is strictly confidential. Jos. Herspring and Co."

"That the above and foregoing memorandum was delivered to plaintiff by defendants and thereby promised to answer to plaintiff for the debt of said H. A. French as evidenced by the herein set forth promissory note."

A demurrer to the complaint upon both general and special grounds was overruled, and thereupon the defendant answered, interposing, after certain admissions and denials, a reply to plaintiff's claim of guaranty, a digest of which may thus be given:

That the maker of the note above referred to (H. A. French) was indebted to defendant in an amount in excess of the sum of $22,000 as for and on account of advances made by defendant to French for the purpose of growing and harvesting certain bean crops; that, the beans having been harvested, the same were turned over to defendant to market for French, the former, upon the sale of the beans, to retain so much as might be realized on such sale as would satisfy his claim against French, and the balance to be paid to French; that, at some time in the year 1917, after the beans had been harvested and were in the possession of the defendant for the above indicated purpose, plaintiff offered "to sell to the defendant the promissory note set forth in the complaint for the sum of $1,000, or desired an advance on behalf of said French of $1,000;" that defendant declined to advance any money to plaintiff for French, and stated to plaintiff he would advance no more money for French, for the reason that the latter was already indebted to him (defendant) in the sum of $22,000, etc.; that the defendant at the same time stated to plaintiff that if he (defendant), upon marketing the beans, had remaining in his possession of the funds derived from selling said beans any sum or sums of money in excess of French's indebtedness to him, he (defendant) "would protect said plaintiff, provided that said plaintiff would indorse over to said defendant the said promissory note;" that nothing further was said or done relative to the said note until the sending by defendant to plaintiff of the telegram set out in the complaint, and of which a copy is presented hereinabove; that at the time said telegram was so sent, the beans were about to be sold and that it was believed that the moneys received upon such sale would be sufficient to satisfy both the indebtedness of French to defendant and the note from French to plaintiff; that the beans were sold, but it turned out that, owing to the inferior quality thereof, the proceeds of the sale thereof were sufficient only to satisfy defendant's debt against French.

The answer sets up as a special defense that "there is no consideration" for the alleged contract of guaranty.

As may be implied from the foregoing, the defendant did not deny the due execution of the note set out in the complaint, or that it constituted, at the time of the commencement of the action, a subsisting obligation in favor of plaintiff and against French, and did not deny that he sent to plaintiff the telegram set out in the complaint. The findings are substantially of the facts as alleged in the complaint. The finding as to the alleged contract of guaranty is that it was executed "for a valuable consideration and in consideration that plaintiff indorse the promissory note (in question) to said defendant and deliver" same to him.

Judgment passed to plaintiff, and the defendant presents this appeal therefrom.

The defendant urges and argues these points as grounds for a reversal of the judgment: (1) That the telegram pleaded in the complaint, "read and construed in its entirety," shows that it was not intended to evidence a guaranty of the payment of the note in suit by the defendant; (2) that, assuming that the telegram was intended as a guaranty or the written evidence thereof, there was no consideration therefor passing from the plaintiff to the defendant, and that, therefore, the alleged guaranty is without legal force or nonenforceable.

It will, it is conceived, clarify the discussion of the points advanced in support of defendant's demand for a reversal of the judgment to present first a history of the case as it is disclosed by the evidence.

In the year 1917, the maker of the promissory note in suit, H. A. French, was about to engage in the planting and cultivation of beans on about 1,000 acres of leased land situated in Sutter basin, Sutter county. In July of that year, finding himself without financial means with which to carry out said project, French entered into negotiations with the defendant (who was then doing a brokerage business under the firm name of Jos. Herspring & Co.) for a loan from the latter of sufficient money for his said purposes, and, after considering the proposition, the defendant agreed to and did provide French with such an amount of money as was found necessary to purchase the quantity of seed required for the entire acreage the latter had under lease. The beans were planted, but from time to time thereafter, and until they were harvested, the defendant, in response to calls for more money by French, to be used in harvesting the crop, made advances to French until the total sum so advanced and loaned amounted approximately to $22,000. The beans, after being harvested, were given over to the possession of the defendant, with the understanding that he would market the same, and, after reimbursing himself for the advances made to French, deliver or pay to the latter whatever sum that might remain over of the amount realized on the sale of the crop.

It appears that the plaintiff was, at the time of the several transactions occurring between him and French and between him and Herspring, a resident of Cleveland, in the state of Ohio. It further appears that, in the year 1917, a son of the plaintiff was employed in the state motor vehicle department of the state of California, at Sacramento city, in said state; that, in the year 1917, said French was superintendent of said department. The plaintiff testified:

"In July of the year 1917—I think it was July 12, 1917— * * * Mr. French wired me and said he had gone into a proposition of raising beans, and he was short of money; if he could not raise $4,000.00 immediately he would lose all he had invested. Following that telegram, a telegram from my son advised me to help Mr. French out; then I wired Mr. French that he should draw on me for $4,000, which he did, and wired a draft, and then he mailed me the note (the note in suit). The note was to be paid—I think it is a sight draft—the latter part of October (1917), but I heard nothing from him of any consequence, so I came out here in January, the following January (1918); he informed me that he had placed all of his goods in the lands of Mr. Herspring. Well, of course, I wanted my money, and he said the stock of beans had not been sold, and he did not think Mr. Herspring would pay anything until the property was disposed of. Then I asked him if he could give me a part of it; he said he would see what he could do. And he informed me he saw Mr. Herspring, and Mr. Herspring refused to pay anything until the property was disposed of. So then I called on Mr. Herspring, and my intention was—I told him so—if the matter was not settled I would garnishee the account. He said 'Mr. Kinney, don't do that; no occasion for doing that,' he said, 'I will give you my word of honor as a gentleman I will pay you every dollar so you won't lose a cent;' just exactly what he said; gave me his hand and shook hands with me. So, taking his word for it, I did not garnishee the account. And it ran along for some time. My attorney has letters there, signed by Mr. Herspring and Herspring & Co., stating that he would pay the money; 'for me not to worry about it;' that is right there, signed by him."

Plaintiff, continuing, testified:

That the defendant on the occasion above referred to "guaranteed to pay me and to pay me in full; he (defendant) said: 'You need not worry about it,' that it would be unnecessary to garnishee the account; * * * it was upon this conversation (with defendant) that I refrained from levying the attachment, or proceeding further to secure myself for the collection of the account."

Proceeding plaintiff stated:

That, while in Sacramento at the time mentioned, he bought a bungalow in said city for his son; that, being a little short of money then, he asked defendant to make a payment of $1,000 on the note, so that he could pay the purchase price of the bungalow; that, at first, defendant said that he had not sold the beans, and that he could, therefore, not "pay" plaintiff then, but before plaintiff left the office of defendant, the latter said: "Mr. Kinney, if you are in need of money for that bungalow so badly, I will give you a couple of thousand dollars," to which proposition plaintiff replied: "I can make arrangements to get the money for the bungalow, I don't want to discommode you, because you claim you haven't sold the goods,' therefore I passed it along. That is all, absolutely the conversation in his office with Mr. Herspring."

Herspring, so plaintiff testified, said to the latter that the bean market then "was low," but that "the market will be up the beginning of March," he thought." Defendant promised the plaintiff that he (plaintiff) would have his money "by the first of March or early in February." To this, plaintiff replied: "Then I will make a draft on you." Defendant assented at first to that proposition, but almost immediately recalled such assent, saying: "No, don't do it; I will send you a check."

At some time after the conversation between plaintiff and defendant related above, the plaintiff left California for his home in Ohio. No communication between the parties concerning the note in suit was had after plaintiff returned to his home until the receipt by him of the telegram from the defendant which is set out in the complaint and above reproduced herein. The date of said telegram, it will be noted, is February 14, 1918. The plaintiff could not exactly fix the period of time that elapsed between the date of the conversation with Herspring in Sacramento, in which the latter orally agreed to guarantee payment of the note, and the receipt of the said telegram. Plaintiff stated, however, that the conversation referred to took place near or about the middle of January, and from this it may be assumed, or at least inferred, that the period of time elapsing between the two events was approximately a month. But be that as it may, the plaintiff immediately upon receipt of said telegram forwarded the note in suit to defendant, indorsed upon the back thereof as follows: "Pay to Jos. Herspring & Co. or order, without recourse. A. T. Kinney."

Subsequently to the receipt by plaintiff of the telegram of February 14, 1918, from defendant, considerable correspondence, both by letter and wire, passed between the parties. The letters and telegrams were introduced in evidence. There is no necessity for presenting those documents herein. It is enough to state generally the substance of most of them, and so it may be said that, from the letters of defendant to the plaintiff, with the exception of one, it may fairly be implied that the first named regarded the transaction between him and plaintiff as involving a mere promise or agreement on his part to satisfy the French note only in the event that enough money was realized on the sale of the beans, after his own reimbursement out of the funds so received, to pay said note. The exception referred to embraces a letter to plaintiff dated March 19, 1918, in which defendant stated to the former, among other things, that he did "not want you to feel as though we had forgotten our promises to you regarding your note with French." The other letters of defendant to plaintiff were written after it had become evident to the former that the beans would not yield the returns that he had expected. The letters and telegrams of plaintiff to defendant, however, plainly indicate that he (plaintiff) regarded defendant as a guarantor of the payment of the note. In fact, they amounted to demands upon or requests addressed to defendant to pay the note.

Thus there has been presented substantially the evidence offered and received in support of the averments of the complaint.

[1] As might naturally be expected in a case where, as here, issue is joined upon the facts relied upon by the plaintiff and the defendant to sustain their respective claims, there is a positive variance between the story of the defendant and that of the plaintiff of the purport of the conversation between them in January, 1918, when the latter was in Sacramento. The defendant emphatically denied that, on the occasion mentioned, he agreed to guarantee the payment of the note upon the promise of plaintiff that he would not execute a threat to levy an attachment on the beans to secure the satisfaction of his note. Indeed, defendant went so far as to say that no such threat was made by plaintiff in the course of the conversation referred to, or at any other time in his presence or hearing. But the net result of the denials or adversary showing by defendant was or is only the production of an evidential disparity, the solution of which by the trial court in favor of plaintiff, there being no inherent discrepancies or weaknesses in his testimony, is conclusive upon us.

[2] The position of the counsel for the defendant is, however, first, that, viewing the telegram of February 14, 1918, as a whole or in its entirety, it cannot reasonably be construed as importing or implying an intention in the defendant to guarantee the payment of the note; that, to the contrary (so the counsel proceeds), the telegram is capable of no other construction than that the agreement of defendant was that he would pay the note only upon the contingency that there was sufficient of the proceeds of the sale of the beans remaining in his hands to do so after his claim against French had been satisfied. The argument in support of that proposition is predicated mainly upon the words of the telegram:

"You will have to do this (indorse the note over to defendant) so that I will be able to protect you, otherwise I have no authority to hold out and honor any draft you may draw."

We are unable to discern any just reason for subscribing to counsel's position or the argument which he essays in support of it. The language of the telegram upon which the counsel relies to support his construction immediately follows language involving an unqualified and unconditional guaranty of the payment of the note, and, while doubtless it is true that there is to be implied from the telegram an intention or a desire or a purpose in the defendant to execute his contract of guaranty by means of funds obtained from a sale of the beans, we can perceive no just reason for holding that the language of the telegram affording that implication was intended to or does impair or detract from the force of the agreement of guaranty as it is embodied in the message. Indeed, we regard this a fair construction of the telegram: That, defendant having guaranteed the payment of the note for the reason above explained, and to be hereinafter considered, conceived that he could the better protect himself from loss as a result of his guaranty by having the note indorsed over to him, thus enabling him to reckon it in his account against French upon a settlement with the latter after the sale of the beans. But, whatever might have been his design or purpose in having the ownership of the note transferred to him, it is clear, as we have pointed out, that the telegram contains an agreement of guaranty by defendant of the payment of the note, unqualified by any of the other words or language thereof. Manifestly, it may be suggested, if the telegram had said, "I will guarantee payment of the note, provided there can be realized from a sale of the beans sufficient money to do so, after my claim has first been satisfied," a different question would be presented here. That, however, as has been shown, is not the telegram or the reasonable purport of its language.

The second proposition is that the guaranty is not supported by a consideration; that, if the alleged promise of plaintiff, in the conversation with defendant in January, 1918, that he would forbear attaching the beans on defendant's guaranty to pay the note, is counted on as the consideration supporting the written guaranty subsequently made, then it is insufficient to support the agreement for the reason that it is "a past consideration"—that is, a consideration without force when given and incapable, therefore, of being carried into the written agreement.

[3, 4] It is the law that a contract of guaranty must be supported by a consideration (Civ. Code, § 2792), and must be in writing (Civ. Code, § 2793). The provision that the guaranty shall be in writing is in effect a statute of frauds, and involves a mere rule of evidence. The fact that contracts which come within the provisions of statutes of frauds are not in writing does not render them per se invalid—that is, such contracts orally made are in themselves perfectly valid, but, by reason of the requirement that they shall be reduced to writing, they are not enforceable in a judicial proceeding unless committed to writing. In re Balfour & Garrette, 14 Cal. App. 261, 266, 111 Pac. 615, 618. The agreement of guaranty by defendant here, as originally or orally made, was supported by the agreement of the plaintiff that he would not put into execution the threat made by him to the defendant that, to satisfy his note, he would levy upon the beans. No one would say that if, at that time, the guaranty had been reduced to writing, it could not have been enforced in an appropriate action in court as a contract resting upon a valid consideration.

Whether the plaintiff could have realized anything on, or obtained any benefit from an attachment of the beans, is immaterial. He had the right to attempt to secure satisfaction of the debt out of any property not exempt from execution that he might have reason to believe that French owned. The defendant presumably knew this. At any rate, it is very clear that for some reason, evidently satisfactory to himself, the defendant desired that the plaintiff should not complicate matters by levying an attachment on the beans, resulting in litigation which might (as perhaps he believed) diminish his chances for the full satisfaction of his own claim, and, so far as there is anything in this record to show to the contrary, it is equally clear that plaintiff, in agreeing to refrain from attaching the beans, surrendered, or forbore exercising, a legal right. This forbearance upon the part of the plaintiff continued and was, we may presume, intended by defendant to be carried into the written agreement of guaranty as a consideration therefor. If not, why did defendant put the guaranty in writing? But if the reply to this query again be that defendant thus merely intended to agree that he would pay the note only upon the condition that there was money enough realized out of the sale of the beans after his own claim had been satisfied to do so, the answer is that the plaintiff not only had the right to rely, but did rely, upon the agreement as being an unconditional promise to pay in consideration of his surrendering or giving up his right to attach. A party who induces another to give up or forbear exercising a remedial right which, if exercised at the time of promising to forbear, might have preserved to him important substantive rights, should not be permitted to escape the consequences of his promise except upon a very clear showing that his promise was not in fact or in legal effect what it appeared to be or the other party understood it to be.

We must accept the finding of the trial court here that the transaction was precisely as the plaintiff understood it to be, and that the consideration for the written guaranty was that agreed upon in the previous negotiations of the parties. As we view it, the situation presented here is no different in principle from that presented in the case of In re Balfour & Garrette, supra. There one Worley had been employed by Balfour & Garrette, a corporation, to sell, in tracts of small subdivisions, a large body of land, for which he was to receive as compensation, in addition to a stated monthly salary, certain commissions on each sale. The original agreement of the parties was made in the year 1907, and was oral. In March, 1908, after a few sales had been made by Worley, the corporation, by one of its authorized agents, addressed a letter to Worley, in which the terms of their agreement, as originally and orally made, were expressed. The court, replying to the point made by appellant that the agreement as originally made was not enforceable because it was not committed to writing, and that the subsequent writing—that is, the letter—could not be regarded as being referable to the oral agreement, said:

“The foregoing letter clearly defines the terms of the oral agreement previously entered into between the parties. It is definite and certain, and leaves no ground for conjecture as to its meaning or the intention of the parties, or the terms and conditions upon which Worley’s employment rested. And we think it is clearly sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the statute, notwithstanding the fact that it was not written until after the execution of the terms of the agreement on Worley’s part.”

[5] Here, as we have seen, the plaintiff, before and down to the time he received the telegram in question, had carried out his part of the oral agreement—that is, he had refrained from levying an attachment on the beans as he agreed to do upon the promise of defendant that he would guarantee the payment of the note. It a word, the written guaranty here, as in the case of the written agreement in the Balfour & Garrette Case, embraces the terms of the oral agreement, and presumably the consideration upon which it was made.

There is an obvious dissimilarity between the instant case and the cases cited by the defendant. For instance, in the case of Chaffee v. Browne, 109 Cal. 211, 41 Pac. 1028, the wife mortgaged her separate property to secure an antecedent individual indebtedness of her husband, no new note or new promise having been made; or, as was said by Mr. Justice Shaw, in McDonald v. Randall, 139 Cal. 246, 252, 72 Pac. 997, 999, in speaking of the case of Chaffee v. Browne:

“The mortgage was given by the wife on her separate property a considerable time after the debt had matured, and not in consequence of any threat to sue, nor in consideration of any extension of time or other benefit or detriment to either of the parties. The mortgage contained no promise to pay the debt. There was a recital that the mortgagors were jointly and severally indebted to the mortgagee in the sum named, but this was properly held to be nothing more than an acknowledgment of the existence of the pre-existing debt. It is clear that it could not constitute a new promise. The case was nothing more than an application of the familiar principle that where a debt has been already created the entering into an obligation to pay the same by a third person as surety, after the creation of the debt, and without any new consideration, such as delay or extension of time, it is not a binding obligation upon the surety.”

The case of Lagomarsino v. Giannini, 146 Cal. 545, 80 Pac. 698, and the other cases named by defendant, will be found, upon an examination of them, to be altogether different in their facts from this. We will not take the time to review them herein. The question of guaranteeing or becoming a surety on an antecedent obligation of a third party without a sufficient consideration therefor is not in this case, as we think the evidence clearly shows.

[6] Another point suggested by appellant is that, the note having been assigned or indorsed over to the defendant by the plaintiff, the debt evidenced by the note thereupon became the property of the defendant, together with any securities which might have been given for the payment of the note. The proposition here sought to be invoked by counsel is stated in 20 Cyc. p. 1423, as follows:

"Where one by assignment or indorsement becomes the owner of a debt, the transfer carries with it as an incident all securities for its payment. A general guaranty, written upon a negotiable promissory note of the payment of it, passes, by assignment and delivery of the note, to the holder thereof, although nothing is said touching the guaranty. Where the guaranty of the payment of the note is embodied in an instrument separate from the note, it will pass by delivery of the note without any written assignment."

A conclusive reply to this proposition is that the record unquestionably shows that plaintiff was at all times, even after the indorsement of the note in suit over to defendant, the owner of said note, or owned the beneficial interest therein. The evidence indisputably shows that the plaintiff never at any time parted with his ownership of the note, the same having been, as seen, assigned to defendant, at the request of the latter, for no other purpose than to enable defendant to recoup against loss from the payment of the note, when he finally had a settlement with French. There is absolutely no dispute upon this proposition. Indeed the defendant returned the note to the plaintiff after he discovered that he could not realize enough money out of the sale of the beans to satisfy it, after reimbursing himself for the moneys he had advanced to French.

The judgment is affirmed.

SACKETT et al. v. MORSE.

BRIGGS et al. v. REYNOLDS et al.

(Civ. 3595.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 20, 1921.)

1. Records 9(11)—No power in court to set aside decree under act for certification of land titles except upon grounds provided.

Outside of the ordinary proceedings for obtaining a new trial in an action, a trial court has no power to set aside or vacate on motion a decree entered under St. 1915, p. 1932, certifying land title, except where void upon its face, unless the motion be made upon the grounds and within the time limited by Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

2. Records 9(11)—Findings held not to show fraud in obtaining decree certifying land titles.

A finding that court was "led to believe" a certain fact when rendering a decree certifying a land title under St. 1915, p. 1932, was not a conclusive finding that such belief was result of any fraud, deceit, or false testimony of the petitioner, amounting to nothing more than a finding that court was mistaken, which would not affect the conclusive nature of a decree under such statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

In the matter of petition for registration of title to lands of Horace David Sackett and others, plaintiffs; Kirke W. Reynolds and others, petitioners, against Kate Barnard Morse, and in the matter of like petition concerning lands of Solon Briggs and others, plaintiffs; Kate Barnard Morse, petitioner, against Kirke W. Reynolds and others. The cases were consolidated. From an adverse decree, Kate Barnard Morse appeals. Reversed.

T. C. Gould, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ticknor & Carter, of Pasadena, and J. S. Crail, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. The foregoing cases were consolidated and tried as one case. Kate Barnard Morse, defendant in the one case and petitioner in the other, appeals from the "judgment and interlocutory decree" and from an order requiring her to sign and acknowledge a certain map and plat.

On November 10, 1916, application No. 6, in L. R. No. 112, was filed by Mrs. Morse. That was an application for the registration of her title to two parcels of land, being, respectively, the south half and the north half of lot 1 in Howell's subdivision, in the county of Los Angeles, as per map recorded in Book 23, page 92, Miscellaneous Records of said county, excepting a 20-foot strip on the north side of said first parcel and a 20-foot strip on the south side of the second, for road purposes. In each description in the petition it is stated that the easterly line of said lot is parallel with and 20 feet westerly from the center line of Marengo avenue. According to the map of Howell's subdivision as recorded, lot 1 is a rectangle measuring 550 feet on the east and west lines thereof and 198 feet on the north and south lines. Said petition alleged that the owners of the land adjoining said lot on the west are Ida M. Reynolds, Julia B. Reynolds, and Kirke W. Reynolds. Marie Reynolds is the wife of Kirke W. Reynolds. The statutory notice was personally served upon each and all of the respondents Reynolds. The notice contained the same description of property claimed as in the petition. The parties served having failed to appear, and their default having been duly entered, the matter was heard by the court. On March 7, 1917, a decree granting said petition for registration was entered and a certified copy thereof filed with the registrar of Los Angeles county. Thereupon the registrar issued to applicant Morse certificates of title, respectively numbered 1464 and 1465, declaring her to be the owner of the lands described. The descriptions contained in the decree and certificates were the same as in the petition and notice.

On September 28, 1917, the registrar of titles filed with the court in said matter a request for instructions under section 99 of the Land Title Law (St. 1915, p. 1948). He certified that there had been presented to him a request from Mrs. Morse, registered owner of the properties described upon certificates numbered 1464 and 1465, the request being that the registrar cancel said certificates and issue in lieu thereof new certificates covering the same property, but described as lot A of tract 2904, as per recorded map thereof, and lot A of tract 2985, as per recorded map thereof. The registrar, being in doubt as to his authority to grant such request, asked the court for instructions. On the same day, and without notice, the court ordered that the registrar cancel certificates 1464 and 1465 and issue in lieu thereof new certificates covering the same property. Thereupon certificates numbered 2958 and 2959 were issued in accordance with the request so made and the order of the court.

Thereafter, on the 29th day of October, 1917, the petitioners Reynolds filed a petition, being application No. 25 of L. R. 171, requesting registration of their title to property therein described, located in said Howell's subdivision. The land so described adjoins lot 1 on the west, and includes the west 5 feet of lot 1 as described in the decree of March 7, 1917, if, according to that description, each of said parcels in lot 1 measures 198 feet on the north and south lines thereof.

Thereafter the said parties Reynolds filed an application for a supplementary decree in L. R. No. 112. Referring to the application of Mrs. Morse, in No. 112, they alleged that the notice served upon them in that proceeding made no reference whatever to lot No. 2 of said subdivision (lot 2 being the lot next west of lot 1), nor to the westerly line of said lot 1; that they made no answer or objections to said registration because no part of lot 2 was described in the notice. They further alleged:

"That thereafter, and without the knowledge or consent of these defendants, and without any notice to them, or any of them, the said Kate Barnard Morse registered portions of lot 1 and also the easterly 5 feet of said lot 2 of said subdivision, which said lot 2 is the property of these defendants; that the said registration of the easterly 5 feet of said lot 2 of the said subdivision was obtained through a supplementary decree of this court no notice of the application for which supplemental decree was given to these defendants, and the description in said supplemental decree described the property registered therein as lot A of tract No. 2985, and lot A of tract No. 2904. That the court had no jurisdiction over the said westerly 5 feet in said proceeding, land registration No. 112, for the reason that said 5 feet were not included in the petition and in the notice of said proceeding.

"As a further ground for reopening the decree in land registration 112 and for canceling the registration of said 5 feet in said proceeding," further facts were stated to the effect that the true line between lots 1 and 2 had been agreed upon between the parties in interest several years prior to the filing of these petitions.

It was further claimed in this petition for reopening the decree that at the time the notice was served upon them, the parties Reynolds were assured "by the representative of the said Kate Barnard Morse" that their rights up to the boundary line as agreed would be fully protected, and would not be disturbed in the proceedings. It was further alleged that Mrs. Morse falsely testified at the hearing of said application that she was in possession of said 5 feet, and had been in possession thereof for five years prior to the filing of her application, and had further falsely testified and by other means falsely represented to the court that tracts 2985 and 2904 included only the land described in her original petition and in the notice given.

To the foregoing petition for supplemental decree Mrs. Morse demurred on the ground that the petition did not state facts sufficient for granting the relief demanded or for reopening said cause or for granting a supplemental decree therein. The demurrer was overruled. A motion to strike out the petition on the grounds stated, including the ground that there is no authority of law for reopening a decree or for granting a supplemental decree, was also made by Mrs. Morse, which motion was denied. Thereafter, upon answer duly filed by Mrs. Morse, the matter was tried and determined, such trial resulting in the decree and order from which Mrs. Morse has appealed.

We are satisfied that the description of the land claimed by Mrs. Morse, as contained in the decree of March, 1917, covers the 5-foot strip which is the real subject of dispute in this proceeding. The eastern line of lot 1 was definitely described as being 20 feet west of the center line of Marengo avenue. The east and west lines of the two parcels claimed were each and all shown to be 198 feet, according to the recorded map referred to in the petition, notice, and the decree.

The decree of registration therefore established the western boundary of lot 1 as definitely as if the boundaries of the parcels had been completely run by courses and distances.

For the purposes of the appeal we may disregard the substituted certificates issued to Mrs. Morse under the instructions given by the court to the registrar. If those substituted certificates described exactly the same property as do the first certificates, the adverse parties are not injured thereby. If the substituted certificates include other land than that described in the original certificates, and as to such additional land were void for want of notice to the adverse parties, nevertheless Mrs. Morse would retain whatever rights she obtained by the original decree and the certificates issued thereon. The question to be determined is whether or not the court had jurisdiction authorizing it, at the instance of the parties Reynolds, to reopen the decree of March 7, 1917, and modify or set aside that decree.

The original petition of Mrs. Morse in application No. 6 asked to have the described land "brought under the operation of the act adopted by the people of the state of California at a general election held November 3, 1914, entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled, "An act for the certification of land titles, and the simplification of the transfer of real estate," approved March 17, 1897,' " and that she be decreed to be the owner in fee of the described property claimed by her. This initiative act of 1914, as printed in St. 1915, p. 1932, and as published in Deering's General Laws (Ed. of 1915, "Act 1049"), contains no title. Neither does the act in its text contain any reference to the act of March 17, 1897. Since no point or argument has been made herein having reference to the title of the act of 1914, we shall assume that the title of the act as submitted to the people was in the form hereinabove quoted, and that the provisions of law upon which we must rely are fully contained in the initiative act of 1914 as published.

In the decree of March 7, 1917, it was adjudged that the title of Mrs. Morse be forever quieted as to the land found to belong to her, "and this decree shall be final and conclusive as against the rights of all persons or parties, known and unknown, to assert any estate, interest, lien, claim or demand of any kind or nature whatsoever against said land, or any part thereof, except only as hereinbefore found and as in said act provided." This was in conformity with sections 15, 16, and 34 of the Land Title Act, which provide what the decree shall contain and declare the effect of the decree and certificate of registration. Section 16 reads as follows:

"A decree of the court ordering registration shall be in the nature of a decree in rem, shall forever quiet the title to the land therein ordered registered and shall be final and conclusive as against the rights of all persons, known and unknown, to assert any estate, interest, claim, lien or demand of any kind or nature whatsoever, against the land so ordered registered or any part thereof, except only as in this act provided."

[1] As counsel for respondents did not see fit to file any brief or make any argument herein, we are deprived of any suggestion which they might have made to justify the judgment and order from which these appeals are presented. Apparently the position of appellant is correct, and should be sustained. We know of no reason why, in a special proceeding of this character, the power of the court to set aside or vacate its judgment should not be limited as in other cases. Outside of the ordinary proceedings for obtaining a new trial in an action, the trial court has no power to set aside or vacate on motion any judgment not void upon its face, unless the motion be made upon the grounds and within the time limited by section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 673, 77 Pac. 651; People v. Temple, 103 Cal. 447, 37 Pac. 414. The application for supplemental decree herein was not made by respondents within six months from the entry of the decree, and therefore was too late to be within the terms of said section 473. By section 45 of the Land Title Act the right of any person to commence any action at law or in equity adversely to the title or interest certified in the first certificate, bringing land under the operation of the act, is limited to one year following the first registration. Nevertheless, it has been held that after the registration decree has become final the only action by which the land can be recovered, or an interest in it asserted except under the decree, is an action wherein it is sought to set aside the decree and then establish the asserted right to the land, or to an interest in it. Cooper v. Buxton, 199 Pac. 6. In that decision it was further stated:

"It is also to be noted that the one exception which the statute makes to the conclusive nature of the decree is the case of fraud, that this exception repeatedly appears in the statute, and that it is always confined to fraud alone, and never includes mistake. If there be any exception to the operation of section 45, it would seem to be only the case of fraud, and the failure of the statute to unite with it the companion case of mistake would seem to indicate that it was not intended that it should be an exception."

[2] Assuming, without deciding, that the petition of respondents Reynolds might be considered in the light of a suit in equity to set aside the decree, and that the allegations thereon contained constituted a sufficient charge of fraud to sustain the petition against the demurrer of Mrs. Morse, the findings do not confirm the truth of those allegations. Finding 6 states:

"That the court at the time it signed the order including said 5 feet was led to believe that tracts 2985 and 2904 included only the land described in the original petition of said Kate Barnard Morse and in the notice approved by the court in said application, whereas, in truth and in fact, said tracts contained said additional 5 feet."

That the court was "led to believe" the stated fact is far from a finding that such belief was the result of any fraud, deceit, or false testimony of appellant. This finding declares nothing more than that for some reason the court was mistaken in its belief, but, as stated in Cooper v. Buxton, supra, the conclusive nature of the decree is not affected by mere mistake.

Again, we find in section 98 of the said Land Title Law certain provisions for "an order correcting or altering any certificate to comply with the true facts as shown by the petition and proof adduced," and that the court should have jurisdiction to hear and determine the petition after notice to all parties in interest. But it is further stated that—

"The provisions of this section shall not give the court authority to open the original decree of registration."

Appellants further claim that for sundry reasons set forth in their brief the court erred in its order requiring appellant to sign the map; that the decree deprives appellant of all property; that in various particulars the findings are not sustained by the evidence; and that appellant is equitably entitled to the property originally registered by her. We deem it unnecessary to enter into a discussion of these matters, since at all events we are of the opinion that for reasons hereinabove stated the court exceeded its jurisdiction in the matter.

The judgment and order are reversed.

ROSS v. KALIN et al. (Civ. 3571.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 21, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 19, 1921.)

I. Appeal and error §965—Ruling on change of venue not disturbed unless discretion abused.

An application for change of place of trial is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and, unless clear abuse of that discretion is shown, the judgment of trial court will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Venue §50—Refusal to change venue for local prejudice held not an abuse of discretion.

Where numerous contradictory affidavits were presented on both sides, and where it appeared that out of more than 8,000 jurors prejudice against plaintiff existed in the minds of probably 300, the refusal of the court to grant a new place of trial is not an abuse of its discretion.

3. Venue §50—Change for local prejudice not granted on conjecture.

Although the existence of widespread prejudice against plaintiff would tend to make it difficult to secure proof of the prejudice, this circumstance would not justify the court in basing an order for a change of place of trial because of prejudice against plaintiff on evidence of suspicion, conjecture, or hearsay.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by J. Edgar Ross against A. J. Kalin and others. From an order denying motion for change of venue, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Emmet H. Wilson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. L. Brown, of El Centro, for respondents.

MYERS, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order denying his motion for a change of place of trial on the ground that he could not have an impartial trial in Imperial county. The motion was made after answer filed, and submitted upon the pleadings and upon affidavits in behalf of both parties.

Appellant's contention is that the order should be reversed because the allegations of specific facts in the affidavits submitted in support of the motion, upon which the ultimate conclusion of the impossibility of securing an impartial trial is predicated, are not controverted, and therefore the trial court should have given no weight to the counter affidavits, which, in the main, stated merely the conclusion of the affiant that no prejudice existed which would interfere with an impartial trial.

From the voluminous affidavits in the record we cull the following allegations of fact which are substantially uncontroverted: Prior to the assault hereinafter referred to, plaintiff, by his exceptional activity in a crusade against vice conditions in the city of Brawley and other portions of the county, had incurred the enmity and hatred of "a large number of people," some of whom were socially and politically prominent and influential throughout the county. On October 3, 1918, plaintiff was assaulted by a mob, "consisting of a large number of persons," beaten, tarred and feathered, and chained to a tree in a public place in Brawley. There was a Liberty Loan drive in progress at this time, and plaintiff was charged with being disloyal and pro-German. He was then arrested and tried on a criminal charge of uttering threats to do great bodily injury, and fined and imprisoned. On October 3d, and again on October 18th, the Brawley News published editorials approving the mob action. One of the sureties on plaintiff's appeal bond was assaulted, beaten, and threatened with further injury if he would not withdraw therefrom. The other surety received similar threats, and both were threatened with a boycott. One of the sureties on a bond given by plaintiff in a civil action was threatened, and several persons refused to do business with him because of his connection with plaintiff. The attorney who acted for plaintiff was, because thereof, assaulted, beaten, boycotted, and expelled from two fraternal organizations. The plaintiff now has pending three actions for damages, because of the assault, the imprisonment, and the newspaper publications. The defendants in these actions aggregate about 30 in number, many of them men of large wealth, and all of them men of prominence and influence in the community. Said defendants, their friends and associates, have constantly, since the date of the assault, circulated false and scandalous statements concerning the plaintiff for the purpose of prejudicing the minds of the people against him so that he could not obtain a fair trial.

Numerous other allegations of specific facts, presented in support of the motion, may be classified in one of two groups—either they are denied in affidavits submitted by the defendants, thus presenting a conflict of evidence, or they are obviously pure hearsay, and therefore of no evidentiary value.

Defendants' affidavits admit that prejudice against the plaintiff obtains in the city of Brawley, where he resides, but deny that it exists elsewhere in the county.

There remains to be considered numerous conflicting averments of the ultimate conclusion. Some of the affiants, basing their conclusion upon their observations, acquaintance, and conversations with many residents of the county, state their belief that an impartial trial of plaintiff's cases can be had there without doubt or difficulty. Others, upon a similar basis, state an equally positive belief that such a result will be impossible. The defendants submitted affidavits of 24 men, most of whom appear to be men of large affairs and of long residence and wide acquaintance in the county, who aver that there is no prejudice against the plaintiff in any portion of the county outside of the city of Brawley, and that there is no reason why he cannot have an impartial trial in the county.

[1] The rule of law is established by an unbroken line of decisions in this state that—

"Applications like this are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and its action cannot be disturbed on appeal unless it clearly appears that there was an abuse of that discretion." J. I. Case T. Co. v. Copren Bros., 35 Cal. App. 70, 76, 169 Pac. 443, 445.

[2, 3] Applying this rule to the case at bar, it cannot be said to clearly appear that the trial court has abused the discretion committed to it, unless the uncontroverted facts above outlined necessarily afford "reason to believe that an impartial trial cannot be had" in that county. We do not think this can be said to appear.

The most that can be said with confidence is that at a time some 20 months prior to this hearing there had been a strong and bitter feeling of prejudice against the plaintiff in the minds of "a large number" of residents of the county (how large a number we are left to conjecture, except that it was probably in excess of 30 and possibly as many as 300), and that since said time the 30 defendants in appellant's several damage suits, and their friends, have been endeavoring to prejudice the minds of the people against him to prevent his having an impartial trial (with what success we are again left to conjecture).

From the figures submitted as to registered voters, it appears that there were probably more than 8,000, and possibly as many as 12,000 qualified jurors in Imperial county at the time of this hearing. From the affidavits submitted it could not be said with any confidence that more than 300 of those persons bore any prejudice against the plaintiff at any time, and the number may well have been very much less.

We are not unmindful of the circumstance that the very existence of such a widespread prejudice as the appellant claims would tend to make it difficult, if not impossible, to procure proof thereof. But this circumstance would not justify the court in ignoring the rules of evidence to base its order on suspicion, or conjecture, or hearsay.

The right of defendants to have their case tried in the county wherein they and their witnesses reside is a substantial one, and is not to be set aside unless it actually conflicts with the higher right of a plaintiff to have an impartial trial. The trial judge, in deciding that there was no such conflict in the instant case, did not exceed or abuse the legal discretion vested in him.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

MYERS, Judge pro tem. This case involves the same questions as Ross v. Kalin, 200 Pac. 745, this day decided, and it was stipulated that the two cases should be heard together. While the affidavits in this case are fewer in number and go less into detail, it is tacitly agreed by the respective counsel in their briefs that the same reasons for and against the granting of the motion obtain in both cases. Guaranty of payment of a note and the debt secured, to remain in force during all renewals of the indebtedness, is not discharged by agreement for extension of time of payment; that not differing from a renewal so far as concerns rights of the guarantor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Elmer Rodabaugh, executor of E. Milton Greene, against Milton Kauffman and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Woodruff & Shoemaker, of Los Angeles, for appellant Kauffman.

Ernest C. Griffith, Loewenthal, Loeb & Walker, and Loewenthal, Collins & Loewenthal, all of Los Angeles, for appellants Goldschmidt and others.

Harry W. Hanson, of Los Angeles, for appellant American Steel Pipe & Tank Co.

A. P. Michael Narlian, of Los Angeles, Dan W. Simms, of Lafayette, Ind., and E. E. Hendee, of San Diego (Myron W. Silvertown, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment against defendants Kauffman, Goldschmidt Bros., a copartnership, and Max and Herman H. Goldschmidt individually, upon a promissory note for $5,000 executed by defendant Kauffman and upon the written guaranty of Goldschmidt Bros., a co-partnership, and Max Goldschmidt, executed by Max Goldschmidt, as one of the partners and individually. Plaintiff also recovered judgment against defendant American Steel Pipe & Tank Company for $1,550, the balance found due on its written guaranty of payment to the extent of $2,500, which guaranty was executed on the same day but immediately following, the execution of the note and as a part of the same transaction. Max Goldschmidt defaulted, and the defendant Kauffman, the defendants Goldschmidt Bros. and Herman H. Goldschmidt, and the defendant American Steel Pipe & Tank Company separately appeal from the judgment against them.

The facts are that on September 15, 1916, the defendant Kauffman executed his promissory note in favor of E. Milton Greene, of whose estate plaintiff is the executor; that at the same time Max Goldschmidt made an unconditional guaranty of payment, by indorsement on the back thereof, on behalf of the partnership and himself individually, signing the indorsement, "Goldschmidt Bros., by Max Goldschmidt. Max Goldschmidt;" that $2,500 was then due the American Steel Pipe & Tank Company from the Valencia Groves Company, a corporation which some of the defendants were promoting, and in consideration of the payment of said sum to it the American Steel Pipe & Tank Company guaranteed payment of the note to the extent of $2,500. This written guaranty read in part as follows:

"Provided the security is not changed without notice to undersigned, we, the undersigned, guarantee payment of $2,500.00 of the $5,000.00 note and the debt secured thereby. * * * When $2,500.00 of said note is paid, this guaranty is null and void; but it remains in force during all renewals of said indebtedness and until at least $2,500.00 of said debt is paid."

The trial court found that the note was duly executed by Kauffman for a valuable consideration; that, as a part of the same transaction, Max Goldschmidt executed the written guaranty on behalf of himself and the partnership; that Herman H. Goldschmidt had no knowledge of the making of the guaranty at the time; that Max Goldschmidt had authority to sign the guaranty, but was not expressly authorized to do so by Herman; that at the same time the American Steel Pipe & Tank Company, for a valuable consideration, executed and delivered its guaranty in the sum of $2,500; that but $950 had been paid on said note; that Herman and Max Goldschmidt were both individually interested in the Valencia Groves Company, a corporation, and part owners thereof; "that the financing of said Valencia Groves Company, a corporation, was a part of the said copartnership business; and that the note sued upon herein, and the guaranteeing of the payment thereof by said copartnership, was a part of the business of said copartnership."

[1-3] The appeal of Kauffman rests entirely upon the claim that he did not receive any consideration for the note. The argument is that the money was borrowed to pay obligations of the Valencia Groves Company, a corporation, of which he was president, director, and manager, and that none of the money received by him from the payee of the note was retained by him for his own use. The money was actually paid to him, and the consideration then passed. The payee was not concerned with what use Kauffman made of the money after he received it. Then, too, the writing itself carries the presumption of consideration, which is evidence to be weighed against this defendant's testimony. With this conflict, the finding of the trial court that a consideration passed should not be disturbed. Moore v. Gould, 151 Cal. 723, 726, 91 Pac. 616. But Kauffman is not relieved from liability because he intended to use the money for the corporation. He did not purport to act for the corporation or to bind it upon the note. It was his individual act purporting to bind him alone, and, even if he had proved a lack of personal interest in the loan, he was nevertheless personally bound by the writing. Hall v. Jameson, 151 Cal. 606, 611, 91 Pac. 518, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1190, 121 Am. St. Rep. 137; Knoch v. Haizlip, 163 Cal. 146, 151, 124 Pac. 998; Hobson v. Hassett, 76 Cal. 203, 205, 18 Pac. 320, 9 Am. St. Rep. 193.

[4, 5] The appeal of the partnership and Herman Goldschmidt really presents but two questions: (1) The sufficiency of finding No. 15 to support the judgment against them; and (2) the sufficiency of the evidence to support that finding. The material portions of this finding are quoted above. It is to the effect that the two Goldschmidt brothers, who alone constituted the partnership, were individually interested in the Valencia Groves Company, and that the financing of said corporation, including the execution of the guaranty in suit, was a part of the business of said partnership. Now, it may be stated as a general rule that one partner "has no authority to guarantee negotiable paper in the firm name, or to make contracts of guaranty or suretyship, without authority specially given him for the purpose, or implied from the common course of the business of the firm, or from the previous course of dealing between the parties unless the act of such partner is afterwards ratified by his copartners." 20 Ruling Case Law, p. 899. The trial court found that, though Max had general authority to sign the partnership name on the back of the note, he was not expressly authorized by Herman to do so. The effect of this finding is that the authority to make the guaranty was implied "from the common course of the business of the firm." These findings taken together are sufficient to support the judgment.

[6] (2) There was evidence that for many years prior to this transaction the partners had both used the credit of the firm in real estate transactions in which one or both were interested. There was also evidence that this particular transaction had its origin in the profits of the sale of real property known as the Baldwin Park, which Max purchased with funds of the firm on the advice of Herman that "it looked A. No. 1 as an investment for the firm." Then it appears that the Valencia Groves transaction was entered into for the benefit of the firm as an investment for its funds, and was so carried on the books of the firm until May, 1917, a few weeks before the financial difficulties arose and the partnership was dissolved. At that time the account was transferred on the books to Max Goldschmidt. It does not appear that either of the partners were stockholders in the Valencia Groves Company. Apparently the agreement was that the money would be advanced to Kauffman for the benefit of the corporation which he controlled upon the understanding that the profits would be equally divided. It was not necessary to show a partnership relation between Kauffman and the Goldschmidts in this particular transaction. The evidence discloses a joint adventure between Kauffman and the partnership of Goldschmidt Bros. If the transaction had been a financial success, 50 per cent. of the profits would have gone into the treasury of Goldschmidt Bros. to offset the account carried on the books as a partnership investment. What adjustments of these accounts would thereafter be made could not alter the fact that the transaction was from its inception financed by partnership funds and on partnership credit. For a year or more this course of dealing was maintained; the partnership advancing its funds to both Kauffman and the corporation for the purpose of the development of the corporation property. The evidence that the partnership engaged in the business of financing the land company as an investment enterprise supports the findings that it was partnership business.

There was also evidence that in this particular transaction Max was the ostensible agent of the partnership and of Herman individually, that Max had been authorized to act for Herman in the entire transaction, and that, as the partnership agreed to advance all funds necessary for the development of the property, the guaranty of this note to raise funds for development purposes was within the authority so conferred. This evidence supports the finding that Max was authorized to sign the paper, and that the entire transaction was a partnership affair.

Stress is placed on the testimony that before Herman indorsed the notes for interest on a bank loan to the Valencia Groves Company he demanded that Max and Kauffman agree to give him one-third of the profits of the land transaction. From this it is argued that he had theretofore no thought of participating in the profits, and that, as his demand was refused, he was not at any time interested. But, as the agreement in evidence was that Kauffman and the Goldschmidts were to divide the profits fifty-fifty, Herman's share would have been one-quarter; so no significance can be attached to his demand for one-third or in Kauffman's refusal to grant his request.

Appellant American Steel Pipe & Tank Company urges three grounds for reversal of the judgment against it: (1) That it cannot be sued on its guaranty in the same action as that against the maker of the note; (2) that it is relieved from liability by a modification of the original undertaking; (3) that, if Goldschmidt Bros. are not bound as a partnership, this appellant is not bound, because its guaranty was conditioned on the guaranty of the partnership. None of the propositions has any substantial merit.

[7, 8] (1) If the guaranty is on the same instrument, the guarantor is properly joined as a party with the maker of the note. Section 383, Code Civ. Proc.; Melander v. Western Nat. Bank, 21 Cal. App. 462, 471, 132 Pac. 265; Titus v. Woods, 188 Pac. 68. Here, though the guaranty was executed upon a separate paper, it was a part of the same transaction, demanded by the payee and agreed to by the guarantor before the note was executed. The appellant was a guarantor of payment, and as such became liable on default of the principal without demand or notice. Section 2807, Civ. Code. It could have been sued separately or joined with the maker of the note at the option of respondent.

[9] (2) The appellant guaranteed payment to the extent of $2,500, the guaranty to remain in force "during all renewals of said indebtedness and until at least $2,500 of said debt is paid." The provisional agreement to extend time of payment if $2,000 was paid within 20 days, an agreement which was never carried out, did not modify the original undertaking or in any way impair or suspend the rights of the creditor. So far as the rights of a guarantor are concerned, there is no essential difference between an extension of the time of payment of the old note and a renewal. First Nat. Bank v. Spalding, 177 Cal. 217, 222, 170 Pac. 407.

(3) Without holding that this appellant's guaranty was conditioned upon the proviso that the partnership had made a valid and enforceable guaranty of the original obligation, it is sufficient to say that, if having been held in this case that the partnership is bound, this point is not available to this appellant. Other points suggested by counsel do not require consideration.

The judgment on each appeal is affirmed.

OF DALLAS, TEX. (Civ. 3797.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 28, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 26, 1921.)

Insurance §424—Damage to automobile rolling down embankment after overturning held not "caused solely by collision with another object."

Where edge of roadway on which automobile had been swerved to avoid collision gave way, causing automobile to overturn and roll down mountain side, the damage to automobile from contact with the ground and objects thereon while rolling was not "caused solely by collision with another object," within automobile policy.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Caba-niss, Judge.

Action by Emma C. Moblad against the Western Indemnity Company of Dallas, Tex. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry A. Jacobs and G. B. Blanckenburg, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Eugene F. Conlin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. The only question presented upon this appeal is as to the construction of the following clause of a policy of insurance:

"In consideration of an additional premium of $50, this policy is hereby extended to indemnify the assured against loss or damage to any automobile described in the schedule of statements, including operating equipment while attached thereto, if caused solely by collision with another object, while such automobile is used as described in said schedule. * * *"

The plaintiff and appellant was the owner of the automobile covered by said policy of insurance. The automobile was damaged as the result of an accident. The question presented is: Was said damage caused solely by collision with another object within the meaning of the clause above quoted?

The facts with reference to the accident were found by the trial court to be:

"While plaintiff's automobile was being driven by a person over the age of 21 years, along the Sky-line boulevard, in Redwood canyon, Alameda county, Cal., on the said 13th day of October, 1918, the driver of said automobile, to avoid striking another automobile, swerved to the outer edge of the roadway, and said roadway gave way, causing said automobile to run down an embankment, and, after leaving said roadway, to overturn, and roll down the side of a mountain; that plaintiff's said automobile did not strike or collide with any object upon the said roadway, nor did said automobile strike or collide with any object upon the said embankment or mountain side prior to the time said automobile overturned; that after overturning, said automobile rolled down the side of said mountain, and, in so rolling, came in contact with the ground, and such objects as lay thereon; that none of the objects with which said automobile came in contact caused said automobile to leave the roadway or to go down said embankment, or caused said automobile to overturn, and that said automobile did not, in leaving said roadway, or in overturning and rolling down said mountain side, collide with or hit any tree or fence, but that said automobile, upon overturning, and in the course of rolling down said mountain side, came in contact with the ground along said mountain side, and at the bottom of the canyon, and brush and shrubbery, and other objects on the ground upon said mountain side and bottom of canyon."

These findings are sustained by the testimony of plaintiff's own witnesses, and from them the trial court concluded that the damage to the automobile was not caused "solely by collision with another object."

We are cited to no case in this state where the facts are similar to the facts of the present case, but our attention has been called to the recent case of Bell v. American Ins. Co. (Wis.) 181 N.W. 733. There the plaintiff while operating and endeavoring to turn his car, backed upon some soft ground, and the automobile gradually settled into the ground and tipped over. An action was brought to recover damages for injury resulting to the automobile by its coming into contact with the ground at the time of the upset. Plaintiff's claim arose out of a policy which insured him against damage resulting to his automobile "by being in accidental collision with any other automobile, vehicle or object." The court said:

"While it is true that insurance contracts should be construed most strongly against the insurer, * * * yet they are subject to the same rules of construction applied to the language of any other contract. It is a fundamental rule that the language of a contract is to be accorded its popular and usual significance. It is not permissible to impute an unusual meaning to language used in a contract of insurance any more than to the language of any other contract. The incident causing the damage to the automobile here in question is spoken of in common parlance as an upset or tip-over. If it were the purpose to insure against damage resulting from such an accident, why should not such words, or words of similar import, have been used? We cannot presume that the parties to the contract intended that an upset should be construed as a collision in the absence of a closer association of the two incidents in popular understanding."

See, also, Stuht v. U. S. Fidelity & Guar. Co., 89 Wash. 93, 154 Pac. 137; Wettengel v. U. S. Lloyds, 157 Wis. 433, 147 N. W. 360, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 626.

In the instant case, the damage to plaintiff's car was caused proximately by its turning over on the edge of the road. Its subsequent revolutions and consequent damage were but the operation of physical laws set in motion when it turned over on the edge of the road. The proximate and only cause of the accident was not a collision, but the upsetting of the automobile.

The judgment is affirmed.

BLANEY v. CLINE, Sheriff. (Civ. 3472.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 28, 1921.)

Fraudulent conveyances — 146(2)—Husband's transfer of automobile to wife held fraudulent as to husband's creditor.

Where husband gave wife a bill of sale of automobile, but continued to use the automobile in his business, the transfer was fraudulent as to husband's creditor under Civ. Code, § 3440, requiring an immediate delivery, followed by an actual and continued change of possession, though wife built a garage on property owned by her, but which was homesteaded for the joint benefit of herself and husband, and kept automobile therein when not in use.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Hattie F. Blaney against John C. Cline, Sheriff of the County of Los Angeles, State of California. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 192 Pac. 549.

F. D. R. Moote, Moote & Patterson, and Harold Ide Cruzan, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. L. Sacks, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On the 17th day of September, 1918, the defendant, as sheriff of the county of Los Angeles, and acting under a writ of execution upon a judgment against the plaintiff's husband, H. C. Blaney, seized and took into his possession a certain automobile described in the complaint in this action. The plaintiff made in due form a third-party claim, and demanded that the sheriff return the automobile to her possession. This demand having been refused, she commenced this action. Judgment having been entered in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff appeals therefrom.

The evidence was sufficient to establish the fact that on January 26, 1917, H. C. Blaney purchased the automobile with his own funds. The automobile license was taken out in the name of H. C. Blaney at that time, and the 1918 license also was in his name. On or about the 1st day of February, 1917, H. C. Blaney executed and delivered to the plaintiff a bill of sale of the automobile, but it does not appear that this fact was known to any one except Mr. and Mrs. Blaney and their daughter. The family lived on property owned by the plaintiff, which was homesteaded for the joint benefit of the plaintiff and her husband. She built a garage there, and in that garage the automobile was kept when not in use. Blaney used the automobile in his business after making the bill of sale the same as before. He drove it to his office most of the time, although sometimes it was driven by the plaintiff.

The points alleged in support of the appeal are: First, that the plaintiff, in building a garage on her own separate property and storing the automobile therein, sufficiently took manual possession thereof to set the rest of the world upon notice of her claim of title. Second, that the rule as to what change of possession is sufficient to render a conveyance fraudulent as to creditors should not be as strictly construed where no credit is given by reason of the conveyance or the possession of the chattels by the judgment debtor, as in cases where credit is secured because of the possession of the chattel by the debtor. No authorities are cited in support of the second proposition, nor are any reasons given in support of the assertion. The plaintiff cannot recover if the transfer of the property to her was "not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things transferred." If not thus transferred, the transfer is deemed to be fraudulent and void against those who are creditors of the transferor while he remains in possession. Civ. Code, § 3440. Under analogous circumstances of attempted transfer of personal property by a husband to his wife, it was held in Murphy v. Mulgrew, 102 Cal. 547, 36 Pac. 857, 41 Am. St. Rep. 200, that the transfer was void as against an attaching creditor of the husband. The court there referred to Morgan v. Ball, 81 Cal. 93, 22 Pac. 331, 5 L. R. A. 579, 15 Am. St. Rep. 34, which is the leading case relied upon by appellant in the present case, and refused to accept that decision as authority sufficient to sustain the plaintiff's demand. Referring to the claim (also asserted here) that where the parties to the transfer are husband and wife, a set of facts may be sufficient to show a change of possession between them which would not be sufficient under ordinary circumstances, the court in Murphy v. Mulgrew disposed of this contention as follows:

"The fact that a vendor and vendee are husband and wife, or parent and child, is no reason why the provisions of the statute should receive a different or more liberal construction. Those conditions give the statute no additional elasticity. The rule of construction is the same in all cases, and the relationship existing between the parties is a matter wholly immaterial."

To the same effect see Tennant v. Cline, 190 Pac. 1065.

We are satisfied that the evidence is sufficient to support the court's findings.

The judgment is affirmed.

BANK OF SOUTH SAN FRANCISCO v. PIKE et al. (Civ. 3810.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 15, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 12, 1921.)

1. Quietting title § 47(2)—Effect of conflict in findings.

In action to quiet title, where court found that plaintiff commenced action on a certain date and regularly levied an attachment on the interest of one of the defendants, and also that other defendants had no notice of the plaintiff's claim, the case should be reversed if such two findings are conflicting; but if a finding of the recording of the papers on attachment in the recorder's office was a specific finding, and the other finding regarding no notice was a general finding, then the specific finding should control.

2. Fraudulent conveyances § 227, 230—Sale of land under execution held to pass legal title itself; proceeding in equity not necessary.

As against a fraudulent transferee of land, the creditor may seize the property as that of the fraudulent vendor, and may proceed to sell it under execution, and the title transferred by such sale is not a mere equity—not the right to control the legal title and to have the fraudulent transfer vacated by some appropriate proceeding—but is the legal title itself; and the judgment creditor need not ask the aid of equity.

3. Attachment § 183—Mortgages § 151(4)—Lien cannot be destroyed except by dissolution; attachment lien good against subsequent mortgagees.

When an attachment is served on land a lien is created which nothing subsequent can destroy, but the dissolution of the attachment, even though the title stands of record in the name of a third person, and such lien is good as against grantees and mortgagees claiming under instruments made subsequent to the date of the attachment, under Civ. Code, §§ 2897, 3525, and Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 2.

4. Attachment § 178—Attaching creditor not purchaser for value.

An attaching creditor under Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 2, is not a purchaser of land for value, and he cannot, therefore, claim protection under Civ. Code, §§ 1213–1218, and an attaching creditor cannot secure any greater estate in property than the debtor possesses at the date of the levy.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by the Bank of South San Francisco against Edna Laura Pike and others. From a judgment for defendants Henry S. and Carrie E. Bridge, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John D. Willard, of San Francisco, and John W. Coleberd, of South San Francisco, for appellant.

Stanley Jackson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. Plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to quiet its title to a tract of land in San Francisco. The trial court gave judgment, among other things, in favor of the defendants Henry S. and Carrie E. Bridge, and from that portion of the judgment the plaintiff has appealed, bringing up the judgment roll without any bill of exceptions.

The facts material to a consideration of the case are as follows:

On April 1, 1910, the American Steel Casting Company, a corporation, and Boaz D. Pike and Georgie S. Pike, executed to plaintiff a one-day note; on April 11, 1911, the plaintiff commenced an action on the note against the makers; each and all of the defendants in that action defaulted, and judgment was entered on the 23d day of May, 1912. On the same date that the action was commenced on the promissory note an attachment was taken out, served, recorded, and returned, under and by virtue of which plaintiff attached the real estate in San Francisco standing of record in the name of Boaz D. Pike, Georgie S. Pike, or Edna Laura Pike. On the 22d day of April, 1914, execution issued on said judgment, and such proceedings were had that thereafter the sheriff duly and regularly delivered to the plaintiff on the 29th day of December, 1915, a sheriff's deed to the property in dispute. On the 7th day of June, 1910, Boaz D. Pike and Georgie S. Pike executed to Edna Laura Pike, their daughter, a deed of gift purporting to transfer said property. On February 10, 1913, Edna Laura Pike executed to the defendant Carrie E. Bridge her promissory note in the sum of $1,500, and to secure the same she executed to Henry S. Bridge and Fred W. Bridge a trust deed covering the property in dispute.

Besides the foregoing facts the trial court found that Boaz D. and Georgie S. Pike executed the deed to their daughter, Edna Laura Pike, voluntarily, without any valuable consideration, at a time when they were insolvent, and that they did so with the intent to hinder and delay and to defraud their existing creditors and this plaintiff of its judgment against them. The trial court also found that Fred W. Bridge died after the execution of the deed of trust, and that Henry S. Bridge and Carrie E. Bridge had no notice prior to the commencement of this suit of any claim by plaintiff of the invalidity of the title of the said defendant Edna Laura Pike to the said real estate.

[1] The plaintiff claims that the deed from Boaz D. and Georgie S. Pike to their daughter, Edna Laura Pike, was void, and that it was void as to the defendants Henry S. and Carrie E. Bridge, because they had notice of plaintiff's claim. The defendants Henry S. and Carrie E. Bridge reply that they had no notice. The trial court found that, at the time plaintiff commenced its action on the promissory note, April 11, 1911, it regularly levied an attachment on the interest of Edna Laura Pike. It also found that Henry S. and Carrie E. Bridge had no notice of the plaintiff's claim. If it be said that these two findings are conflicting, the case should be reversed. McElligott v. Krogh, 151 Cal. 126, 90 Pac. 823. If it be said that the finding on the recording of the papers on attachment in the recorder's office was a specific finding, and that the other finding regarding no notice was a general finding, then the specific finding should control (McCormick v. National Surety Co., 134 Cal. 510, 66 Pac. 741), and, for the reasons which we shall presently develop, the judgment should have been for the plaintiff, and against the defendants.

[2, 3] The claim of the defendants is that they had no notice of the attachment, and, as the title to the property stood of record in the name of Edna Laura Pike, that the defendants were entitled to deal with her as the owner. They also claim that, as the plaintiff had not filed an action in the nature of a creditor's bill against Edna Laura Pike on February 10, 1913, the defendants were not in any way bound by any contention of this plaintiff regarding the frailty of the title of Edna Laura Pike. In both of these contentions of the defendants we think that they are in error. In section 136 of Freeman on Executions it is said:

"As against the fraudulent transferee, the creditor may seize the property, whether real or personal, as that of the fraudulent vendor, and may proceed to sell it under execution. The title transferred by such sale is not a mere equity—not the right to control the legal title, and to have the fraudulent transfer vacated by some appropriate proceeding; it is the legal title itself, against which the fraudulent transfer is no transfer at all. The creditor having a judgment may, if he thinks it advisable, ask the aid of equity, but he cannot be compelled to do so."

In those words the author has digested a long line of cases in California, including, among others, First National Bank of L. A. v. Maxwell, 123 Cal. 360, 55 Pac. 980, 69 Am. St. Rep. 64; Brown v. Campbell, 100 Cal. 635, 35 Pac. 433, 38 Am. St. Rep. 314; Judson v. Lyford, 84 Cal. 505, 24 Pac. 286. In proceeding to perfect its rights under the particular remedy which it had selected, the plaintiff caused to be issued and duly levied an attachment on the lands in controversy. Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 2. When the attachment was served the effect thereof was, as stated in section 224, Drake on Attachments:

"When an attachment is served, a lien on the property attached is created, which nothing subsequent can destroy but the dissolution of the attachment. It is said to be beyond the power of the state Legislature to pass an act annulling it. And as to the defendant, though, as we have just seen, his power of alienation, subject to the attachment, is not impaired, yet no subsequent act of that description on his part can defeat the attachment."

It is not, and it could not well be, contended that such an attachment would not be controlling as to the debtors and his subsequent acts. First Nat. Bank of L. A. v. Maxwell, 123 Cal. 360, 55 Pac. 980, 69 Am. St. Rep. 64. The question is, has the statute been duly complied with? and, if it has been, then the lien has been created. And it has been held uniformly that, when the writ of attachment has been duly levied on real property, or an interest therein belonging to the judgment debtor, although the title stands of record in the name of another, the levy has the same binding force and effect. In Porter v. Pico, 55 Cal. 165, at page 174, the court says:

"The property is sold under the final process issued on the judgment, but the deed made to the purchaser at the sale, as the last of the series of acts, takes effect from the date of the levy of the attachment, as the first of the series of acts, and perfects the title to the property from the day when it was taken by the officer for the satisfaction of the judgment."

As to the grantees and mortgagees of the debtors, claiming under instruments made subsequent to the date of the attachment, the rule in Porter v. Pico has been uniformly followed. Anderson v. Goff, 72 Cal. 65, 13 Pac. 73, 1 Am. St. Rep. 34; Riley v. Nance, 97 Cal. 203, 31 Pac. 1126, 32 Pac. 315; Robinson v. Thornton, 102 Cal. 675, 34 Pac. 120; Reilly v. Wright, 117 Cal. 77, 48 Pac. 970; Woodward v. Brown, 119 Cal. 283, 306, 51 Pac. 2, 542, 63 Am. St. Rep. 108;

If one attached person cannot defeat the attachment, how can another? They are all attached under the same statutes. The authorities hold the rule is the same. Thompson v. Baker, 141 U. Ed. 889, Mr. Justice Harlan, writing the opinion, says:

"So, in Hancock v. Henderson, 45 Tex. 479, 484, where the contest was between the holder of an attachment lien upon land, and a person who purchased from the grantees of the defendant in the attachment, who, it was alleged, had conveyed the land to such grantees with the fraudulent intent to hinder his creditors, such purchaser having no actual notice of the issuing of the attachment or of the levy, the court said: 'That a valid levy created a lien on the land attached, and, when properly returned on the writ into the court from which it issued, is notice to third parties, are propositions which it is not deemed necessary to discuss. * * * It follows that Mrs. Louisa Hancock, the purchaser after the levy of the attachment, having bought the land under these circumstances, took it subject to the plaintiff's attachment lien.'"

[4] The respondent cites Morrow v. Graves, 77 Cal. 218, 19 Pac. 489, and Casey v. Leggett, 125 Cal. 664, 58 Pac. 264. The cases are not helpful. They were cases involving unrecorded deeds. Assuming an unrecorded deed was made in good faith, it passed the title upon its delivery. After its delivery the lands were not "lands belonging to the defendant." Such lands, therefore, were not subject to attachment. Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 2. Furthermore, it will not be contended that an attaching creditor is a purchaser for value, and he cannot, therefore, claim protection under the Civil Code, §§ 1213-1218; Hoag v. Howard, 55 Cal. 564. And, again, it will not be contended that an attaching creditor can ever secure any greater estate in property than the debtor possessed at the date of the levy.

The briefs devoted some space to the issue as to whether the respondents had notice, actual or constructive. The respondents cite some language contained in Casey v. Leggett, supra, and Morrow v. Graves, supra, and in reply the appellant cites some language contained in Ritter v. Scannell, 11 Cal. 238, 249, 70 Am. Dec. 775. The respondents might also have cited Aigeltinger v. Einstein, 143 Cal. 609, 616, 77 Pac. 669, 101 Am. St. Rep. 131. The matter of notice or no notice, we believe, is a false issue under the facts of this case. The real issue is lien or no lien. If the appellant gave all the notice that the statute required in taking out its attachment, and otherwise fully complied with the statute, it acquired a valid lien. If it acquired a valid lien, we have shown that such lien could not be diminished after its creation except by a dissolution of the attachment.

It follows that the appellant should have been given a judgment on the findings as made; that this judgment should be reversed, and the trial court should be directed to enter judgment for the appellant on the findings, in accordance with what has been said above; and it is so ordered.

BANK OF SOUTH SAN FRANCISCO v.
PIKE et al. (Civ. 3811.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 15, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 12, 1921.)

1. Pleading ☞121(4)—Denial of information or belief not sufficient as to matters of public record.

Denial of information or belief is not sufficient as to matters of record, which defendant is presumed to know.

2. Appeal and error ☞916(3) — To support judgment it will be presumed that insufficient denial was not treated as sufficient.

Where there is no bill of exceptions, and it cannot be known from the record that plaintiff, who obtained a judgment, treated an insufficient denial in the answer as a sufficient denial, it must be assumed in support of the judgment that the plaintiff did not do so.

3. Appeal and error ☞910—Where judgment depends on validity of prior judgment, proper service assumed in support of prior judgment.

Where, on an issue involving validity of prior judgment, there was a finding that in such prior action summons was returned as filed June 20, 1911, and a finding that an affidavit showing service of summons on an unserved defendant on the 20th day of March, 1912, was filed May 22, 1912, in the absence of a bill of exceptions, it must be assumed in support of a judgment for plaintiff that plaintiff obtained permission to withdraw the summons, and thereupon did withdraw the same and make due and legal service thereof.

4. Appeal and error — 910—Where judgment depends on validity of prior judgment entered by clerk, presumptions are in favor of such prior judgment.

On appeal from judgment, where cause should be reversed if default judgment as entered by the clerk was not properly obtained in a prior case, appellants claiming that the former judgment did not have the same verity as a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, because entered by the clerk, it must be assumed that at the time the clerk entered the judgment there was a minute entry purporting to authorize the withdrawal of the summons for the purpose of serving it on unserved defendants, and, in support of the judgment on appeal, that such minute was shown to the trial court rendering the second judgment, that the said minute order had been obtained, and was before the clerk before he entered the first judgment; the clerk being called upon, when plaintiff applied to have a default entered, to perform his statutory duty in a statutory manner.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by the Bank of South San Francisco against Edna Laura Pike and others. From the judgment, certain defendants appeal. Affirmed in District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Joseph E. Bien and Abram M. Marks, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

John D. Willard, of San Francisco, and John W. Coleberd, of South San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an appeal by Boaz D. Pike, Georgie S. Pike, and Edna Laura Pike from the judgment rendered in the case of Bank of South San Francisco, a Corporation, Plaintiff and Appellant, v. Edna Laura Pike et al., Defendants, Henry S. Bridge and Carrie E. Bridge, Defendants and Respondents (Civ. 3810) 199 Pac. 752, this day filed. By stipulation of the parties the appeal is supported by, and rests on, the same record as in the Bridge Case. The defendants Pike appeared and answered the plaintiff's complaint; a trial on the merits was had, and the trial court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against these defendants, and they have appealed from the judgment, and which judgment will hereinafter be termed the second judgment.

The plaintiff alleged, and the trial court found, that on the 23d day of May, 1912, this plaintiff, the Bank of South San Francisco, obtained judgment against certain defendants, including the defendants B. D. Pike and Georgie S. Pike, for the sum of $5,714.31, and which judgment will hereinafter be termed the first judgment. The appellants make the claim that the first judgment was void because the summons was never served on the defendant Georgie S. Pike. If this claim can be sustained the judgment should be reversed; otherwise it should be affirmed. We think that the claim of the appellants is without merit for several different reasons, which we shall proceed to state.

[1, 2] (a) The plaintiff alleged:

"III. That said American Steel Casting Company, B. D. Pike, and Georgie S. Pike, and each of them, made default in the payment of said promissory note, and that thereafter said plaintiff brought suit upon said promissory note in said superior court, and on the 23d day of May, 1912, plaintiff herein obtained judgment against said American Steel Casting Company, B. D. Pike, and Georgie S. Pike for the sum of $5,714.31, which judgment is recorded in judgment book No. 29 of said superior court at page 382."

In each of the answers each of these defendants attempted to deny the above allegation by alleging:

"Defendant has no information or belief sufficient to enable her to answer the allegation contained in paragraphs * * * 3 * * * of the second amended complaint, and basing her denial upon said lack of information or belief, defendant denies each and every, all and singular, the allegations in said paragraphs, and each of them contained."

There is no question but what certain facts can be denied by this form of a denial. Etchas v. Orena, 121 Cal. 270, 271, 53 Pac. 798. However, that rule does not extend to authorizing or permitting a defendant in that manner to deny matters of record which he is presumed to know, and the contents of public records are, among others, such facts. Mulcahy v. Buckley, 100 Cal. 484, 35 Pac. 144; Jensen v. Dorr, 159 Cal. 742, 747, 116 Pac. 553. As there is no bill of exceptions before us, and as we do not know from the record that the plaintiff treated the denial as a sufficient denial, we must assume in support of the judgment that the plaintiff did not do so, and that the trial of the action in which the second judgment was rendered was conducted on the theory that there was no denial. In other words, in the form of the record before us, we cannot assume that such proceedings were had in the trial court as will authorize the appellants to claim any rights as by estoppel, and as portrayed in Schroeder v. Mauzy, 16 Cal. App. 443, 447, 118 Pac. 459.

[3] (b) There is a finding that the summons in the first action was returned as filed June 20, 1911, and there is a finding that an affidavit showing service of summons on Georgie S. Pike on the 20th day of March, 1912, was filed May 22, 1912. However, there is no finding, and there is no bill of exceptions showing, that after application therefor, duly made, the plaintiff did not obtain permission in the first action to withdraw the summons, and thereupon did withdraw the same and make due and legal service thereof on Georgie S. Pike. Rue v. Quinn, 137 Cal. 651, 657, 66 Pac. 216, 70 Pac. 732; Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc. v. Cochran, 141 Cal. 653, 658, 75 Pac. 315. When the record on appeal is in this form we are bound to presume in support of the judgment of the trial court that the summons was so withdrawn, and was legally served. The appellants contend that "the summons, having been returned, was functus officio." Fanning v. Foley, 99 Cal. 336, 339, 33 Pac. 1098. It is true that Mr. Commissioner Temple in that case used that language, but he was addressing that language to a summons that was 11 years old, and which was returned and filed during the tenth year of its age, 7 years after it could be used for any purpose. Code Civ. Proc. § 581, as amended, St. 1889, § 398. The amendment to that section resulted in the legislative annihilation of the life in a summons not returned until 10 years after it was issued. That statute was so construed by the same learned jurist after he had become a justice of the Supreme Court. Vrooman v. Li Po Tai, 113 Cal. 302, 304, 45 Pac. 470.

[4] (c) Assuming, as appellants contend, that the judgment in the first action was a judgment entered by the clerk as distinguished from a judgment ordered by the court, and that therefore the instrument does not have the same verity as the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, still the appellants have not sustained their appeal. When the plaintiff applied to have the default of the appellants entered, the clerk was thereupon called upon to perform a statutory duty in a statutory manner. Glidden v. Packard, 28 Cal. 649. The appellants have shown that certain papers and files were at that time before the clerk. The appellants have not shown that there was not at that time before the clerk a minute entry which purported to authorize the withdrawal of the summons for the purpose of serving it on certain of the defendants. The trial court in this case has made a finding that the judgment in the first case was regular. Again, in support of the second judgment, we must presume that it was shown to the trial court, rendering the second judgment, that the said minute order had been obtained, and was before the clerk when he entered the first judgment.

The record shows no error, and the judgment is affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank
Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 2, is denied.

We base our denial of the petition solely upon the fact that the trial court expressly found as one of the facts of the case that the judgment in the former action on the note "was duly given and made," and that there is nothing in the judgment roll in this action, upon which alone this appeal is based, necessarily in conflict with this clear and explicit finding of fact.

McBRIDE et al. v. McCARTNEY.
(Civ. 3327.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 29, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error §1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence final.

The trial court's determination of facts on conflicting evidence is final.

2. Frauds, statute of §116(10)—Oral authorization, though void under statute of frauds, may be ratified by owner.

Oral authorization of broker to sell land, though void under statute of frauds, may be ratified by owner, in which case the acts of the broker become as effectual and binding as though his authority had been expressed by the writing.

3. Principal and agent §75—Agent, though imperfectly authorized, liable to principal for money received for principal in performance of acts ratified by principal.

Wherever an agent, imperfectly authorized in the first place, performs acts in execution of the agency which are ratified by the principal, the principal is entitled to enforce his demands against the agent for anything which the agent has received on his account.

4. Brokers §28—Broker could not retain portion of price of land sold on theory that he bought and resold at advance.

Real estate broker who paid owner only a portion of the price received from purchaser could not repudiate the agency and retain the money on the theory that he was acting as a principal, and had purchased the land from owner, and had resold it to purchaser, but was liable to owner for full amount received from purchaser.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by A. N. McBride and another against Grant McCartney. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dudley W. Robinson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Appeal by the defendant from a judgment awarding to the plaintiffs the sum of $500 and costs. In their complaint plaintiffs allege that within two years prior to the commencement of the action defendant became indebted to them on account of money had and received for their benefit. All of the material allegations of the complaint were denied in the answer.

Plaintiffs were the owners of a house and lot in the city of Los Angeles. They desired to sell the same. Defendant was engaged in the business of buying and selling real estate as an agent. Plaintiffs orally listed with the defendant, through one of the latter's employees, their property for sale, the price fixed being the sum of $3,500, out of which they expected to pay the customary commission, which the evidence shows would have been 5 per cent., or the sum of $175. Defendant found a purchaser for the property, but informed this proposed purchaser that the price was $3,750. Defendant accepted checks from the purchaser for the full amount, and then communicated with plaintiff A. N. McBride. Without informing the plaintiff that he had secured a purchaser, he stated to McBride that he had not seen the property, but that it was in a good location, and asked McBride what the lowest price was that would be accepted by the latter. After some talk McBride agreed to take $3,250 net cash. Appellant then gave McBride his check for $25, and an escrow was made with a title company covering the transaction; a deed was passed, and the $3,250 paid over to respondents.

It was some time after this that the McBrides learned from the purchasers of the property that they had in fact paid $3,750 to McCartney, and this action was thereupon brought. There was a dispute made between plaintiffs and defendant at the trial as to whether the property ever had been listed with the defendant as an agent, the latter denying that any agency had been so created, and claiming that he purchased the property outright, and hence violated no trust relationship in retaining the full amount which he received from his clients, to whom the property was in fact transferred. However, we have stated the facts, as we must, in the light of evidence most favorable to the plaintiff's case.

[1-3] The evidence being conflicting, the trial court's determination of the facts is final. Appellant concedes, by not advancing a contrary contention, that, if the evidence was sufficient to establish that the relationship of principal and agent existed between him and respondents at the time he effected a sale of the property to third persons, the judgment of the court is right. However, it is insisted that there could be no recovery, even under the facts as they have been herein stated, because no written authorization had been given appellant by respondents empowering him to negotiate a sale of the property; that under the statute of frauds the oral authorization is void, and of no effect. This position of appellant is not good in law. His principal here elected to ratify all of the acts of the agent. Under such circumstances the acts of the agent become as effectual and binding as though his authority had been expressed by a writing. Wherever an agent, imperfectly authorized in the first place, performs acts in execution of the agency which are ratified by the principal, the principal is entitled to enforce his demands against the agent for anything which the agent has received on his account.

[4] As applicable to that kind of a situation Mr. Mechem, in his work on Agency (2d Ed.) vol. 1, par. 501, states the rule to be this:

"The principal is therefore entitled to the benefits and the profits of the transaction and to all of the advantages which would flow from an authorized performance, and can compel an accounting therefor from the agent. He may recover from the agent property or money received from the other party by virtue of the transaction ratified; and after ratification the agent may not return to the other party money or property so received; if he does so, he is liable for it to the principal."

See, also, Bogart v. Crosby & Van Haren, 80 Cal. 195, 22 Pac. 84.

Manifestly, a person, after having assumed to act as an agent for a party, and after receiving into his hands moneys on behalf of his principal, cannot repudiate the agency and retain the money without committing fraud against the principal.

The judgment is affirmed.

ARAKELIAN et al. v. SEARS et al.
(Civ. 2273.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 25, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 22, 1921.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances — §182(5) — Purchaser under trust deed, with purpose of defrauding attachment creditor, held surplus after sale to third person subject to creditor's claim.

If a bank, pursuant to an agreement with owners of property to defraud attaching creditor, purchased and foreclosed a trust deed, and through its officer purchased the land at foreclosure sale and subsequently sold land to third person at a big increase in price, an action would lie against the bank and officer to establish a trust in the surplus fund, and make it subject to attachment creditor's claim, in view of Civ. Code, § 2224.

2. Fraudulent conveyances — §302 — Evidence insufficient to prove purchaser a party to fraudulent transaction.

In action to quiet title against attaching creditor of former owner by third person, who had purchased land from bank which had purchased and foreclosed trust deed and had purchased the land at the foreclosure proceedings, evidence held insufficient to prove that plaintiff had purchased property with knowledge that bank had participated in the transaction to defraud creditor.

3. Evidence ⚡60, 69—Persons presumed not to have been guilty of wrong.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, it will be presumed that a person is innocent of crime or wrong, that private transactions have been fair and regular, and that the ordinary course of business has been followed.

4. Fraudulent conveyances ⚡271(4) — Presumptions against fraud must be overcome by one who alleges fraud.

Presumptions against fraud in a debtor's conveyance must be overcome by him who alleges it by proof of fraud, and not by proof raising a mere suspicion thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by Harry Arakelian and others against Martha A. Sears, etc., William M. Curtner, and others, in which defendant Curtner filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for defendant Curtner on his cross-complaint, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Andrew Johnston and R. R. Fowler, both of Turlock, for appellants.

Francis O. Hoover, Joseph M. Cross, and Cross & Hoover, all of Modesto, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. On April 6, 1915, Charles Murray and W. A. Jones and their wives were the owners of the lands in controversy situated in the county of Merced. On said date they executed and delivered to the Commercial and Savings Bank of Stockton a deed of trust covering said lands, together with another small tract, to secure a loan of $10,000. This deed of trust was recorded in said county on April 14, 1915. On February 17, 1916, this deed of trust was assigned by said bank to the First National Bank of Modesto. On May 12, 1916, the indebtedness secured by this deed of trust being due and unpaid, the lands which are the subject of this action were sold to W. N. Steele, then president of the last-named bank, for the sum of $10,600, the amount of the indebtedness. The proceedings under which this sale took place were found by the trial court to be entirely regular, and there is no dispute that they complied strictly with the requirements of the law. A trustees' deed was duly made to said Steele on said May 12th. One week later, on May 19th, Steele and wife conveyed said lands to plaintiff Harry Arakelian. The consideration paid therefor by said Arakelian was the sum of $21,000. On January 3, 1916, respondent, William M. Curtner, began an action in the superior court of Stanislaus county against Murray and Jones and their wives to recover the sum of $15,000 and interest. On said date a writ of attachment was issued by said court and thereupon levied upon said lands by the sheriff of said county. This attachment was recorded in the county recorder's office on the following day. In that action Curtner recovered judgment against the defendants therein for $5,800, and a copy of this judgment was duly recorded on June 19, 1917. The present action to quiet title was brought July 10, 1916, against Curtner and others, and its specific purpose was to secure an elimination of a reservation of five acres of land for road purposes, being a part of said land purchased as aforesaid by said Harry Arakelian. The rights of the other defendants have been foreclosed, and they are not parties to this appeal, and we may add that Harry Arakelian seems to be the only one of the plaintiffs that has any interest in the controversy, and we shall hereafter refer to him as plaintiff and appellant. Defendant Curtner appeared in the action, and on November 22, 1916, filed an answer, in which he set up his writ of attachment and prayed that it be adjudged superior to the title of plaintiff. The trial of the case was begun on April 5, 1917, and at the close of the taking of the testimony respondent Curtner asked leave of court to file an amended and supplemental answer and cross-complaint. Such leave was granted, and said pleading was filed on the 9th day of October, 1917. An answer to said cross-complaint was filed on November 12th following, and further evidence was taken on January 21, 1918. Thereafter findings were filed, and the judgment entered in favor of cross-complainant Curtner, from which plaintiff has brought the appeal. In respect to the sale under the deed of trust and the transfer to plaintiff, the amended answer and cross-complaint charged that:

"Said W. N. Steele, said Charles Murray and W. A. Jones, and the said Harry Arakelian conspired and contrived together by means of the transaction hereinabove set forth * * * to defeat the lien of the said attachment of defendant, William M. Curtner, upon the said land, and to defraud and cheat the said defendant thereby, and that they did, with the fraudulent intention of cheating and defrauding the said defendant, by means of the purchase of said indebtedness and deed of trust by the First National Bank of Modesto, and the sale of the said land thereunder to W. N. Steele, attempt to effectuate and accomplish a transfer of the title in and to the said land to the plaintiff, Harry Arakelian, freed from the said lien of plaintiff's attachment, and did thereby effect a fraudulent conveyance of the said land from the said Charles Murray and W. A. Jones to the said Harry Arakelian for the purpose of attempting to deprive defendant, William M. Curtner, of his lien upon and interest in said land."

The court found that Curtner had not been informed that the land was about to be sold under the trust deed; that the price for which the said land was sold to said W. N. Steele under said deed of trust was not a fair and reasonable price for the land, but was an inadequate price therefor; that the said land was within one week thereafter sold to plaintiff, Harry Arakelian, for more than $10,000 in excess of the amount paid by Steele; that the said excess was not kept by Steele as his private property, but a portion thereof was used by him in the payment of notes of the said W. A. Jones and Charles Murray, held by the First National Bank of Modesto, and that the benefit thereof was thereby given to the said Jones and Murray, and that a portion thereof was paid in cash by said Steele to said Murray and Jones, and that said deed of trust and the indebtedness secured thereby was not purchased by said bank as an investment, but for the purpose of foreclosing the same and of selling the land as aforesaid and for the purpose of defrauding Curtner; that the transfer to plaintiff was fraudulent; and that he had knowledge of and was a party to the fraud, and therefore took the land subject to the lien of Curtner's judgment.

The case naturally divides itself into two parts; the first relating to the question whether the sale to Steele under the trust deed was fraudulent, and the second, whether plaintiff, if fraud existed, participated in it, or as a purchaser was charged with such knowledge as to make the property in his hands burdened with the lien of Curtner's judgment.

As to the general principle that such conveyance may be avoided or subjected to the lien of a creditor's claim, where the purpose exists to defraud a creditor, there is no controversy, and hence that feature of the case may be dismissed without comment.

Respondent claims that certain "badges of fraud" characterized the transaction resulting in the sale to Steele sufficient to warrant the finding of the court as to the invalidity of said purchase.

[1] The various circumstances, which, in their aggregate probative effect, are deemed by respondent sufficient for this purpose, are argued with great force and learning by counsel on both sides, but as we have reached the conclusion that their is insufficient support for the finding that appellant participated in or was charged with notice of any fraud, we may omit consideration of the finding that Steele's purchase for the said bank was fraudulent. We may say, however, that if such fraud was perpetrated there can be no doubt that an action would lie against Steele and the said bank to establish a trust in said surplus fund and make it subject to respondent's claim. This would follow from the established principles of equity practice and is directly within the contemplation of section 2224 of the Civil Code.

[2] There is no evidence in the record that plaintiff actually committed fraud, or that he had actual knowledge that any fraud had been committed in reference to the conveyance of this property. Indeed, respondent concedes:

"Unless Arakelian had sufficient notice of the fraud to bind him we have no standing in this court at any rate."

It is further admitted that he had "no notice of the fraud until after the trustees' sale was complete." Thus is the inquiry limited to what occurred subsequently. The record shows that a few days prior to May 19, 1916, when he purchased the property, plaintiff brought to the office of his attorney, Mr. Johnston, the abstract of title for examination; Mr. Johnston examined it, and gave his opinion to the effect that said trust deed took precedence over the attachment, and that the title was in said Steele. There is no doubt that the abstract justified said opinion. Nothing appeared upon the face of it to indicate any irregularity in the sale to Steele or to excite suspicion that the transaction was tainted in any degree with fraud. That plaintiff was justified in relying upon the advice of his attorney goes without question. There is only one possible circumstance that might militate against this view, and that relates to the consideration for the sale to Steele. It is claimed that said price was inadequate. It was not the full value of the property, but there is no evidence that Mr. Johnston, upon whose advice plaintiff relied, was familiar with the market value of the land, or knew the price that was to be paid by plaintiff. Therefore his client could not be charged with constructive notice that the price paid by Steele was inadequate. Moreover, such inadequacy of price would not be sufficient to justify a conclusion that said sale was fraudulent, nor would it impose upon an intending purchaser the duty of making inquiry concerning it. Morrow v. Graves, 77 Cal. 218, 19 Pac. 489. It may be added that said bank had the unquestioned right to direct the trustees to sell the property, and it was the duty of the latter to sell to the highest bidder (Stockwell v. Barnum, 7 Cal. App. 419, 94 Pac. 400), and it may be stated as a matter of common knowledge that under such sales the property is rarely sold for more than sufficient to satisfy the indebtedness. Thus far nothing in plaintiff's conduct is open to suspicion or to just criticism. If an attorney may not safely rely upon such record it is obvious how difficult, if not impossible, it would be for him to advise a client as to the integrity of a title to land. Nor do we think there was any reason for suspicion because of the presence of Murray and Jones in the office of Hawkins & Hawkins at the time of the execution of the deed from Steele. There is nothing to show that they were there for any improper purpose, or that their business had anything to do with this transaction. There is no evidence that plaintiff had ever met them before, or had any reason to believe that they were concerned in any manner with the sale to him. Indeed he had the right to assume that they were moved by an honest purpose, and that an inquiry upon his part suggesting anything to the contrary would be justly and emphatically resented.

We may go further and say that if he had made such inquiries as respondent suggests, he would probably have received such answers as to indicate the absence of fraud. We have in the record evidence of what Steele would have stated, namely that the motive of the bank in buying the trust deed was to protect their unsecured notes, and said creditor deemed it entirely proper to do so. Neither Jones nor Murray was called as a witness, but we cannot assume that either would have testified to anything derogatory to his own integrity or good faith in the transaction, or would have made such admission if interrogated by Arakelian.

Moreover, since fraud cannot be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it may be taken for granted, if necessary to acquit him of culpability, that appellant did question these parties and ascertain nothing inconsistent with upright conduct.

Nor can we discover in what occurred thereafter any circumstances that would reflect in the slightest degree upon the good faith of appellant. He withheld for about six months the payment of $10,000 of the consideration for the deed, and if in the meantime he had acquired knowledge of any fraud or been put upon inquiry, he might be charged with responsibility for making such payment. A diligent search through the record, however, has failed to disclose any such condition. Manifestly the incidents of this suit do not furnish any evidence that appellant's property should be subject to the claim of respondent. The action was brought before appellant had made said final payment, but the purpose was, as before indicated, to settle the question of a right of way. In the answer to this complaint filed November 22, 1916, there was no suggestion whatever of any fraud in said sale under the trust deed or in the conveyance to plaintiff. Therein Curtner relied upon the lien of his attachment in conjunction with the allegation—

"that any right, title, estate, claim, or interest which the plaintiffs herein, or either of them, may have in or to the said real property, or any part thereof, is subsequent and subservient to the said interest and lien of the said William M. Curtner under and by virtue of the said attachment."

Whatever may have been the reason for the omission of respondent to set up fraud in this pleading, it is quite plain that nothing contained therein could justly weaken plaintiff's faith in the integrity of his own title to this land. The supplemental answer and cross-complaint in which fraud and conspiracy were alleged were filed on the 9th day of October, 1917, and until a copy thereof was served on appellant's attorney, it is fair to say that neither he nor Arakelian had any knowledge whatever of respondent's theory of fraud, or was apprised of any fact which could legally require hesitation or forbearance in the purchase of said property. The full consideration for the sale of the land had been paid long before the claim of respondent was thus exhibited, and, of course, the validity of appellant's title could not be impeached in this manner. It is true that plaintiff knew that Curtner was a creditor of Murray and Jones, but he had the knowledge also that the First National Bank of Modesto was a creditor, holding a prior lien, and that the usual course was pursued to secure the payment of its claim.

While respondent has thus limited the inquiry to what occurred after the said trustees' sale, we have searched the record to determine whether anything was brought to the knowledge of appellant prior to that time that would legitimately point to fraud, and the investigation has disclosed nothing of the kind. We may add that it is quite apparent, indeed, that he knew nothing whatever of said sale until after it took place. If he had been informed of it he certainly would have been a bidder with a fair prospect of obtaining the property for much less than he afterward paid for it.

In confirmation of the views herein expressed we may set forth the material portion of the testimony of plaintiff and his attorney. The former said:

"I submitted the abstract to Mr. Johnston for examination, and he rendered an opinion, and then I went and got my deed. * * * I bought the land at $70 an acre, the market value of the land, and I did not know that Mr. Curtner claimed any interest in the land when I bought it. In the beginning I did not know anything about it. I found out after we had paid him. * * * Mr. Johnston told me, he said, 'It is foreclosed, the trust deed; Mr. Curtner hasn't got a chance to collect that money any more.' * * * He told me that, 'When the deed of trust is foreclosed, it knocked everything, his claim against the property.'"

In reply to the question, "Well, you did not, before the bank foreclosed the deed of trust, or before the bank bought that deed of trust from the Stockton Bank, you did not have an understanding, did you, with Murray and Jones, or Mr. Steele, that you were going to afterwards buy the land?" he said:

"No, sir; I knew nothing of those things. I did not know I was going to buy the land, or anything about it, until Mr. Phelps took me out there. Then I came back from Fresno, and

Mr. Phelps told me I had to see the bank. Then I went to see Mr. Steele. Mr. Phelps never mentioned who owned the land. Murray and Jones were not present when the deal was made, but at the time we closed the deal we met them over at Mr. Hawkins' office. * * * When I paid this $10,000 note I did not know that Mr. Curtner was contesting my title. * * * I did not ask Mr. Johnston to explain what kind of claim this was of Curtner's. I did not ask him nothing, because I did not know anything about the law."

Mr. A. Johnston testified:

"I examined the abstract for Mr. Arakelian. The abstract showed a record of the proceedings, and I gave it as my opinion that the trust would take precedence over the attachment. * * * I knew as early as September, 1916, when the demurrer was filed and when it was served on the 15th, that Cross and Hoover were appearing in the action and contesting Mr. Arakelian's suit, but I did not know for what purpose or under what theory they were going to proceed. The trustees' deed had been made in conformity to the deed of trust, and was the deed of trust in which Mr. Steele and subsequently Mr. Arakelian acquired title, and that is the opinion I held at that time."

[3, 4] There is no dispute as to the fundamental principles of law and of equity that should be invoked in a case like this. They are stated in the Code and decisions as follows: The law presumes that a person is innocent of crime or wrong; that private transactions have been fair and regular; that the ordinary course of business has been followed (section 1963, Code Civ. Proc.); an inference of good faith rather than fraud should be indulged, and the presumptions against fraud must be overcome by him who alleges improper conduct (Levy v. Scott, 115 Cal. 39, 46 Pac. 892), or as stated in Roberts v. Burr, 135 Cal. 156, 67 Pac. 46, "The evidence of the facts and circumstances, taken together, must amount to proof of fraud, and not to a mere suspicion thereof."

Even if the facts present a double aspect, one consistent with fair dealing and the other involving dishonesty of purpose, the court, unless the scale decidedly predominates for the latter, will strike the balance in favor of honesty and innocence. Hatch v. Bayley, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 27; Price v. Gover, 40 Md. 102.

We are aware that this latter apothegm is particularly for the guidance of the trial court, and we are not forgetful of the rule that leaves to that tribunal the determination of questions of evidence, but we are persuaded that herein is to be found no substantial support for the position that appellant is chargeable with fraud or indirection.

When fairly considered, the evidence reveals only one circumstance that excites the least suspicion as to the purchase by Arakelian, and that is his knowledge of the attachment, but we think it has never been supposed by the profession or held by the courts that "knowledge by a grantee in a deed of real estate that at the time of the conveyance there existed a claim which might at some time be reduced to judgment, and if so reduced enforced against the real estate of the grantor" would justify setting aside the deed as fraudulent at the suit of the creditor.

It is worthy of note that, if any one is to blame for the defeat of respondent's lien, the censure must be laid at his door. He should have notified Arakelian of the claim of fraud before the latter made his final payment. It was 18 months after the purchase, and nearly a year after the entire consideration was paid, before the defense of fraud was even set up in court. And there is no evidence that at any time he gave personal notice to Arakelian that there was any infirmity in the trustees' deed. His silence under such circumstances would naturally incline a court of equity to regard his claim with suspicion and distrust. Of course, neither plaintiff nor Johnston could know simply from the attachment that his suit was meritorious, or that he would recover judgment in the action upon the ground of fraud affecting the sale to Steele or upon any other ground. Assuredly they were not chargeable with knowledge that respondent was being defrauded because they knew he had a claim against a former owner of the premises and sought to enforce it against the property. If respondent's theory be correct, then it would follow, as suggested by appellant, that the rule of caveat emptor would apply whenever an abstract of title shows that an attachment has ever been filed against the land it covers.

We deem it unnecessary to notice specifically the various other decisions cited by the parties herein. It can hardly be doubted that they declare the law as applicable to the particular facts involved. Indeed, there is scarcely room for dispute as to the principles germane to the present controversy, but, as we view it, the trial court has made an erroneous deduction from the facts. As we read the record, Arakelian was an innocent purchaser, having paid the full value for the land, with an honest purpose, and with no knowledge of any fraud in the transaction, and it would be unjust to burden his property with the claim of respondent.

We may say in conclusion that the comments of the Supreme Court of Kansas in Burke v. Johnson, 37 Kan. 337, 15 Pac. 204, 1 Am. St. Rep. 252, may be read with profit in this connection. Therein it was claimed that the fact of the hurried manner of the purchase, and the consideration paid by Armstrong, were sufficient to put Johnson upon notice of the former's fraudulent intent, but the court said:

"If these things are badges of fraud, and of such a character as to set aside this transaction, we think it would unsettle the real es tate transactions, or many of them, in Kansas."

The court refers to the fact that Johnson's attention was called to the land by a neighbor, that he went and found the agent and owner, visited the land, examined the records to see that the title was good, made an offer for the property, which was accepted, paid part of the consideration down on the same day, and completed the transaction the following day. The court concluded that there was no evidence of fraud on his part. No doubt other similar decisions could be found.

We think the judgment should be reversed and it is so ordered.

VURPILLAT v. VURPILLAT. (Civ. 3335.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 30, 1921.)

Appeal and error $\S$ 345(1)—Motion for new trial does not suspend limitations unless filed within 60 days.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 939, requiring that appeal from a judgment shall be taken within 60 days from the entry thereof, and that if proceedings for new trial are pending, the time for appeal does not expire until 30 days after the entry in the trial court of the ruling on such motion, a motion for new trial to extend the time for appeal must be instituted within 60 days from date of entry of judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Suit by William P. Vurpillat against Geneva Stowe Vurpillat for divorce. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Dismissed.

J. H. Ryckman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

JAMES, J. In this action brought by the plaintiff to secure a decree of divorce, defendant defaulted, and a hearing was had and testimony taken. The trial judge took the case under advisement, and some two weeks later entered a decree, denying the relief prayed for. The judgment was entered on April 29, 1919. On February 6, 1920, plaintiff filed in the trial court his notice of intention to move for a new trial, which motion was later heard by the court and denied. An appeal was then taken by the plaintiff from the judgment. It is urged in the brief of appellant that the decision of the court is not sustained by the evidence, in that the plaintiff established fully the allegations of his complaint by the testimony which he produced. We think that appellant is right in that contention, for it does appear by the testimony of both parties to the action that defendant deserted plaintiff without just cause, and there was independent evidence which furnished ample corroboration of the facts. Notwithstanding such a state of the case, we are unable here to afford appellant any relief, because his appeal was taken long after the expiration of the time fixed by section 939, Code of Civil Procedure. That section requires that an appeal from a judgment shall be taken within 60 days from the entry thereof. It is provided, however, that if proceedings for a new trial are pending, the time for appeal from the judgment does not expire until 30 days after the entry in the trial court of the ruling on such motion. This provision has been construed by the Supreme Court, and it has been held that proceedings on motion for a new trial, in order that they shall extend the time for appeal, must be instituted within 60 days from the date of the entry of the judgment. Ransome-Crummey Co. v. William M. Begs et al., 196 Pac. 487. See, also, Pac. Light, etc., Co. v. Kauffman, 39 Cal. App. 499, 179 Pac. 452. The notice of intention to move for a new trial was filed more than eight months after the date of the entry of the judgment in this case. Before that time the judgment had become final, hence was beyond the reach of an appeal.

The appeal is dismissed.

SHANK v. BLACKBURN et al. (Civ. 3503.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 21, 1921. Rehearing Denied Aug. 11, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 19, 1921.)

1. Chattel mortgages $\S$ 277—Complaint must allege demand for possession at a time when defendants had possession.

In action to foreclose chattel mortgage, providing that in case of nonpayment of mortgage debt mortgagee might take possession of the property, the complaint must allege demand by plaintiff for the property at a time when the defendants held possession.

2. Pleading $\S$ 403(5) — Complaint's omission to allege material fact held cured by allegations of answer.

In action to foreclose chattel mortgage entitling mortgagee to possession of mortgaged property in case of nonpayment of mortgage debt, failure of complaint to allege demand for possession by plaintiff at a time when the defendants held possession of property held cured by allegations of answer.

3. Appeal and error — 1042(5)—Refusal to require allegations to be stricken from complaint held harmless in view of judgment.

In action to foreclose chattel mortgage, refusal to require certain allegations of complaint as to rental value of property and as to plaintiff's claim for attorney's fees to be stricken held harmless where the judgment made no allowance to plaintiff based on either of such elements.

4. Trial — 397(2)—Findings held to support judgment notwithstanding absence of findings as to affirmative defense.

In action to foreclose chattel mortgage by purchaser of mortgage, in which the defendant, who had purchased property from mortgagor, set up the affirmative defense that such plaintiff on behalf of mortgagor procured extensions of time for payment of mortgage debt from mortgagee with knowledge of mortgagor's agreement with such defendant to satisfy the mortgage within a particular period, thereby releasing defendant, whose status was that of a surety, and that plaintiff's payment of mortgage indebtedness to mortgagee was the payment of the mortgage debt, and not merely the purchase of the mortgage, findings necessarily implying that such allegations were not true held to support judgment for plaintiff, notwithstanding failure to specifically find as to facts so alleged.

5. Appeal and error — 931(3)—Findings construed so as to uphold, rather than to defeat, judgment.

The findings of the trial court are to receive such a construction as will uphold, rather than defeat, its judgment thereon, and whenever from the facts found by it other facts may be inferred which will support the judgment, such inference will be deemed to have been made by the trial court, and upon an appeal from that judgment the appellate court will not draw from those facts any inference contrary to that which may have been drawn by the trial court for the purpose of rendering such a judgment.

6. Appeal and error — 1011(1) — Conflicting evidence not weighed.

The court on appeal, in reviewing findings of court, will not attempt to weigh or balance conflicting evidence.

7. Principal and surety — 104(1)—Surety held released by extension of time.

Though mere delay on the part of a creditor to proceed against the principal or to enforce any other remedy does not exonerate a guarantor under Civ. Code, § 2823, the creditor, by granting to the debtor an extension of time within which to pay, without surety's consent, under such circumstances as to impair or suspend his right to proceed against the debtor in accord with the terms of the original obligation, alters the original obligations, and thereby releases the surety.

8. Chattel mortgages — 212 — Assignee held entitled to no greater rights as against purchaser of mortgaged goods than those possessed by assignor.

Assignee of mortgage had no greater rights as against purchaser of mortgaged property, who claimed to have been released by assignor's extension of time for payment by original mortgagor of mortgage debt, without such purchaser's consent, than those possessed by the assignor.

9. Chattel mortgages — 278—Evidence held to show that postponements of foreclosure proceedings were not extensions of mortgage debt.

In action by assignee of mortgage against purchaser from mortgagor of mortgaged property to foreclose the mortgage, in which such defendant claimed to have been released by extensions of time granted mortgagor for payment of mortgage debt by plaintiff's assignor, evidence as to two postponements of proceedings in the prosecution of foreclosure action by such assignor held insufficient to warrant finding that such postponements were extensions of time for payment of the debt under such circumstances as to impair or suspend the right of such assignor to proceed against the debtor in accord with the terms of the original obligation, being mere extensions without consideration which could have been repudiated at any moment.

10. Chattel mortgages — 283—Amount awarded in lieu of delivery of possession should not exceed indebtedness.

Alternative judgment for plaintiff in action to foreclose chattel mortgage, awarding plaintiff specified amount of money in the event that a delivery of the mortgaged property to plaintiff could not be had, should not award an amount in excess of the amount of the indebtedness unpaid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by William Shank against P. C. Blackburn and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Elmer I. Moody and Porter C. Blackburn, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank C. Hill and George S. Hupp, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On June 10, 1918, Minnie Justis, to secure the payment of a debt of $1,100 with interest, etc., executed to Jacob Swallow a chattel mortgage on certain furniture and other personal property in the city of Los Angeles. On September 13, 1918, this mortgage was transferred to Lola E. Kilfoil, who remained the owner thereof until March 5, 1919. On August 7, 1918, Mrs. Justis transferred the mortgaged property to the defendant P. C. Blackburn. The note given by Justis, which the mortgage was to secure, was payable on or before December 10, 1918. Concurrently with the transfer to Blackburn, Mrs. Justis executed to him an agreement promising to pay off, and satisfy the mortgage within 90 days from that date, August 7, 1918.

On the 5th day of March, 1919, there was pending an action by Kilfoil, as plaintiff, against Justis, as defendant, for the foreclosure of the chattel mortgage, in which action the default of Justis had been entered. On said March 5, 1919, William Shank paid over to Mrs. Kilfoil the amount of the mortgage indebtedness, and received from her an assignment in due form of said mortgage. Thereupon the foreclosure action was dismissed, and the assignment was recorded.

On the 8th day of September, 1919, both principal and interest of the mortgage debt being wholly unpaid, Shank commenced this action. The case was tried upon the amended complaint filed December 8, 1919, and the answer thereto. The complaint shows the interest of Shank in the property by reason of said chattel mortgage, including the agreement contained in the mortgage, providing that in case of nonpayment, the mortgagee might take possession of the property in order to sell the same, and from the proceeds pay the debt. Aside from issues raised by denial, the principal defense pleaded is to the effect that the plaintiff did not in fact purchase the mortgage, but that on the contrary the plaintiff, with full knowledge of the contract obligation of Justis to Blackburn first procured extensions of time from Kilfoil on behalf of Justis, and then actually paid the mortgage debt under and pursuant to an arrangement alleged to have been made between the plaintiff and Justis whereby the plaintiff agreed to furnish to her financial assistance in the matter of payment of said mortgage debt. Judgment having been entered in favor of the plaintiff, the defendants appeal therefrom.

[1, 2] Taking up appellants' points in our own order, the first is that the court erred in overruling the demurrer of defendants to the amended complaint. It is contended that the complaint did not state a cause of action in that there is no allegation therein that demand for possession was made by the plaintiff upon the defendants while and during the time they held possession of the property. The rule is that such demand must be alleged to have been made at a time when the defendants held possession of the demanded property. Home Payment Jewelry Co. v. Smith, 24 Cal. App. 486, 141 Pac. 933. The complaint is defective in the particular mentioned, but that defect was cured by the answer. The complaint alleged that—

"On the ——— day of September, 1919, plaintiff demanded of the defendants possession of said goods," etc.

In their answer the defendants supplemented their denial of this allegation by the statement:

"But defendants admit that they now retain possession, and on the ——— day of September, 1919, defendants had possession of certain goods and chattels located at the place hereinbefore described."

Further on in the answer, in connection with their pleading of the agreement made by Mrs. Justis with Blackburn, the defendants allege that "on the said 7th day of August, 1918, the said Minnie Justis, in order to deliver said personal property to defendant, P. C. Blackburn, free and clear of all incumbrances," etc., executed the stated agreement. We think that these contents of the answer amount to an admission that at the time when demand was made defendants had possession of the demanded property. This fact being admitted, there is no merit in the claim that the judgment should be reversed on account of the omission to plead the fact in the complaint, or on account of the omission of the court to make a finding of the fact so admitted.

[3] It is claimed that the court erred in denying defendants' motion to strike from the complaint certain allegations referring to the rental value of the mortgaged property and relating to plaintiff's claim for attorney fees in this action. The motion should have been granted. The error, however, is without injury to appellants, since the judgment made no allowance to plaintiff based on either of those elements of the case.

Appellants claim that the transaction and the circumstances as proved clearly indicate that the advancement of the money by respondent was, in legal effect, payment of the mortgage debt to Kilfoil, and that in consequence thereof the debt was discharged. The findings affirm that no part of said mortgage debt has been paid. They further state that the plaintiff did not agree, for or on behalf of Mrs. Justis, to pay off, liquidate, or extinguish said promissory note or chattel mortgage, or said mortgage indebtedness, or any part thereof; that the plaintiff did not pay, satisfy, or discharge the said indebtedness, or any part thereof; that, at the time of the making of said assignment of said chattel mortgage to plaintiff by Mrs. Kilfoil, the plaintiff owned or had a grant deed to the property and premises wherein said personal property was located, and that he purchased the said note and chattel mortgage and took the assignment thereof for the purpose of protecting his interest, and for his own interests alone, and not otherwise.

[4, 5] It is suggested by appellants that these findings are insufficient to support the judgment because they omit to determine the facts alleged in their affirmative defense wherein the transactions between Justis and Blackburn, between Justis and Shank, and between Shank and Kilfoil, were set forth in aid of the assertion of defendants that, notwithstanding the formal execution of the instrument of assignment from Kilfoil to plaintiff, the transaction was in reality one of payment of the debt and satisfaction of the mortgage. But the facts as found by the court necessarily imply that the above-mentioned allegations of the answer were not true. This being so, the judgment will not be reversed on account of the absence of findings thus omitted.

"The findings of the trial court are to receive such a construction as will uphold, rather than defeat, its judgment thereon, and whenever, from the facts found by it, other facts may be inferred which will support the judgment, such inference will be deemed to have been made by the trial court, and upon an appeal from that judgment this court will not draw from those facts any inference of fact contrary to that which may have been drawn by the trial court for the purpose of rendering such judgment." Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 72, 77, 31 Pac. 742, 744 (22 L. R. A. 257); Tower v. Wilson, 188 Pac. 87, 91.

[6] Concerning the contention that the findings were not justified by the evidence, it is sufficient to reply that the testimony of the plaintiff definitely contradicts the essential evidentiary facts introduced on behalf of the defendants relating to the transactions in question, and definitely affirms his purchase of the mortgage in his own behalf and for his own benefit. This, therefore, is the usual instance of conflicting evidence which the court on appeal will not attempt to weigh or balance.

[7, 8] Appellant Blackburn presents the proposition that, when he accepted the mortgaged property subject to the lien thereon, without assuming or agreeing to pay the same, he became a surety for the payment of the mortgage debt; that as such surety he has been released from the mortgage on account of certain stated acts of the parties, and especially that extensions of time for payment of the mortgage debt were made and obtained without Blackburn's consent. In considering this contention, let it be assumed that the evidence fully establishes Blackburn's purchase of the property from Mrs. Justis in the manner stated in his answer, and the execution by Mrs. Justis of her agreement with Blackburn that she would pay and satisfy said mortgage; and that the court should have found these facts whereby it would have been established that defendant Blackburn, as owner of the property, stood in the position of a surety of a debtor with relation to the property assigned to him, although he was not personally bound to pay the debt. And let it be conceded that he would then be entitled to be exonerated—

"except so far as he may be indemnified by the principal, if by any act of the creditor, without the consent of the guarantor, the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect, or the remedies or rights of the creditor against the principal, in respect thereto, in any way impaired or suspended." Civ. Code, § 2819.

"While mere delay on the part of a creditor to proceed against the principal, or to enforce any other remedy, does not exonerate a guarantor (Civ. Code, § 2823), it is well settled that if he grants the debtor an extension of time within which to pay, under such circumstances as to impair or suspend his right to proceed against the debtor in accord with the terms of the original obligation, we have such an alteration of the original obligation as will release the surety, if the same is without his consent." Bridge v. Conn. Mut. Life Ins. Co., 167 Cal. 774, 782, 141 Pac. 375, 379.

The question, then, is whether or not the evidence relied upon by appellant, assuming that the court had found in accordance therewith, established an extension of time of the debtor, Mrs. Justis, to pay the mortgage debt, under such circumstances as to impair or suspend the right of Kilfoil to proceed to judgment in the foreclosure action. If this be answered in the affirmative, Shank in taking the assignment, did not place himself in any better situation than that of Kilfoil.

It appears from this evidence that Mrs. Justis had been injured in an accident of some kind, and was in a hospital. It does not appear that Shank had obligated himself to pay this debt for Mrs. Justis, but, according to testimony introduced by the defendant, Shank told the defendant that he had arranged to manage her affairs during her incapacity, and that she had made him her agent. Blackburn testified that on December 26 Shank told him that he would pay the debt rather than see Mrs. Justis suffer the mental strain of having a suit pending against her, and that he was going to Kilfoil to get an extension, if possible, of this mortgage, and get them to stay further proceedings in the case until he had an opportunity to pay the mortgage. Blackburn had endeavored to obtain an extension from Kilfoil (husband of Mrs. Kilfoil), and failed. Kilfoil testified that he asked Shank if he wanted to take up the mortgage, to which Shank replied that it would not be necessary, because things were going to be adjusted in a few days. Thereupon Kilfoil said he would let it ride a while. He said that Shank said that he was representing Mrs. Justis. Later, at the request of Shank, Kilfoil promised to continue the matter until February 10th. The debt being not paid at that time, Kilfoil caused the default of Mrs. Justis to be entered in the foreclosure action.

According to the testimony of Kilfoil, when that promise was made Shank said, "I will see that you do not lose this if I take it up myself;" to which Kilfoil replied, "I don't care who takes it up; I am going to get the money out of this mortgage." After the default had been entered, arrangements were made with Shank to grant an extension to March 5th. Kilfoil testified that Shank said he would take the thing up himself. The extension was allowed on account of delay required in getting certificates of title on some property which Shank was to turn over to Kilfoil as security on a note that Shank was to give in lieu of cash as consideration for the Justis note and mortgage.

On March 5th, Kilfoil received, in some form acceptable to him, the amount of the debt due, and executed an assignment of the note and mortgage to Shank. As we have seen, the court found that this was by way of purchase, and not as a payment of the mortgage.

[9] The facts above stated, although they show two postponements of proceedings in the prosecution of the foreclosure action, were not sufficient to have warranted the court in finding that there were extensions of time of maturity of the debt, or any extensions of time for payment, under such circumstances as to impair or suspend the right of Mrs. Kilfoil "to proceed against the debtor in accord with the terms of the original obligation." They were extensions without consideration, and could have been repudiated at any moment. Moreover, it appears quite plainly from the evidence of Blackburn that he was kept posted upon the progress of these negotiations, and it may fairly be inferred that he desired that such extensions be granted. And as we have seen, the court found that it was untrue that the plaintiff agreed, for or on behalf of Mrs. Justis, to pay off, liquidate, or extinguish said note or mortgage. As to that particular issue this finding meets and covers the question of fact as pleaded by the defendant.

[10] Finally it is contended that the court erred in entering judgment for the possession of the property, with an alternative judgment in the sum of $1,499, in the event that a delivery of said personal property to the plaintiff could not be had. This point is well taken, since the amount awarded is in excess of the amount of the mortgage debt at the time of entry of judgment. The rule is as stated in Keiser v. Levering, 29 Cal. App. 41, 154 Pac. 281:

"Since in the present case the plaintiff's right to have possession of the described property is only claimed for the purpose of satisfying his claims for an indebtedness unpaid to him, and since no special damages are either alleged or proved, it is clear that the value of the property to him cannot exceed the amount of the indebtedness unpaid."

But the court found as a fact that no part of the principal or interest of the mortgage debt has been paid. This amount is ascertainable by calculation. We have made a computation, and find that the amount of principal and interest of the note, compounding the interest semiannually as provided in the note, was $1,250.57 on the date of entry of the judgment. The judgment is hereby modified as of the date of entry thereof by striking out the words "fourteen hundred ninety-nine ($1,499) dollars," and substituting therefor the words "twelve hundred fifty and 57-100ths dollars ($1,250.57)."

As thus amended, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. O'BRIEN. (Cr.952.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 5, 1921.)

1. Criminal law — 519(9)—Confession not excluded merely because prisoner was urged to speak the truth.

A confession is admissible even if officers urged accused to tell the truth, and told him that he might as well make a clean breast of it, if they made no threats or promises of reward.

2. Criminal law — 1172(1)—Instruction as to burglary in first degree held harmless, regardless of error in defining nighttime.

Where evidence was undisputed that the crime was committed in the nighttime, an instruction that, if defendant was guilty of burglary at all, it was burglary in the first degree, having been committed in the nighttime, "that is, between sundown and sunrise on the 2d day of June," instead of saying between sundown on the 1st day of June and sunrise on the 2d, the error was not prejudicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

John O'Brien was convicted of burglary in the first degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

Ralph C. McComish and Harry Houser, both of San Jose, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Rioridan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment following a verdict of guilty of burglary in the first degree. The crime was committed by the breaking into a store in Palo Alto and taking therefrom a large quantity of silks. Two men were seen lurking around the rear of the store empty-handed at about 1 a. m. on the night of the crime, and some time later were seen coming out of the store with three suit cases and a grip. They were then seen near the railway depot about 2:30 a. m. by a police officer. On the approach of the officer both men fled, dropping the suit cases, which were filled with the articles stolen from the store. Defendant's companion was immediately captured by the officer, while defendant was taken into custody between Palo Alto and Redwood City about 5 a. m. of the same day. After examination by the police officers he admitted his guilt, and this confession was used against him on the trial. There is no suggestion in the record negating the guilt of defendant, but certain technical objections are made to the course of the trial.

[1] First it is said that the confession was not admissible because it was not voluntarily made. The evidence relied on to show that it was involuntary shows that the officers urged appellant to tell the truth and that he "might as well make a clean breast of it." It does not present a case where the confession was obtained by either threats or promises of reward. People v. Haney, 189 Pac. 338, 340. Though he was urged to tell the truth, he was not led to believe that he would gain any advantage by making a confession of the crime. A confession will not be excluded merely because the prisoner was exhorted or urged to speak the truth. 16 Corpus Juris, § 1476; People v. Heivner, 13 Cal. App. 768, 114 Pac. 411.

[2] The court instructed the jury that, if appellant was guilty of burglary at all, it was burglary in the first degree, because the evidence was undisputed that the crime was committed in the nighttime—"that is, between sundown and sunrise on the 2d day of June." Of course, what the court meant to say was between sundown on the 1st day of June and sunrise on the 2d. The jury was properly instructed as to the degree of the crime, and no harm resulted from the error in the definition of "nighttime."

There is no prejudicial error in the record. Judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

SAN JOAQUIN & KINGS RIVER CANAL & IRRIGATION CO., Inc., v. JAMES J. STEVINSON et al. (Civ. 2345.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 5, 1921.)

Appeal and error ⇨776—Appeal dismissed on appellant's motion, though respondent confesses error.

Where on defendant's appeal plaintiff confesses error and consents to a reversal, and defendant moves to dismiss the appeal, dismissal thereof, and not a reversal thereon, for which plaintiff moved, will be granted, and this though plaintiff also appealed, as plaintiff must rely on its own assignments of error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mariposa County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, Incorporated, against James J. Stevinson, a corporation, and others. From the judgment, both the named parties appeal. Heard on defendant's motion to dismiss its appeal, and on plaintiff's motion for reversal on said appeal. Appeal dismissed.

See, also, 164 Cal. 221, 128 Pac. 924; 26 Cal. App. 274, 147 Pac. 254, 258; 179 Cal. 533, 178 Pac. 292.

James F. Peck and McWilliams & Hatfield, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco, and J. J. Griffin, of Merced (Forrest A. Cobb, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an action in eminent domain. From the judgment rendered, both the plaintiff and the defendant James J. Stevinson, Incorporated, appealed. On June 8, 1921, the plaintiff served on the said defendant, and on the 11th of the same month filed herein, its confession of error as follows:

"Now comes respondent on the appeal of James J. Stevinson (a corporation), and confesses error in said cause, and consents to a reversal of the judgment therein on the appeal of the said James J. Stevinson (a corporation)."

On June 22, 1921, the defendant filed herein its motion for dismissal of its appeal, and on the 25th of that month it filed the following:

"Comes now, James J. Stevinson, a corporation, defendant in the above-entitled action, and dismisses the appeal heretofore taken by it. And the clerk of the above-entitled court is hereby requested and instructed to enter this dismissal of record."

The plaintiff contends that the judgment should be reversed; the defendant, that the appeal should be dismissed. No cause is shown why the defendant's motion should be denied, other than the right claimed by plaintiff to a reversal of the judgment on the defendant's appeal. The only question, then, is whether the judgment should be reversed on the plaintiff's confession of error.

The confession is not of any particular error, but only that there was "error in said cause." In the defendant's appeal, no record has been brought up, so that it cannot be ascertained upon what errors reliance for reversal was placed. In the cases cited by the plaintiff, where reversals were had upon confessions of error by the respondents therein, there appear to have been no objections made by the appellants to such reversals except in the case of Newman v. Newman Clock Co., 195 Ill. App. 373. In that case it was held that "a confession of error does not preclude the consideration of errors not confessed." The rule there announced is in harmony with the holding in Sun Insurance Co. v. White, 118 Cal. 468, 50 Pac. 546. In Brown v. Jenks, 98 Cal. 10, 32 Pac. 701, it is said:

"Respondent confesses error in striking out the defense, and consents that the case be reversed on that ground. He says the point made by defendant on the demurrer is radical and important, and will be argued when the case is again here, in such form as to require its determination. The question as to the correctness of this ruling is properly presented on this appeal from the judgment, and the consent of respondent to a reversal on some other ground, which does not dispose of the demurrer, cannot deprive appellant of his right to have it determined."

The appealing party may be willing to waive the errors on which his appeal is based and, by a dismissal, to permit the judgment to stand as rendered, but if the judgment is to be reversed, he is entitled to have the errors assigned by him decided for the guidance of the court in the retrial of the case. The fact that the plaintiff, also, has appealed from the judgment herein is foreign to the question under consideration. If an appellant sees fit to dismiss his appeal, and be bound by the judgment from which the appeal is taken, the respondent should not be permitted to prolong the litigation by securing a reversal upon the appellant's assignment of errors of which the respondent has not complained. Where a respondent has not appealed, he is not entitled to a reversal of the judgment, entailing, as it does, a new trial of the action. Where he also has appealed, he must rely upon his own assignment of errors.

The plaintiff's motion for a reversal of the judgment is denied, and the defendant's motion to dismiss its appeal is granted, and the said appeal is dismissed.

On an appeal on the judgment roll the court must assume that the findings of fact are correct.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Alexander Kazman against Max Light. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Warren L. Williams and Seymour S. Silvertown, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. V. Rosenkranz, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This appeal, taken by the defendant, is presented on the judgment roll, and involves the question as to whether the complaint of the plaintiff states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and whether the findings of the court are sufficient to sustain the judgment.

[1] The controversy arose as the result of a transaction in which plaintiff and defendant were engaged as copartners. It is determined by the findings of fact, which, under this record, we must assume are correct that plaintiff and defendant associated themselves together in the purchase of two diamonds. For one of the diamonds they paid the sum of $635, and for the second $950, together with some small charges by way of commissions, etc. In this venture they agreed to share profits and losses. The diamond first referred to was sold and an accounting made to the copartnership. The defendant reported to the plaintiff that he had received an offer of $1,092 for the second diamond, whereupon plaintiff agreed to purchase the diamond himself, and paid the copartnership the sum last mentioned. All of the partnership business having been concluded, the accounts were adjusted and settled. Later, one Taylor brought an action of claim and delivery against plaintiff, wherein she asserted title to the diamond so purchased by the plaintiff from the copartnership, and in that action she obtained judgment for $1,000, together with costs, which judgment was paid by respondent.

This action was then brought to recover of the defendant one-half of the money expended by the plaintiff in satisfying the judgment of Taylor. The plaintiff in his complaint herein first set forth account for money had and received. In the second and third alleged causes of action the facts in detail, the substance of which we have narrated, were stated, and in addition thereto it was alleged that, upon the bringing of the action by Taylor against this plaintiff, defendant was informed thereof, and agreed that if plaintiff would defend that action that he, this defendant, would pay one-half of any judgment that might be rendered against Kazman.

[2, 3] It was alleged that defendant had paid the sum of $36, and no more, and that he refused to pay any further sum. Leaving aside other questions, it seems not to be disputed that the agreement of appellant to pay one-half of any judgment that might be rendered against respondent in the suit by Taylor is good and enforceable, provided it is founded upon a valid consideration. It was alleged and found that respondent herein purchased the diamond referred to from the copartnership. By the provisions of section 1765, Civil Code, one who sells personal property as his own "thereby warrants that he has a good and unincumbered title thereto." The point is made that a copartner purchasing merchandise from his firm is not entitled to the protection of this section. Counsel for appellant makes the point, but admits that he can find no authorities to sustain it. Under the facts of this case where it appears that the copartnership never obtained title to the diamond which respondent purchased of it, and as to which lack of title respondent had no knowledge, we think the Code warranty should be made to apply with as much force as though the diamond purchased by respondent had been sold to some one outside of the partnership association. If this position is correctly taken, then it at once follows that there was an obligation resting upon appellant to respond when the defect of title became established. This obligation would furnish a good consideration for his promise to respondent to pay one-half of the amount of the judgment in the case of Taylor v. Kazman.

[4] The facts showing the liability of appellant were sufficiently stated in the complaint, and the findings of the court fully covered all of the issues made. And, irrespective of the express agreement of appellant to pay one-half of the Taylor judgment, the duty to contribute toward an obligation of a copartnership, where such obligation has been discharged by one partner, continues. It has been held that after a partnership has been dissolved and the accounts fully settled, one partner who has paid partnership debts may maintain an action against the other for contribution. Sears et al. v. Starbird, 78 Cal. 225, 20 Pac. 547.

The judgment is affirmed.

MAZURAN v. FINN, Sheriff. (Civ. 3900.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 25, 1921.)

1. Execution ⇐185—Third parties may file bond after filing of indemnity bond by judgment creditor.

When property has been levied on under execution, and third parties have advanced their claims to the property, and a judgment creditor has given an undertaking indemnifying the sheriff, the claimants may nevertheless afterwards prevent a sale by themselves filing a bond and securing a release of the property from the levy of the execution, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 689, 710-713½.

2. Bonds ⇐32—Bond valid though improper obligee named.

It has been held that a bond may be valid though the obligee named be not the one designated by statute, and in such a case one may show by the record of the suit in which the bond was given and by extraneous facts that he was the person intended as the obligee.

3. Execution ⇐185—Statutes relating to bond to release property to be liberally construed.

A bond filed by third parties to obtain release of property levied on under execution under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 710-713½, is sufficient if a substantial compliance with such statutes, being remedial in their nature and to be construed liberally so as to ascertain the remedy, and the naming of others in the alternative, with the judgment creditor as obligee, may be designated as surplusage.

4. Execution ⇐185—Second bond may be filed by claimant if first is insufficient.

A claimant of property levied on under execution may file a second bond if the first is insufficient by reason of some infirmity not anticipated by the framer of the act, in response to an objection other than those permitted by the statute, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 710-713½.

Application by M. J. Mazuran for writ of mandate prayed to be directed to Thomas F. Finn, as Sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco. Denied.

Geo. D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for petitioner.

John T. Williams, of San Francisco, and Herman Weinberger, of San Francisco, amici curiæ, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. This is an application for a writ of mandate directing respondent, as sheriff, to sell certain personal property levied upon by him under execution. The petitioner, as plaintiff in an action against Frank F. Akacich and George Dimmich, was awarded judgment in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco in the sum of $5,000, with interest and costs, no part of which having been paid, the respondent, under instructions, levied a writ of execution upon a linotype machine, and its accessories, alleged to belong to the judgment debtor, Akacich. John H. Leighton and E. E. Carreras served on the sheriff a written claim, verified by oath, setting out their right to the possession of the property. The petitioner thereupon indemnified respondent against the third party claim by an undertaking, executed as provided in section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The sheriff accepted and approved the bond and proceeded to advertise the property for sale.

[1] Before any sale could be had Leighton and Carreras, assuming to act under the provisions of sections 710 to 713½, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure, executed to the sheriff a bond in double the value of the property claimed by them, and demanded its return. The respondent thereupon refused to proceed with the sale, on the ground that the property was released from the lien and levy of the execution by reason of the undertaking last given. The petitioner has applied to this court for a writ of mandate to compel the sheriff to sell the property, claiming that the refusal to do so is unwarranted for several reasons. His principal contention is that, when third parties have advanced their claims, and the judgment creditor has given an undertaking indemnifying the sheriff, the claimants may not afterward prevent a sale by themselves filing a bond, and securing a release of the property from the levy of the execution.

So far as we are aware, this is the first time sections 710 to 713½, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure have engaged the attention of any appellate court, although section 689 has been under consideration a number of times. By its terms the latter section provides that, if property levied upon is claimed by a third person by a written claim verified by oath, setting out his rights to possession, served upon the sheriff, the sheriff is not bound to keep the property unless the plaintiff, or the person in whose favor the writ of execution runs, on demand, indemnifies him against such claim by an undertaking, with at least two good and sufficient sureties, in a sum equal to double the value of the property levied upon. This section, based on the old practice act of California (St. 1851, p. 85, § 218), was enacted as a part of the Code of Civil Procedure in 1872. It then provided that if the property levied upon was claimed by a third person the validity of the claim should be tried by a sheriff's jury of six persons. The section was amended in 1891 to read substantially as it does at the present time. St. 1891, p. 20.

In 1903 sections 710 to 713½, inclusive, relating to the release of property levied upon on execution, were added to the Code. Section 710 provides that, where property levied upon to satisfy a judgment for the payment of money is claimed by a person other than the judgment debtor, such claimant may give an undertaking as provided in the succeeding sections, which bond shall release the property from the lien and levy of the execution. The statute by which the sections were enacted provides that all acts, and parts of acts, in conflict with its provisions shall be repealed. St. 1903, p. 101.

We deem it unnecessary for us to consider the suggestion of the respondent, made on the argument, that the act of 1903 had the effect of repealing section 689. Even if we were to hold that the two acts relate to the same subject, that situation does not present itself. In 1907 section 689 was re-enacted in its present form. St. 1907, pp. 682, 683. It is therefore the last utterance of the Legislature upon the question with which it deals. The statute by which it was re-enacted does not attempt to repeal any act, or parts of acts, in conflict with its provisions. Consequently we may safely conclude that both section 689 and section 710 are to be given effect, if that be possible. Two sections, both numbered 710, were added to the Code of Civil Procedure in 1903, but in this consideration we are dealing only with the section, second in point of position in the Code, which provides that a third party claimant may give an undertaking and secure the release of property levied upon under execution.

Section 689, it has been repeatedly held, was enacted solely for the protection of the officer making the levy. Paden v. Goldbaum, 4 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 767, 37 Pac. 759; Dubois v. Spinks, 114 Cal. 289, 295, 46 Pac. 95; Kellogg v. Burr, 126 Cal. 38, 42, 58 Pac. 306. The undertaking given under its provisions runs to such officer, is delivered to, and indemnifies him against the third party claim. It is quite apparent from a reading of section 710, and the succeeding provisions of the act, made a part of the Code in 1903, that those sections are intended for the benefit of the judgment creditor, and also to provide a method by which a third party, claiming property levied upon under execution, may prevent a summary sale to his loss and detriment. They, in a sense, absolve the sheriff from liability for releasing the property, but that does not appear to have been the primary object. The undertaking there provided for must be filed in the action in which the execution issued, and a copy served upon the judgment creditor, or his attorney. The judgment creditor may except to the sureties, and may also object to the statement in the bond as to the estimated value of the property sought to be released. These matters must be passed upon by the court, and if allowed a new undertaking must be filed. The amount of the bond must be double the estimated value of the property claimed by the third party, and the condition of the bond shall be that, if the property claimed is finally adjudged to be the property of the judgment debtor, the third party claimant giving the undertaking "will pay of said judgment upon which execution has issued a sum equal to the value, as estimated in the undertaking, of said property claimed." Release of the property held by the sheriff is effected 10 days after a proper undertaking is filed. This summary of the provisions of said sections 710 et seq. makes clear, we think, the purpose for which they were enacted.

[2, 3] This brings us to a consideration of the specific objection urged by the petitioner to the procedure followed in this case. The Code does not specifically designate the person to whom the bond, given under section 710, shall be executed. The third party claimants below first filed an undertaking in which the respondent here, as sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, was named the obligee, although the condition of the obligation was to pay to the petitioner, the judgment creditor, as required by the statute. On objection of the petitioner the claimants filed a new undertaking which recites that the surety company executing the bond is bound either to Thomas F. Finn, sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, or M. J. Mazuran, plaintiff in the action and judgment creditor of the judgment in the undertaking therein before referred to, "whichever of them is, or may be finally adjudged to be the proper obligee of the undertaking (but not to both of them jointly), and, if neither be so adjudged, then unto the state of California," in the sum of $4,700, or twice the value of the property levied upon, which is stated to be $2,350.

It has been held that a bond may be valid, though the obligee named be not the one designated by statute. In such a case one may show by the record of the suit in which the bond was given, and by extraneous facts, that he was the person intended as the obligee. Morgan v. Thrift, 2 Cal. 562; Board of Education v. Grant, 107 Mich. 151, 64 N. W. 1050. But, even if under such liberal rule the first undertaking should be held insufficient, the second was a substantial compliance with the Code sections, which are remedial in their nature, and should be construed liberally, and so as to extend the remedy. Cullerton v. Mead, 22 Cal. 95, 98. The naming of others in the alternative with the judgment creditor as obligee, when read in connection with the recital of the obligation of the bond, which literally follows the Code, may be designated as surplusage.

[4] We do not think it matters that the second undertaking was filed in response to an objection other than those permitted by the Code sections. There is nothing in the statute, either by implication or express provisions, forbidding the filing of a second bond if the first is insufficient by reason of some infirmity not anticipated by the framers of the act.

The petition for a writ of mandate is denied.

DAVENPORT v. ALEXANDER et al.
(Civ. 3470.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 28, 1921.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances § 132(1)—Sale of automobile held ineffectual as to seller's creditor.

Where owner executed a bill of sale of an automobile, but continued to use the automobile in his business and thereafter kept the automobile sometimes in his garage and sometimes in buyer's garage, the transfer was void as against seller's creditor, who had advanced purchase price of automobile and was entitled to a lien thereon under agreement with seller for amount so advanced, the transfer of the automobile not having been accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by an actual and continued change of possession, as required by Civ. Code, § 3440.

2. Replevin § 11(1) — Demand a prerequisite to action.

Demand is an essential prerequisite to claim and delivery action.

3. Replevin § 11(4)—Demand for automobile on keeper of garage held insufficient.

In an action of claim and delivery for automobile in defendant's possession, a demand for possession of the automobile, made on the keeper of a garage in which the automobile had been temporarily placed by defendant, held insufficient.

4. Replevin § 93—Findings held insufficient for failure to find plaintiff's right to possession at time of demand.

In claim and delivery action for automobile in defendant's possession, findings held insufficient to support judgment for plaintiff, in that it had not been found that plaintiff, at the time of the demand for possession, had the right to possession.

5. Replevin § 71(1) — Defendant claiming amount advanced by him to seller of automobile could show what such amount included.

In claim and delivery action by automobile buyer against third person who claimed an amount advanced for purchase of the automobile by seller, under agreement with seller specifying the amount that had been advanced to seller prior to execution of agreement, third person was entitled to show that such amount included advances made toward the purchase of an old machine by seller, which had been turned in toward the payment on the purchase of the automobile involved in the action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by J. Dryden Davenport against W. E. Alexander and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Reversed.

H. G. Ames, of Anaheim, for appellant.

Mark L. Herron, of Lankershim, and Channing Follette, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This action was one of claim and delivery. The plaintiff was awarded judgment, from which defendant W. E. Alexander appeals.

The property involved was a certain automobile which at the time the action was instituted was in the possession of appellant. The machine had been purchased and used by one Barkow who, at the time of the making of the purchase, was employed as a salesman by the corporation of which appellant was the president. In April, 1919, he desired to purchase an automobile different from the one which he was then using, and made an arrangement with the appellant to advance necessary money with which to complete the desired purchase. A written agreement was executed by appellant and Barkow, wherein it was set forth that appellant had advanced the sum of $720 on account of the purchase of the automobile, and that, there being a balance of $800 due to the vendor of the machine, payable in monthly installments, appellant should advance the amount of such installments. In the agreement it was set forth that Barkow, as soon as the automobile had been fully paid for with appellant's money, would execute a chattel mortgage in favor of the appellant to secure the latter for the repayment of money advanced, or would deliver the automobile to the appellant to be held by him until the money was so repaid. The agreement, among other things, recited:

"It being understood and agreed between the parties hereto that said first party is to have a lien on said automobile for the sums so advanced by him, until the same has been repaid to him by said second party, and that the same is to be evidenced either by a chattel mortgage, or by a delivery of said automobile by said second party."

[1] It was further set forth that Barkow agreed that in the event he should leave his employment with the appellant, or should be discharged from such employment, appellant should be entitled to have the automobile delivered to him to be held until the money advanced on account of its purchase had been repaid, or at the option of appellant appellant should have the privilege of paying whatever balance there might be due to the vendor of the machine, and then accept a note and chattel mortgage as security for the debt. Upon making the purchase of the machine in question Barkow turned in for credit the old machine which he had been using at an allowed sum of $400. Appellant advanced in the first instance $322.30, and further advanced various installments of $50 as they became due for the months commencing with May, 1919, up to the time when this controversy arose, which was at the end of that year. In November, 1919, Barkow, acting, as the evidence plainly shows, in bad faith toward appellant, attempted to transfer his interest in the machine to the plaintiff. It appears that he owed the plaintiff $900. He at first thought of giving plaintiff a chattel mortgage, but having learned that by the conditional sale contract under which the automobile was being purchased the title remained in the vendor, and that he could not legally mortgage the same, he executed a bill of sale in favor of plaintiff, and attempted to deliver possession of the automobile thereunder. We may here call attention to the fact, assuming that Barkow had such an interest in the automobile as might be transferred by bill of sale, the attempted transfer was not accompanied by such a change of possession as is required under the provisions of section 3440 of the Civil Code. Under that law a transfer of personal property is ineffectual and void against creditors where it is not "accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things transferred." There is not the smallest dispute made by the evidence but that Barkow, after the attempted transfer, continued to have the use of the automobile. He testified that he had the agreement with the plaintiff that he might use it as he needed it, whenever it was necessary in his work as a salesman, that he had used the car subsequent to the alleged transfer, and that sometimes it was in plaintiff's garage and sometimes in his. Following close upon this alleged transaction with the plaintiff, and early in January, 1920, Barkow notified appellant that he would leave his employment with the latter. He had not informed appellant of his transaction with the plaintiff regarding the automobile, and did not inform him of it when the question of the adjustment of that debt was taken up. At the time of what was apparently the last discussion on this subject, Barkow drove the automobile in question to appellant's place of business. Appellant there insisted upon Barkow's complying with the terms of the contract. Appellant took possession of the machine, claiming that right under the express terms of the agreement hereinbefore referred to, and continued to keep it until this action was brought by this plaintiff. The court found that appellant had "forcibly" taken possession of the machine. The only testimony that in any wise gives color to that finding is found in the statement of Barkow that appellant walked out to the machine and took hold of the spark lever and broke or damaged it, saying "I guess you won't drive it away now." Whether Barkow was in fact prevented from taking the machine away does not appear; he did not testify that the machine was injured so that it could not be driven away, or that appellant interfered in any other way to prevent him having the automobile removed. For aught that appears, Barkow, after the words last quoted were used, went away and left the machine in the possession of appellant.

[2-5] Under the specific terms of the agreement made between appellant and Barkow appellant had the right to the possession of the machine immediately upon Barkow's voluntarily ceasing his employment with appellant, or upon his discharge by the latter. Appellant proceeded promptly to offer to the vendor the balance of the purchase price, which amounted to less than $200. The vendor refused to receive it. By his answer filed in the case appellant made the offer to satisfy any claims on the part of the vendor. However, the vendor, after refusing to permit appellant to discharge the purchase price debt, accepted the money from the plaintiff and gave receipt therefor. Appellant performed every act essential to make effectual his lien upon the property after obtaining possession of it, and we think that the judgment should have been in his favor. We have already called attention to the fact that no such transfer of possession of the property was made as is contemplated by section 3440, Civil Code. Appellant was the creditor of Barkow at the time of the alleged transfer to plaintiff, and was one of the persons entitled to claim the benefit of the provisions of the section mentioned. Other reasons exist why the judgment appealed from cannot be sustained. The demand for possession, which is an essential prerequisite to the commencement of a claim and delivery action, was made upon the keeper of a garage in which the automobile had been temporarily placed by appellant, and no demand was shown to have been made upon appellant. Furthermore, it was alleged in the complaint that demand was made on the 2d of January, 1920. The court determined, in the face of a denial as to any demand having been made, that prior to the commencement of the action plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the automobile, and that "prior to the commencement of the action" defendant took possession of the same, and that "before the commencement of the action" plaintiff demanded of the defendants possession of the property. These findings are insufficient to support the judgment because it is not found that at the time the demand was made plaintiff had the right to possession of the automobile. It was stipulated that the sum of $670 was the correct amount of money which appellant had advanced, and which had been used in making payments on the automobile. In addition to this it appeared that the appellant had advanced money for the purchase of the old machine which Barkow had used in making the trade for the second one. Barkow admitted this to be the fact, but testified that he couldn't say how much money had been advanced by appellant on that account. It has been noted that the agreement between Barkow and appellant stated that the sum already advanced by appellant on account of the purchase of the second machine was $720. If this amount included advances made toward the purchase of the old machine, appellant was entitled to show that fact.

We have not been aided in a consideration of this appeal by either printed brief or oral argument from respondent. Appellant, however, has made full presentation of points adverted to.

The judgment is reversed.

COSBY v. CLINE. (L. A. 6208.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 24, 1921.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 23, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ☞907(1)—Facts appearing by reasonable inference assumed to be true, in so far as they support the findings.

On appeal the court assumes as true all facts which appear by reasonable inference from the evidence in the record, so far as they support the findings of the trial court.

2. Fraudulent conveyances ☞132(2)—Statute as to transfer of possession held inapplicable.

Where third party transferred an automobile, which the sheriff had taken on an attachment to the plaintiff, Civ. Code, § 3440, providing that, in case of transfer of property by persons in possession, there must be an immediate delivery and change of possession of articles transferred, in order to be valid against the creditors of the transferor, did not apply, since the transferor was not in possession of the automobile at the time of transfer.

3. Fraudulent conveyances ☞132(2) — Seller of automobile held not in possession, within statute as to change of possession.

Where the automobile of a third party was held by the sheriff under an attachment, and plaintiff paid liens and the judgment against it, whereupon it was transferred to plaintiff, who took control of the car, but left it in the same garage, subject to his orders, and afterwards the third party executed bill of sale to plaintiff, the third party was not then in possession of the automobile, within Civ. Code, § 3440, providing that transfer of property by person in possession must be accompanied by immediate delivery and change of control of property, in order to avoid being invalid as against creditors.

4. Appeal and error ☞1061(3)—Judgment not reversed, when essential facts shown after erroneous denial of nonsuit.

A judgment will not be reversed for error in denying a nonsuit, where facts entitling plaintiff to recover were shown by evidence given after the motion was made.

Action by Walter Cosby against John C. Cline. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dockweiler & Mott, Mott & Cross, and Albert M. Cross, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment against him for damages from the conversion of an automobile.

One Boyd began an action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against one A. B. Cosby to recover money due on contract and sued out a writ of attachment therein to the defendant in his official capacity as sheriff of Los Angeles county. The defendant received the writ, and in virtue thereof, on April 29, 1915, levied the same on the automobile in question and took it into his possession. Judgment was thereupon recovered in that action, and a writ of execution thereon was issued to the defendant, by virtue whereof he sold the same to Boyd, the plaintiff in the action, on June 14, 1915. This is the conversion complained of. The defendant, in defense, set up the judgment, levy, and sale in justification. The sole question is whether or not the automobile was subject to attachment and execution as the property of A. B. Cosby at the time of said levy and sale.

The defendant's claim is that the automobile was subject to execution against A. B. Cosby by virtue of the provision of the Civil Code that—

"Every transfer of personal property * * * is conclusively presumed, if made by a person having at the time the possession or control of the property, and not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things transferred, to be fraudulent, and therefore void, against those who are his creditors while he remains in possession." Section 3440.

At the time the transactions here in question occurred, A. B. Cosby was in business in San Francisco as an automobile dealer and he owned the car in controversy. He had been sued by one Korbel on a claim for $1,100, in which action an attachment was issued and levied on the car in question on January 16, 1915, and it was then taken by the sheriff into his possession and kept by him in a place known as "Class A Garage" on Post street. It was also encumbered by a chattel mortgage to secure a debt of A. B. Cosby for $1,050. While thus in possession of the sheriff under attachment, the plaintiff, Walter Cosby, agreed with A. B. Cosby that, in consideration of the sale and transfer of said car to him, he would pay off and discharge said liens. In pursuance of this agreement plaintiff paid off the liens, and A. B. Cosby transferred to him his interest in the car, and thereupon the attorney for Korbel directed the persons in charge of the Class A Garage to deliver the car to the plaintiff. Plaintiff then went to the said garage and took over the car. He left it there, with instructions to the garage people that they should not let the car go out, except upon his order in writing, giving them his signature for identification of such order, and then employed them to wash and polish the car. All this occurred not later than February 25, 1915. On February 26, 1915,

A. B. Cosby executed a formal bill of sale, purporting to sell said car to Walter Cosby, the plaintiff, for the sum of $2,150.

Quite a while afterwards Walter Cosby gave to A. B. Cosby an order to Class A Garage to deliver the car to A. B. Cosby, and the latter then, at plaintiff's request, got it from the garage, and took it to A. B. Cosby's place of business on Van Ness avenue, and there turned it over to Walter Cosby. For about two weeks thereafter Walter Cosby used the car in going about the city of San Francisco. When not in actual use, he would sometimes put it in the basement of A. B. Cosby's place of business, sometimes in the Denman Garage, on Bush street, or, if it was during the daytime, he would leave it on the street in front of the Cosby place of business. Walter Cosby was the father of A. B. Cosby. After said sale A. B. Cosby did not use or drive said car, but merely, at times when it suited his father's convenience, allowed his father to store the car in the basement aforesaid, or elsewhere on his premises. Plaintiff was desirous of selling the car, and upon learning that one Brant, of Los Angeles, wanted to buy a car of that make, he caused his son, as his agent, to take it to Los Angeles, there to be sold either to Brant or to some other person. It was while the car was in the possession of A. B. Cosby for that purpose that the defendant levied the writ of attachment on the car as aforesaid.

[1] We have taken the above statement of facts from the bill of exceptions. Some of the facts we have related are not there shown by express statements, but they do appear by reasonable inference from the facts directly shown. Inasmuch as the findings are in favor of the plaintiff, it is necessary for the reviewing court to assume as true all facts which appear by reasonable inference from the evidence contained in the record on appeal, so far as they may support the findings for plaintiff. These findings are that at the time of the levy Walter Cosby was the owner of the car, and A. B. Cosby had no interest therein, and that the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully seized the car on the attachment against A. B. Cosby. The facts aforesaid are sufficient to sustain these findings.

[2] Section 3440, on which the defendant relies, describes a certain variety of constructive fraud, whereby a transfer is declared to be fraudulent as a matter of law, regardless of the actual motives or intentions of the parties. Such a provision cannot be extended beyond its plain meaning, nor be made to apply to cases which do not meet the conditions there described. By its own terms it applies only to transfers "made by a person having at the time the possession or control of the property." It is plain from the foregoing evidence that, at the time of this transfer between A. B. Cosby and Walter Cosby, A. B. Cosby was not in the possession or control of the property transferred. On the contrary, it was in the possession and control of the sheriff and entirely beyond the control of A. B. Cosby. It is well established that in such a case an immediate delivery to the transferee, followed by an actual change of possession, is not necessary in order to make the transfer valid against creditors. The reason is, of course, that all the conditions stated in the section are necessary to make the constructive fraud declared and in such a case one of the conditions is absent, and hence the sale is valid without immediate delivery or continued change of possession. This has been decided in Williams v. Borgwardt, 119 Cal. 82, 51 Pac. 15, Curtner v. Lyndon, 128 Cal. 37, 60 Pac. 462, and Williamson v. Monroe, 174 Cal. 466, 163 Pac. 662. It follows, therefore, that the court below was correct in holding that the levy was unlawful and wrongful and that the property did not belong to A. B. Cosby at that time.

[3, 4] The appellant erroneously assumes in his argument that the transfer from A. B. Cosby to Walter Cosby did not take place until the execution of the bill of sale, and since at that time the property had been released from attachment, he claims that the evidence is such that the court should have found that it was then in the virtual custody of A. B. Cosby. The proposition that A. B. Cosby then had the virtual possession of the car is only deducible by inference from the evidence, if at all. There was positive evidence to the effect that the actual transfer took place prior to the execution of the bill of sale, the time being somewhat uncertain, but at least, under the evidence, two or three days before, and also that at the time the bill of sale was executed the car was in the Class A Garage under the control of Walter Cosby, and not to be taken away except upon his written order. It is therefore clear that at the time of the transfer, even by the bill of sale, A. B. Cosby was not in possession or control of the car. Under these circumstances the provisions of section 3440 have no application. These facts appeared either before the motion for nonsuit was made or were shown by the evidence subsequently given. In such a case we will not reverse a judgment because of error in denying the motion for a nonsuit.

The judgment is affirmed.

PER CURIAM. The application for a rehearing is denied.

As to the refusal of the trial court to grant the motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence we are of opinion that the proposed evidence could not have substantially affected the result. It would still remain true that the car remained in the garage up to or about the time of the transfer in the name of and apparently subject to the orders of the attorney for the attaching creditor.

AUCHMOODY v. CITY OF MANHATTAN BEACH. (Civ. 3682.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 2, 1921.)

1. Waters and water courses ⚡263 — Complaint held sufficient as against general demurrer.

A complaint, in an action against a city for damages for failure to furnish water for agricultural purposes, which alleged in one count that the plaintiff demanded the water from the defendant and was ready, able, and willing and offered to pay therefor, and that at the time in question the defendant "was well able to deliver and did deliver to the immediate neighbors of the said plaintiff and to the residents of the said city of M. in general, except the said plaintiff herein, as aforesaid, a sufficient and adequate supply of water," was sufficient as against a general demurrer that the complaint did not in either count thereof state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

2. Waters and water courses ⚡263—Evidence held to show existence of water supply sufficient to have met plaintiff's requirements.

In an action against a city for damages for failure to furnish water for agricultural purposes, evidence that water company for four years had furnished the water required for plaintiff's purposes was sufficient prima facie to warrant finding that the city could have continued to furnish to plaintiff the same supply, and that the failure so to do resulted from some fault of the defendant; the latter having taken over the water mains of the water company and having the right to purchase water from the company at wholesale "through the capacity" of mains owned by the company.

3. Waters and water courses ⚡263—Evidence held sufficient to show negligence in not furnishing water for agricultural purposes.

In an action against a city for failure to furnish water for agricultural purposes, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that the city was negligent in failing to furnish an adequate supply during the period in question.

4. Waters and water courses ⚡263—Losses from failure to furnish water held not speculative.

In an action against a city to recover damages for negligent failure to furnish water during a certain period, damages to crops and chickens, consisting in the depreciation or destruction of value of property actually in existence, were not speculative, and therefore recovery was properly permitted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Clara L. Auchmoody against the City of Manhattan Beach. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank L. Perry, of Redondo Beach, for appellant.

Carnahan & Clark, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. From the year 1908, and at all times thereafter to and including the time of the transactions covered by this action, the plaintiff was the owner of a tract of land, containing about 12 acres, within the city of Manhattan Beach, a municipal corporation of the sixth class. During more than four years immediately preceding July, 1914, the Hermosa Beach Water Company, a public utility corporation, was engaged in furnishing water through a distributing system established by it, supplying practically all of the consumers of water within the corporate limits of defendant city, together with consumers situated outside of said city. During all of that time, and until the 1st day of July, 1914, the plaintiff received from the water company an adequate supply of water for domestic, agricultural, and horticultural needs upon said property. Plaintiff had improved her lands by setting out thereon eight acres of various kinds of orchard trees, as well as annual crops of agricultural and garden products. On the 1st day of July, 1914, these trees were in normal growing condition.

Prior to the 1st day of July, 1914, the defendant was authorized to and did construct and install a municipal water system for the purpose of furnishing an adequate supply of water for domestic, agricultural, and horticultural needs to practically all water consumers, including the plaintiff, within the corporate limits of the city, and, with the approval of the railroad commission of the state of California, entered into a contract in writing with the water company whereby the defendant assumed the service of said consumers situated within its corporate limits, including the plaintiff, commencing with the 1st day of July, 1914, at which time it was agreed that the water company should withdraw from the city of Manhattan Beach and discontinue the service of water to any of said consumers. By the terms of that contract the city obtained the right to purchase water from the company at wholesale "through the capacity" of mains then owned by the company delivering water to the city limits, such water to be furnished at a price stated in the contract. The city intended to obtain its primary source of water supply from a well put down by the city within the corporate limits. The contract right to purchase from the water company was relied upon to furnish a secondary supply to the extent that it should be needed by the city.

In this action the plaintiff seeks to recover damages caused to her property resulting from neglect, failure, and refusal of the defendant to deliver an adequate and sufficient supply of water at the premises described in the complaint. The first cause of action stated in the amended complaint relates to the alleged negligent failure of the defendant to furnish an adequate supply of water to the plaintiff during the first nine days of July, 1914, and the resulting damage to the plaintiff's crops, trees, and to a large number of chickens kept by the plaintiff upon said premises. The second count is for additional damages suffered by reason of the further neglect and failure of the defendant to furnish an adequate supply of water to the plaintiff from the 9th day of July to the 8th day of October, 1914. The findings of the court are in accordance with the facts above stated. The court further found that at all of said times beginning with the 1st day of July, 1914, the defendant, with the exercise of ordinary care, skill, and diligence in the management and operation of said water system, was able to furnish to plaintiff and to all other consumers upon its said water system an adequate supply of water to meet all of their reasonable domestic, agricultural, and horticultural needs; that by reason of the failure of the defendant to furnish such adequate supply to the plaintiff, almost all of plaintiff's chickens died, her cantaloupe vines and pepper plants died, a very large portion of the trees upon her premises died, and a very large portion of the remaining trees thereon were stunted and delayed in their normal maturity from one to three years; that by reason of the injuries so suffered, the plaintiff suffered damages in the sum of $2,090. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

[1] The defendant presented a general demurrer to each count of the complaint. It is now contended that the court erred in overruling that demurrer. It is first suggested that in the first count the plaintiff did not allege that she offered or tendered in money the established water rates of the city. In said first count it was stated that the plaintiff demanded said water from the defendant, and was ready, able, and willing, and did offer to pay therefor. Next it is suggested that the second count fails to show that the defendant had the ability to furnish the plaintiff with water from July 9, 1914, to October 8, 1914. In the second count we find that it was alleged that during all of said period of time the defendant "was well able to deliver and did deliver to the immediate neighbors of the said plaintiff and to the residents of the said city of Manhattan Beach in general except the said plaintiff herein, as aforesaid, a sufficient and adequate supply of water." We think that as against a general demurrer, which only suggests that the complaint did not, in either count thereof, state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, the complaint was sufficient.

Appellant contends that the damages sustained by plaintiff, as stated in the first count of the complaint, were the result of her own act in that she prevented the city from installing a meter connection in front of her property and making a water connection to that property. We have examined those portions of the evidence to which counsel have referred in support of their position. From this evidence it appears that the plaintiff objected to the attempt made to install a five-eighths-inch meter in front of her property and a five-eighths-inch pipe connection, and claimed that she was entitled to have, as she had theretofore had, a larger meter and larger water connection. That she was so entitled appears to have been conceded by the city. The evidence merely shows objection and protest made by the plaintiff, but not any act, forcible or otherwise, actually preventing the installation as attempted.

[2] The next claim is that the evidence is insufficient to show negligence on the part of the defendant. It is conceded that, in order to recover, the plaintiff must show negligence on the part of the defendant. The evidence did prove the existence of a water supply adequate and sufficient to have met plaintiff's requirements. The fact that the Hermosa Beach Water Company continuously for four years prior to that time had furnished this required amount of water to the plaintiff's premises, taken together with the other facts to which we have referred, was sufficient prima facie to warrant the court in determining that the defendant, in the ordinary course of its business, could have continued to furnish to the plaintiff the same supply which she had theretofore received, and that the failure so to do resulted from some fault of the defendant.

[3] To fully exhibit the situation as shown by the evidence would require a longer description than should be made here of the distributing system of the city and of the physical conditions under which the water was distributed. Suffice it to say that the city contained a section of high ground, which included the lands of the plaintiff, and that there were other lower areas near the ocean; and that the city attempted to supply the higher ground by gravity flow from a high tank to which water was to be pumped from a reservoir situated on lower ground. Some time in July the "booster pump" used to force water to the high tank broke down and there was considerable delay in restoring that means of supply to the high tank. There is evidence tending to prove that the defendant could have obtained from the Hermosa Beach Water Company, from a high tank of that company, a supply of water which could have been connected with the distributing system of the defendant in such manner that the city could have continued to furnish an adequate supply of water to the plaintiff. The water company was willing to furnish this water, but the representatives of that company and of the city did not come to an agreement covering the expense of making certain necessary additions to the pipe line. We think that the court was warranted in determining that the city did not make any sufficient effort to obtain this substitute water supply, and in finding that defendant's failure to furnish to plaintiff an adequate supply of water during the entire period of time covered by the complaint was negligent and without cause.

Concerning the amount of damages awarded, appellant claims that the evidence shows that the plaintiff received sufficient water for all ordinary needs; that the court erred in allowing the sum of $500 as damages for destruction of chickens which the plaintiff had on said premises; that the sum of $690 damages awarded for the destruction of plaintiff's pepper crop was an award of speculative damages not allowed by law. So far as the facts are concerned, there is sufficient evidence to support the court's finding that these losses were incurred, and that they were the proximate result of defendant's failure to furnish the necessary supply of water.

[4] The damages were not speculative in their nature, but they represented actual detriment caused by defendant's breach of its obligation. Appellant relies upon certain decisions which have held that where damages are claimed for refusal to furnish water upon land the true measure of damages must be determined by ascertaining the difference between the rental value of the land with water and its rental value without water. Crow v. San Joaquin Irr. Co., 130 Cal. 309, 62 Pac. 562, 1058; Fresno Canal & Irr. Co. v. Perrin, 170 Cal. 411, 149 Pac. 805. These were cases in which the plaintiff attempted to prove that he would have raised certain kinds of crops and that he would have obtained certain profits therefrom if he had received the supply of water to which he was entitled. As was said by the court in Pallett v. Murphy, 131 Cal. 192, 63 Pac. 366:

"Evidence as to the value of a possible crop that might be grown with the use of water would be as purely speculative as could well be imagined."

But in the present case the losses incurred consist in the depreciation or destruction of value of property actually in existence. These losses were capable of ascertainment by direct evidence, and were not at all speculative in their nature. Under these circumstances, the loss of chickens which died, and the loss of the growing crops which were destroyed, were of such a nature that recovery can be had therefor. Teller v. Bay & River Dredging Co., 151 Cal. 209, 90 Pac. 942, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 267, 12 Ann. Cas. 779.

The judgment is affirmed.

(Civ. 3819.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 21, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 19, 1921.)

1. Railroads ⇨401(9) — Instruction on last clear chance held justified.

In an action for damages arising out of death on track, held, under the evidence, that court properly instructed on the doctrine of last clear chance.

2. Trial ⇨295(1) — Instructions read together.

Instructions should all be read together in determining whether or not certain ones were erroneous.

3. Railroads ⇨400(10) — Workman's contributory negligence in failing to flag train held for jury.

Omission of one working on a crane on a railroad track to place red flags several hundred feet distant from the crane, between it and any approaching train, a duty imposed upon him, although a fact which, with other facts, may be considered by the jury as showing contributory negligence, did not constitute contributory negligence as matter of law.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1048(5) — Question to witness not prejudicial in view of answer.

In action against railroad for death of one employed by a gravel company on a crane standing on defendant's track, question to clerk for the gravel company, "Did you ever hear any objection made by any one connected with that train crew to the use of the outer tracks by the gravel company?" could not have prejudiced the defendant where the witness answered "No."

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

5. Railroads ⇨401(9) — Instructions on last clear chance held substantially correct.

In an action against a railroad to recover damages for death on track, instructions as to the doctrine of last clear chance held not substantially erroneous.

6. Railroads ⇨401(9) — Knowledge held to warrant instruction on last clear chance doctrine.

Actual knowledge by defendant railroad of a crane upon its track, engaged in loading gravel into cars, imputed knowledge to defendant's train crew of the presence of employees in the vicinity of such crane, and court did not err in submitting last clear chance doctrine to jury in action for death of a servant who was not seen by defendant's train crew.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by the London Guarantee & Accident Company, Limited, against the Southern Pacific Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed in District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

A. A. Moore and Stanley Moore, both of San Francisco (Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Walter H. Linforth, of San Francisco, and E. Nusbaumer, of Oakland, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. On the 12th day of April, 1916, one Frank Rodrigues met injuries resulting in his death during the course of his employment by the Niles Sand, Gravel & Rock Company. Plaintiff was the insurance carrier of the employer of the deceased, and under the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831), being subrogated to the rights of the heirs at law of Rodrigues, brought this action for damages, alleging that, through the negligent operation of one of its trains, the defendant was responsible for the death of the deceased. A verdict was arrived at in plaintiff's favor, and it is from the resultant judgment that this appeal was taken.

The Niles Sand, Gravel & Rock Company, at the time of the accident in question, maintained a gravel pit in the bed of Niles Creek. In this pit were three railroad tracks, two being commonly known as industrial spur tracks, and one the main track of the defendant. The tracks were so constructed that cars could be switched from one to the other. The main track approached the gravel pit on a descending grade of about 1 per cent. and on a curve of about 9 degrees. All of the tracks were maintained by the defendant. In the course of its operations the gravel company used a crane to load cars in the pit. This crane was operated by a steam engine mounted on something similar to a flat car. It had two trucks under it, and it could be moved by its own power. Its engine house extended approximately 14 feet above the tracks. The top of the crane at ordinary slant was about 30 feet above the track. At the time of the accident the crane, together with one gondola car, were located on the main track. The engine operating the crane had steam up, and the crane had been in position and at work for a few hours. At the time of the accident the deceased was on the ground on the opposite side of the crane from which the defendant's train approached. At the corner of the platform of the crane, on the same end of the car, was the brake on the crane. That brake was an appliance consisting of a wheel set horizontally, and which could be operated only by using a bar. To operate the same most effectively the operator should stand on the ground astride of one of the rails. The deceased was the brakeman in charge. No witnesses observed the position of the deceased immediately before the impact.

At the time of the accident one of the defendant's trains, consisting of an engine and six loaded gravel cars, proceeded down the track toward the pit. The fireman was handling the throttle while being seated in the engineer's place, and the engineer was seated in the fireman's place. The air brakes of the train were disconnected. There was the testimony of two or more witnesses to the effect that the location of the crane could be seen from a point opposite the water tank about 400 feet up the track.

When the gravel train arrived at the pit the train struck the gondola car attached to the crane, shoving both of them forward 72 feet, and upon examination it was found that the deceased had been run over by the front wheels of the front truck. The appellant does not claim that the defendant was not negligent, but contends: First, that the last clear chance doctrine under the pleadings and under the proof had no place in the record; second, that the instructions that were given on the doctrine of the last clear chance were in themselves erroneous statements of the law; third, that the evidence as a matter of law shows the deceased to have been guilty of contributory negligence; fourth, error in the admission of certain evidence relative to notice from the defendant not to use the main track.

[1] On the appeal the defendant does not even claim that it was not negligent. It contends with much earnestness that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. In the face of these two propositions, it is patent that we are very close to the usual contention that the doctrine of last clear chance is involved. And when we consider certain other facts which were developed on the trial, and which are stated below, it becomes manifest that the plaintiff, at least, had the right to have the jury instructed on the doctrine of last clear chance. Some of those reasons will appear as we proceed, but, considering the whole record, we think that it was altogether proper that the court instructed on that doctrine.

[2] The second contention—that the instructions given on the doctrine of last clear chance were in themselves erroneous—is without foundation. It is fundamental law that the instructions should all be read together. As so read, instructions 13, 14, and 15 were correct, and clear expressions of that doctrine. They were as follows:

"Where one has placed himself in a dangerous position, and another has actual knowledge of his dangerous situation, and has a clear opportunity by the exercise of proper care to avoid injuring him, he must do so, notwithstanding the injured person has placed himself in such situation of danger by his own negligence.

"In other words, if you find the decedent, Frank Rodrigues, in working around and about the crane in question, at and immediately prior to the happening of the accident, if you find he was so working around and about said crane, had placed himself in a dangerous position, notwithstanding this fact, if you further find the employees of the defendant, Southern Pacific Company, in charge of the train in question, knew of the existence of said crane upon said track, and knew of such position of deceased in time, by the exercise of proper care, to have brought said train to a stop and avoid said collision, and did not do so, then I charge you the defendant, Southern Pacific Company, is responsible for the death of the decedent, Frank Rodrigues, and your verdict should be in favor of the plaintiff.

"Even though you find that the Niles Sand, Gravel & Rock Company had no right to have its crane upon the track in question, and that by doing so it and its employee, the decedent, Frank Rodrigues, was guilty of negligence in so doing, then I charge you if the defendant, Southern Pacific Company in the operation of its train in question, knew of the existence of the crane upon the track in question in time to have stopped and avoided the collision, and had the last clear opportunity of avoiding the accident, and if by the use of reasonable care, after its employees observed the said crane upon the said track, it could have brought its train to a standstill in time to avoid the collision in question, and did not do so, it is solely responsible for the accident and the consequent death of the decedent, Frank Rodrigues, provided you find that without negligence on his part, at the time of the accident in question, he was at a place where, in the discharge of his duties as brakeman of the Niles Sand, Gravel & Rock Company, he was required to be, and under these facts, if you so find, your verdict should be against the defendant, Southern Pacific Company, and in favor of the plaintiff.

"If the engineer and fireman, or either of them, in charge of the train in question, knew of the existence of the said crane upon said track, and by the use and exercise of proper care could have brought the said train to a stop in time to have avoided colliding with and striking said crane, or the gondola car on the rear thereof, and therefore had a last clear opportunity of avoiding the collision in question, and did not do so, then it matters not whether the said crane was rightfully or wrongfully upon said track, and your verdict should be against the defendant, Southern Pacific Company, and in favor of the plaintiff, provided you find that at the time of the accident Frank Rodrigues was at place where his duties as employee of the Niles Sand, Gravel & Rock Company required him to be, and that solely by reason of the said collision the said decedent, Frank Rodrigues, sustained injuries which resulted in his death."

[3] The appellant's third contention is that the evidence, as a matter of law, shows the deceased had been guilty of contributory negligence. This contention is founded on the fact that the employer of the deceased had furnished the crew of the crane with red flags, and that the duty of placing the flags had been imposed on the decedent. The plan was that a red flag should be placed between the railroad rails several hundred feet distant from the crane, and between it and any approaching train. At the time of the accident the decedent had failed so to place the flags. This fact was a fact which, with other facts, might be considered by the jury as showing contributory negligence, but the omission, of itself, did not constitute contributory negligence as a matter of law.

[4] The witness Duffy had stated that he had worked at the pit as shipping clerk for the gravel company. He stated that during the years he was there the gravel company used all three of the tracks daily. On certain occasions while they were using the tracks the defendant's train came in.

"Q. Did you ever hear any objection made by any one connected with that train crew to the use of the outer tracks by the Niles Sand & Gravel Company?

"Mr. Ford: I object to it as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, not a matter which the train crew could consent to, or give the Niles Sand & Gravel Company any right by its consent or otherwise.

"The Court: The objection is overruled.

"A. No, sir."

Had the witness made a different answer, the answer might have been prejudicial, but the particular answer given by the witness at the most can merely be said to be immaterial. There are probably several thousand people not called who would have given the same answer, but such answers would lead nowhere. The slightest consent or the slightest objection on the part of an officer of the defendant, having authority to speak on the subject, of course, would be otherwise. The superintendent saw the crane using the outer track, and made no objection.

Appellant's brief contains a great deal which goes to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury as based on the doctrine of last clear chance. It will be noted, that the appellant's points, as stated by them, and as quoted above, hardly present that question, however their record on appeal does present the question. The appellant contends with much vigor that the record does not show that the defendant's trainmen actually saw the deceased in a place of danger. That may be true; however, the record does show that the crane was in a place where it could be seen 500 feet up the track, that the steam was issuing from the top of the pipe leading from the engine, and that the fireman who was operating the engine realized that the crane was in his way when he was at the switch 450 feet from the crane. He testified that he had the straight air on and the emergency air when he was 250 feet away. He also testified that the train was under his control at all times. In view of these facts it cannot be said that there was no evidence to support the case of the plaintiff on the doctrine of last clear chance. Furthermore, during the trial of the case, the questions of counsel for the plaintiff and of counsel for the defendant indicate that they both considered that the doctrine of last clear chance was involved in the case, and both sides tendered instructions on that theory. The court did not err in instructing the jury on that theory.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank, Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [5, 6] The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 2, is denied.

In view of the circumstances of this case, as shown by the evidence, we think that there was no substantial error in the instructions on the issue of the last clear chance. In other words, we are of the opinion that, under such circumstances, actual knowledge of the position of the crane imputed knowledge of the presence of such employees as were engaged thereon.

PEOPLE v. MARTIN. (Cr. 793.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 26, 1921.)

1. Embezzlement — 8—Transfer of property to secure debt does not pass title.

A bill of sale by lessor of an automobile to a bank to secure a debt did not pass title in the automobile to the bank, and in a prosecution of the lessee for embezzlement of the automobile ownership was properly alleged in lessor.

2. Statutes — 118(1)—Title held not insufficient.

Pen. Code, § 504a, as added by St. 1917, p. 273, making one guilty of embezzlement who fraudulently removes, conceals, or disposes of goods, is not void under Const. art. 4, § 24, by reason of insufficiency in its title.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Ed. R. Martin was convicted of embezzlement, his motion for new trial denied and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. A. Howell, and Allan Brant, both of San Diego, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant has appealed from a judgment convicting him of the crime of embezzlement and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Section 504a of the Penal Code was added to that Code by an act entitled:

"An act to add a new section to the Penal Code to be numbered five hundred four a, relating to the removal and disposal of leased property."

The section reads as follows:

"Every person who shall fraudulently remove, conceal or dispose of any goods, chattels or effects, leased or let to him by any instrument in writing, or any personal property or effects of another in his possession, under a contract of purchase not yet fulfilled, and any person in possession of such goods, chattels, or effects knowing them to be subject to such lease or contract of purchase who shall so remove, conceal or dispose of the same with intent to injure or defraud the lessor or owner thereof, is guilty of embezzlement." Stats. 1917, p. 273.

As stated in the information, the defendant was charged with a crime of embezzlement in that he did, with intent to defraud W. B. Conniry, remove, conceal, and dispose of a described automobile, the personal property of Conniry, which had been leased to defendant by Conniry. Two grounds of appeal have been presented in argument: (a) Variance between the proof and the charge in the information, in that the evidence proved that the ownership of the automobile was not in Conniry and that the offense, if committed at all by the defendant, was not committed in the county of San Diego; (b) that the above-mentioned section of the Penal Code is unconstitutional because its adoption was in violation of section 24, art. 4, of the state Constitution, which provides that every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title.

[1] The evidence, which was unconflicting on this point, proved that after Conniry had delivered the automobile to defendant on the lease contract, and before the time when defendant is alleged to have committed the crime, Conniry executed and delivered to the First National Bank of San Diego a bill of sale of the automobile. But it further appeared that this bill of sale was given to the bank as security for money advanced as a loan to Conniry by the bank on the contract. If the jury believed this testimony

(and it is undisputed), the only proper conclusion to be drawn was that Conniry remained owner of the automobile. Where a transfer of property is made in form sufficient to convey title, but the instrument was made only to secure a debt, it does not pass title. Smith v. Smith, 80 Cal. 323, 21 Pac. 4, 22 Pac. 186, 549; Shattuck & Desmond, etc., Co. v. Gillelen, 154 Cal. 778, 784, 99 Pac. 348.

The defendant testified that at the time when he drove the automobile out of San Diego county he had not any intention to conceal it or take it away from Southern California, and that he did not decide to take the property out of the state, or to sell it, until after he had left San Diego county. But there were abundant circumstances in evidence upon which the jury was authorized to determine that the intent to commit the offense existed at the time when defendant removed the property from San Diego county.

[2] The contention that the statute by which section 504a of the Penal Code was enacted is void by reason of insufficiency in its title is entirely without merit. Deyoe v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 476, 488, 74 Pac. 28, 98 Am. St. Rep. 73.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

RAUER v. FERNANDO NELSON & SONS.
(Civ. 3658.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 29, 1921. Rehearing Denied Sept. 26, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 26, 1921.)

1. Corporations ⚡402—Corporation held liable on president's contract not purporting to be its contract.

A contract to pay owner of excavating equipment a certain rental for use thereof, made by the president of the corporation owning the land being graded, held the contract of the corporation, though it was signed by the president without purporting on its face to be the corporation's contract.

2. Corporations ⚡425(4)—Liability on contracts made by officers and agents within apparent authority.

A corporation which suffers appearances to exist and its officers and agents to so act as to give one dealing with it reason to believe that he is dealing with the company is liable on the contract made by such officers and agents.

3. Corporations ⚡426(10)—Liability on contract of president after receiving benefit thereof.

A corporation, having benefited by the contract entered into by its president, not purporting on its face to be the contract of the corporation, was liable thereon.

4. Assignments ⚡31—Land owner finishing contract liable to pay rental for equipment let to contractor.

Where owner of excavating equipment being used by grading contractor under rental agreement threatened, on contractor's default in payment of rental, to take equipment off job unless he was paid for the use thereof, a corporation owning the land being graded, which had assumed control of the contract, and was paying all the bills, and advancing the money for doing the work, was liable on its contract with the owner of such equipment to pay monthly rental for use thereof, entered into in order to prevent the work being stopped, though on completion of the work it was not indebted to the contractor; the doctrine that an owner's acceptance of contractor's assignment in favor of subcontractor binds the owner to pay the assignee only if there is money coming to the assignor not being applicable.

5. Appeal and error ⚡878(6), 1033(8)—Insufficiency of judgment for plaintiff not ground for reversal in absence of appeal by plaintiff.

Judgment giving plaintiff insufficient relief will be affirmed on defendant's appeal therefrom, where plaintiff has not appealed since plaintiff, by failure to appeal, acquiesced therein, and since defendant has no ground for complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John T. Nourse, Judge.

Action by J. J. Rauer against Fernando Nelson & Sons. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco (C. J. Goodell, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The defendant, Fernando Nelson & Sons, appeals from a judgment in plaintiff's favor. The action was commenced by the plaintiff to recover the sum of $5,532.10, alleged to be due from the defendants upon a written contract, dated October 16, 1917, whereby Fernando Nelson & Sons and A. E. Buckman agreed to pay to respondent the sum of $680 per month as rental for certain sand machines, cars, rails, and wire used by Buckman in excavating and filling certain property under a contract with appellant. The complaint was in the form usual in actions to foreclose a mechanic's lien, and prayed that the amount sued for be adjudged a lien upon the land of the defendant Nelson & Sons upon which the work was done by Buckman. After the testimony was in, plaintiff filed an amended complaint to conform to proof, based upon an implied contract for the reasonable rental value of the equipment and the defendants Fernando Nelson, individually, and A. E. Buckman, were dropped from the case.

Early in 1917, Buckman, as contractor, started the work of excavating, and filling blocks and streets of a tract of land of about 50 acres at the west portal of the Twin Peaks tunnel in San Francisco under a contract with Fernando Nelson & Sons, the owner. He agreed to do the work for 17 cents per yard, and it was provided in the contract that he should, at his own cost, furnish all the materials and equipment necessary to perform his contract. Monthly payments were to be made as the work progressed. Shortly after engaging in the work Buckman found himself financially embarrassed, and appellant from that time on paid all the bills, with apparent disregard of the stipulation of the contract relating to payments.

The equipment used in the work, consisting of sand machines, cars, wire, rails, and tools belonging to this respondent Rauer. Buckman had possession under an agreement of purchase which permitted him to pay for it as he could. In October Rauer went to Fernando Nelson, the president of appellant, and complained that he was getting no money from Buckman for the outfit. He threatened to take the equipment off the job unless he had some assurance that he would be paid for its use. Nelson insisted that Rauer and Buckman adjust their troubles. Buckman thereupon in writing assigned to Rauer all moneys due, or to become due, him from Fernando Nelson & Sons for work and labor done, materials furnished, and for grading the property. As part of the settlement Nelson signed the following agreement:

"San Francisco, Oct. 16, 1917.

"J. J. Rauer: Your assignment of A. E. Buckman, received. As my conversation—I will agree to hold out for you $680 per month being the amount use of track, sand machine from Oct. 1, 1917, until such time rail, etc., is taken away. [Signed] Fernando Nelson."

Nelson testified that he signed this paper in his personal capacity, "not wanting to hold the corporation responsible for anything of that sort," and that he would pay it out of his own pocket rather than for the work to stop. On the day following, Buckman and Rauer executed another agreement in which it was stipulated that, in making the assignment, it was understood that it did not cover any money due for labor or material expended on the work, but covered any money due for rent of the plant, or "surplus money coming to said Buckman after all labor and bills are paid," and was to be applied on the purchase of plant as theretofore agreed between Rauer and Buckman. Whether appellant had notice of this document does not appear.

There is a very material conflict in the evidence as to what occurred at the meeting of Nelson, Rauer, and Buckman, and as to what the final understanding of the parties was. The testimony of Rauer and Buckman is to the effect that it was definitely understood, at the time the assignment was accepted by Fernando Nelson for the defendant, Fernando Nelson & Sons, that the agreement was that that defendant should pay the sum of $680 per month for the rent of the plant as stipulated in the writing, and that Fernando Nelson, during the conversation concerning the matter, expressly agreed to pay that amount. They insist that one payment of $680, made by the appellant, about one month after the agreement was signed, was actually paid in accordance with the terms of the settlement as fully understood by the parties at the time. The respondent based his complaint and his right to recover on such agreement and understanding. Fernando Nelson is equally positive in his testimony that, in no conversation, or at any time, was the subject of a monthly payment of $680 mentioned, and that the first intimation he had of the claim of the respondent to that effect was when the contract was read in his office some time later. His position is that his only agreement was to "hold out" $680 and pay it to Rauer at the end of the job, whether there was anything coming to Buckman or not; that before the work was completed he paid the amount, less a 2 per cent. discount, at Rauer's request to enable Buckman to buy a new chain.

The work of grading and filling was completed on July 20, 1918. 203,967 cubic yards of material were moved, which, at the agreed price of 17 cents per cubic yard, called for a payment of $34,674.39. As a matter of fact, appellant paid $63,605.93, or $28,931.54 in excess of the contract price.

On this evidence the trial court found that appellant and respondent entered into a written contract whereby the appellant agreed to pay respondent $680 per month as rental for the equipment; that, although the appellant agreed to pay the sum of $680 per month, under which price there would be due $6,210, the price was actually agreed upon through mistake; that, irrespective of said written contract, however, plaintiff furnished to Nelson & Sons the equipment at its special instance and request, and that the reasonable worth or value of its use was the sum of $475 per month. The court refused to accord plaintiff a lien, but entered judgment in his favor against appellant in the sum of $3,655. From this judgment Fernando Nelson & Sons appeal.

[1-3] We are satisfied that the lower court was correct in holding that the agreement entered into between Fernando Nelson and Rauer was in reality the contract of the corporation, and that it was properly admitted as part of defendant's case. Because the agreement does not purport on its face to be signed by Fernando Nelson as president of Nelson & Sons, appellant contends that the court erred in admitting it in evidence. Nelson was representing the appellant in all matters connected with the transaction, and the writing falls within the rule that a corporation which suffers appearances to exist, and its officers and agents to so act as to give one dealing with it reason to believe that he is dealing with the company, the corporation is liable. Ageltinger v. Burke, 176 Cal. 621, 627, 169 Pac. 373. Furthermore, appellant received the benefit of the contract, in that the work of improving its property was not hindered.

[4] Because the total amount paid out was greatly in excess of the contract price for the work, appellant contends that the case falls within the doctrine that, where an assignment in favor of a subcontractor or other person is drawn by a contractor upon an owner, and accepted by him, it is conditional, and not absolute, and binds the owner to pay the assignee only if, and when, there is money coming to the assignor. But this contract differs from those considered in the cases cited by the appellant, for which reason the authorities are not in point. Here the promise is much more than a mere acceptance of an assignment. It was made directly by the debtor in order to prevent the work being stopped. At the time it was made appellant was advancing all money for doing the work, was paying all bills, and had apparently assumed control of the contract with Buckman. If, under such circumstances, it agreed to pay a monthly rental for the use of the equipment by Buckman, whom it had to all intents released from liability under his contract, rather than have the work impeded, it may not now avoid its agreement simply because there is nothing due Buckman. There is evidence to support the trial court's finding that Rauer threatened to take the equipment off the job unless he knew he would get his money. It does not seem unreasonable that appellant would agree to pay for its use. On the conflicting evidence the court found that, from and after the date of the settlement between the parties, the equipment was furnished by respondent to appellant at its special instance and request. That situation entirely removes the agreement from the theory advanced by appellant.

[5] The appellant contends that the finding that it entered into the agreement to pay $680 per month for the use of the grading equipment by mistake, is not supported by the evidence. We think this is so, and, further, there is no issue upon which the finding can rest. From our reading of the record we are of the view that the respondent was entitled to the sum of $680 per month for the use of the plant, or nothing. That amount would be the sum of $6,210. The trial court by virtue of its finding as to the mistake of the parties, has reduced the judgment to $3,655. The plaintiff has acquiesced in the judgment by not appealing, and the defendant has no ground for complaint therefor. Larkin v. Mullen, 128 Cal. 449-455, 60 Pac. 1091; Blood v. Munn, 155 Cal. 228-236, 100 Pac. 694. It may be that some of the findings of the court on other matters are not correct, but they are immaterial. The judgment rests upon sufficient facts, amply supported.

The judgment is affirmed.

LOS ANGELES GAS & ELECTRIC CORPORATION v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 3455.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 29, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 26, 1921.)

1. Dismissal and nonsuit ⇐2—Statute encourages voluntary dismissals.

Code Civ. Proc. § 581, is grounded upon the policy of encouraging voluntary dismissals, and covers all plaintiffs not coming within the exception stated there, unless there exists in some other statute something explicit removing the operation of such section.

2. Action ⇐59—Consolidation held not to prevent dismissal by plaintiff in one.

Where servant of gas company, injured through alleged negligence of street railway, obtained an award of compensation as against the gas company, and then sued the street railway for damages, and the gas company also sued the railway, seeking damages because of the payment of the award, that the two causes were consolidated, as required by Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, § 26, as amended by St. 1919, p. 920, did not prevent the gas company from voluntarily dismissing its cause under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 1, in absence of counterclaim or prayer for affirmative relief.

3. Prohibition ⇐10(2)—Lies to restrain proceedings by court in a consolidated cause sought to be dismissed.

Where employee of gas company injured through negligence of street railway obtained an award of compensation against the gas company and sued the street railway for damages, and the gas company also sued the street railway for damages because of the payment of the amount of the award, and the causes were consolidated under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, § 26, as amended by St. 1919, p. 920, and court refused at gas company's request to dismiss its cause under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 1, further proceedings in the gas company's action could be prevented by prohibition, as against an objection that the effort of either to withdraw from the case would leave the court with the same "jurisdiction" over the case, not only as to the party still prosecuting, but also as to the party seeking to dismiss, in that the court would have the entire subject-matter and all the parties before it; and the question was not affected by a defense of contributory negligence set up in the answer to the complaint in the gas company's action.

Application by the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation for a writ of prohibition prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of Los Angeles and Hon. Charles Monroe, Judge of said Court. Writ granted.

Paul Overton and S. W. Guthrie, both of Los Angeles, Samuel Poorman, Jr., and Herbert J. Goudge, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Frank Karr, R. O. Gortner, and W. R. Millar, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, J. One Milosevich, while engaged in laying a gas main for petitioner in a public street, was killed by a car operated by Pacific Electric Railway Company. The widow of Milosevich brought suit against the railway company for damages for his death, alleging that her loss resulted through the negligence of those operating the car. The petitioner paid to the widow a sum of money under an award of the Industrial Accident Commission, in a proceeding instituted before that body on account of the death of the husband. A short time after the widow commenced her action against the railway company petitioner filed suit against that corporation, seeking damages because of the payment of the amount of the award. Under the provisions of section 26 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (Stats. 1919, p. 920; Deering's Codes and Gen. Laws, Consol. Supp. 1917-19, p. 1410), the full text of which section appears below, the two actions were consolidated. Immediately before the day on which the consolidated causes were to be tried petitioner filed with the clerk of respondent court a request for a dismissal of the action instituted by it, complying in all respects with the terms of subdivision 1 of section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to the effect that an action "may be dismissed: * * * By the plaintiff, * * * by written request to the clerk, filed with the papers in the case, at any time before the trial, * * * provided, a counterclaim has not been set up, or affirmative relief sought by the cross-complaint or answer of the defendant." In the action thus attempted to be dismissed no counterclaim was presented, nor was any affirmative relief asked by the defendant. The clerk, upon the filing of the request for a dismissal, entered a dismissal of the action in his register of actions. Upon the day on which the consolidated actions were to have been tried the railway company moved that the dismissal of petitioner's action be vacated. Respondent court granted the motion and ordered the trial of both actions, whereupon petitioner instituted this proceeding to compel respondent to desist from the exercise of further jurisdiction in the dismissed action, and an alternative writ of prohibition was issued. The matter is now before us on the question whether the writ shall be made peremptory.

[1] Respondents contend that an action may not be dismissed where it has been consolidated with another action pursuant to the terms of section 26 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act. If that claim may be upheld, we are presented with an unusual condition of affairs. A defendant may be kept in court, when once brought in through proper steps taken to acquire jurisdiction over him, and there is manifest justice in the idea that a plaintiff may be placed in the same position by the interposition of a counterclaim against him, or by a prayer of the defendant for affirmative relief. Consequently such a case is excepted from the operation of subdivision 1 of section 581, Code of Civil Procedure. It is the policy of government, however, to discourage, rather than to encourage, litigation, and that policy is subserved by permitting the voluntary departure from court of one who voluntarily comes into court. As section 581 is grounded upon such a policy, and as, by its terms at least, it covers all plaintiffs not coming within the exception above stated, we must find something direct and explicit in section 26 of the Workmen's Compensation Act before we can say that petitioner is removed from the operation of section 581, and that the position of respondents is justified. Section 26 follows:

"The term 'employee,' as used in this section, shall include the person injured and any other person in whom a claim may arise by reason of the injury or death of such injured person. The death of the employee, or of any other person, shall not abate any right of action established by this section. The claim of an employee for compensation shall not affect his right of action for damages arising out of injury or death against any person other than the employer; and any employer having paid, or having become obligated to pay, compensation, may likewise bring an action against such other person to recover said damages. If either such employee, or such employer shall bring such action against such third person, he shall forthwith notify the other in writing, by personal service or registered mail, of such fact, and of the name of the court in which such suit is brought, filing proof thereof in such action, and, if the action be brought by either, the other may, at any time before trial on the facts, join as party plaintiff or must consolidate his action, if brought independently,

If the suit be prosecuted by the employer alone evidence of any expenditures which the employer has paid or become obligated to pay by reason of said injury or death shall be admissible, and such expenditures shall be deemed a part of the damages, including a reasonable attorney's fee to be fixed by the court; and if in such suit the employer shall recover more than the amount he has paid or become obligated to pay as compensation he shall pay the excess to the injured employee or other person entitled. If the employee joins in or prosecutes such suit, evidence of the amount of disability, indemnity or death benefit paid by the employer shall not be admissible, but proof of all other expenditures on account of said injury or death shall be admissible and shall be deemed part of the damages. The court shall, on application, allow as a first lien against any judgment recovered by the employee the amount of the employer's expenditures for compensation. When any injury or death shall have been suffered by an employee, no release or settlement of any claim for damages by reason of such injury or death and no satisfaction of judgment in such proceedings, shall be valid without the written consent of either both employer and employee, or one of them, together with the consent of the commission or the court in which any such action may be pending."

[2] We scan the section in vain for a support for the position of respondents. By its language one situated as was petitioner after the payment of the award may maintain such an action as petitioner commenced against the railway company. If such an action is commenced, the section requires that it must be consolidated with any action commenced by one circumstanced as was the widow of Milosevich. We can perceive no support for respondents' position in the mere fact that a consolidation was required by the statute, or that one resulted under it. If actions are consolidated because of the mandate of a statute, because of the permission of a statute, or because of a stipulation of the parties, it appears to us that the status of the consolidated actions is the same. If the attitude of respondents were correct, then a dismissal of any action which is consolidated with others would be impossible through whatever means the consolidation was brought about. Section 1195 of the Code of Civil Procedure permits the consolidation of mechanics' lien cases, and it is almost the invariable practice to order a consolidation of such actions. Can it be that after a consolidation none of such cases may be dismissed? If one may not, neither may any number less than all. If ten such cases are consolidated—and more than that number are frequently brought together where large jobs are involved—nine may not be dismissed voluntarily by the respective plaintiffs if the tenth plaintiff elects not to dismiss. In resolving this question it must be remembered that the consolidation of actions is usually brought about solely for the purpose of avoiding repetitions of procedure and evidence, and for the economizing of time. We are at a loss to perceive any other reason behind the requirement for consolidation contained in section 26. We are convinced that petitioner was not prevented from dismissing its action by the fact that it was consolidated with another action. As in some degree supporting our conclusions, we cite the following authority for the general proposition that causes which have been consolidated are, for a variety of purposes, still to be considered as separate actions, the first of the cases being directly in point: Young v. Grand Trunk Ry. (C. C.) 9 Fed. 348; Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Jones, 49 Fed. 343, 1 C. C. A. 282; Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. v. Continental Trust Co., 95 Fed. 497, 36 C. C. A. 155; American Trust & Savs. Bank v. Zeigler Coal Co., 165 Fed. 34, 91 C. C. A. 72; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Hillmon, 145 U. S. 285, 12 Sup. Ct. 909, 36 L. Ed. 706; Cariaga v. Dryden, 29 Cal. 307; Harmon v. San Francisco & S. R. R. Co., 86 Cal. 617, 25 Pac. 124; Realty Construction & M. Co. v. Superior Court, 165 Cal. 543, 132 Pac. 1048; Los Angeles Pressed Brick Co. v. Higgins, 8 Cal. App. 514, 97 Pac. 414, 420.

[3] The next contention of respondents is based upon the assertion, made by them that under the statute governing the litigation inaugurated by the consolidated actions respondent court had jurisdiction to try and determine the petitioner's right of action at the suit of the widow alone. After this statement they say, reproducing their italics:

"The effort of either to withdraw from the case would leave the court with the same jurisdiction over the case, not only as to the party still prosecuting, but as to the other party who seeks to dismiss. Therefore there can be in such a situation no exceeding of jurisdiction by the trial court, for it has the entire subject-matter and all the parties still before it, to dispose of by judgment."

And after a page of argument they say, further:

"Petitioner must therefore admit that the trial court, in spite of the attempted dismissal, has the same jurisdiction it had before the dismissal, and must confess that its dismissal was not intended to deprive the court of jurisdiction to adjudge a recovery in its favor."

This matter is advanced in support of the claim that prohibition does not lie under the circumstances presented, for the reason that the writ issues only to curb an excess of jurisdiction. We are unable to follow this argument. Counsel, in presenting it, fail to distinguish between jurisdiction over a particular question or controversy and jurisdiction over a particular action. To say that respondent court had jurisdiction, in the action commenced by the widow, to pass upon the questions presented by the action instituted by petitioner, is far from saying that it had jurisdiction, because of that fact, over the latter action itself. If it attempted to retain and exercise jurisdiction over petitioner's action on such a ground, respondent court would exceed its jurisdiction, and such excess could be prevented by prohibition.

A goodly portion of the brief of respondents is devoted to a discussion of the effect upon the present controversy of a defense of contributory negligence which is set up in the answer to the complaint in petitioner's suit. In the midst of the argument of the question respondents say:

"A decision of the question now under discussion is not, we assume, necessary to a determination of the matter now before this honorable court; but we make this argument only in view of the possibility of the point being discussed by the members of the court."

In its reply brief petitioner concurs in the view that the argument in question is inapplicable to the present controversy. As we entertain the same view, we do not undertake a discussion of the point.

A peremptory writ of prohibition will issue as prayed for.

TORMEY et al. v. ANDERSON-COTTONWOOD IRR. DIST. (Civ. 2316.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 15, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 12, 1921.)

1. Waters and water courses — 263—Finding that certain allegation was untrue held negative pregnant.

A finding "that it is untrue that said defendant ever since the use by it of said canal or ditch for conducting water has negligently or carelessly or without right allowed said water or any water to flow to or upon the said lands or any lands of the plaintiffs," attempting to negative an affirmative allegation of a complaint, is in the nature of a negative pregnant and implies the truth of the allegation.

2. Waters and water courses — 263—Finding that defendant's seepage water did not flood land held contrary to evidence.

In an action to restrain owner of canal from permitting seepage water to flow upon the lands of plaintiff and for damages caused by such water, a finding that there was no seepage of water from defendant's canal held contrary to the evidence.

3. Waters and water courses — 262—Negligence to construct canal through loose gravel.

To knowingly construct a canal through loose sand or gravel incapable of holding water without taking any steps to prevent or control seepage therefrom constitutes negligence.

4. Waters and water courses — 262—Duty of owner of canal as to seepage waters.

If in the actual operation of a canal sudden and unexpected damage results from seepage by reason of some hidden defects which could not reasonably have been foreseen, the owner will not be liable in damages, being chargeable only in case of negligence, but after discovery of the defect and after reasonable opportunity to correct, if he continues the use, his liability for subsequent damages would be the same as if he had known of the defect at the time of construction.

5. Waters and water courses — 262—Landowners not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to increase capacity of drain.

Landowners near a canal were not negligent barring recovery of damages caused by flooding by seepage water by their failure to increase the capacity of a drain sufficient to carry off flooding caused from natural causes so as to carry off additional water seeping from defendant's canal.

6. Waters and water courses — 263 — Failure of injured party to exercise care to prevent damages from seepage from canal considered in mitigation of damage.

That landowners near a canal failed to use ordinary care to prevent injury to their crops after seepage water from the canal began to flow down upon their land may be considered in mitigation of damages, but, if by the exercise of such care they could have avoided the injury to their crops altogether, they would be entitled to recover as damages the reasonable expenditures made necessary by the additional water.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

7. Eminent domain — 112—Landowner injured by seepage water held entitled to damages regardless of negligence.

Owner of land damaged by water seeping from irrigation canal, constructed for public purposes and to serve the purpose of distribution of water to public use, is entitled to damages whether the irrigation district is negligent or not, in view of Const. art. 1, § 14, providing that private property shall not be damaged for public use, etc.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; J. E. Barber, Judge.

Action by William H. Tormey and another against the Anderson-Cottonwood Irrigation District. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed in District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

R. L. Shinn, of Sacramento, for appellants.
Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This action was brought to restrain the defendant from permitting seepage water from its canal to flow upon the lands of plaintiffs and for damages caused by such water. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiffs appeal. The plaintiffs allege:

"That said ditch or canal was negligently and carelessly constructed by defendant, and that because of such construction by defendant water has constantly escaped and seeped through the bottom and banks of said canal, and said defendant, ever since the use by it of said canal or ditch for conducting water has negligently, carelessly, and without right allowed said water to flow to and upon the said lands of plaintiffs."

These allegations are denied by the defendant. The defendant alleges, in substance, that it is an irrigation district organized under the laws of the state; that in accordance with the California Irrigation District Act (St. 1897, p. 254, as amended by St. 1917, p. 751, and St. 1919, p. 660) it "caused to be prepared by a competent irrigation engineer a set of plans and specifications for the construction of said canal, which said plans and specifications were duly and regularly approved by the State Engineer of the state of California and by the irrigation district bond commission"; that the construction of said works was authorized by a vote of the people of the district; that the canal was constructed in accordance with said plans and specifications; and that said canal has ever since been used for conveying and distributing water to the lands within said district for public use. These affirmative allegations of the answer are clearly established by stipulation and proof. No negligence in the construction of the canal is shown.

The plaintiffs' lands are adjacent to and northerly from the town of Anderson, and within the defendant district. Within said lands is an irregular shaped body of about 25 acres which, until partially drained, was a natural swamp into which the drainage from the neighboring territory lying to the west thereof collected. Until recent years nothing was produced in the swamp except wild hay which was usually harvested from June to August of each year, depending upon the rainfall of the preceding winter and spring. Many years ago a ditch was constructed in an easterly direction which partially drained the swamp into the Sacramento river. In the year 1917 the defendant constructed the section of its canal to the west of plaintiffs' lands in part along a steep hillside, and at an elevation of about 50 feet above the swamp. This section of the canal, the only one in question here, was well constructed, and, in the language of the defendant's engineer, "thrown so far back in the bank that the cut line on the down stream side came about the water line of the ditch." The ground surface was plowed on the lower side "so that there would be a good bond between the old ground and the fill," and "stumps and large roots" were removed. The evidence shows that the consulting engineer was justified in saying, "I thought it was an excellent piece of construction."

The appeal is taken on a bill of exceptions settled by the court, and the appellants specified various particulars in which it is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings.

The court found that the portions of the lands which plaintiffs allege were overflowed by seepage water "had never been productive prior to the construction of defendant's canal, and had never been used for the growing or production of crops, except wild hay, for the reason that the same were swampy and unproductive." Witnesses for the plaintiffs testified that five or six acres of the swamp produced cultivated crops during the years 1913 to 1915, inclusive, and all but about an acre and a half thereof produced crops in 1916 and 1917. There is nothing in the record to contradict this testimony, and four of the defendant's witnesses gave testimony in corroboration thereof, stating that William Vlach, who prior to 1916 farmed the lands now owned by the plaintiffs, plowed portions of the swamp. One of these witnesses, James F. Bedford, testified that a small portion was put into alfalfa, and that Mr. Vlach plowed "quite a lot" of it. The finding that the swamp had never been productive has no support in the evidence.

[1, 2] The court finds that—

"It is untrue that said defendant ever since the use by it of said canal or ditch for conducting water has negligently or carelessly or without right allowed said water or any water to flow to or upon the said lands or any lands of the plaintiffs."

This finding, attempting as it does to negative an affirmative allegation of the complaint, is in the nature of a negative pregnant and implies the truth of the allegation. Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Dufour, 95 Cal. 619, 30 Pac. 783, 19 L. R. A. 92; Auerbach v. Healy, 174 Cal. 5, 161 Pac. 1157; State ex rel. Russell v. Box, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 435, 78 S. W. 982. The appellants, however, make no objection to the sufficiency of the finding, but specify only that it is unsupported by and contrary to the evidence. The evidence that seepage water from the defendant's canal flowed down to and upon the swamp is conclusive. The court found that in the "early spring" of the year 1918 the plaintiffs had "fully prepared the ground for planting and planted various valuable crops described in paragraph 8 of the plaintiffs' complaint," alleged in said paragraph to comprise 20 acres of the swamp. The court further found "that in addition to the crops so planted the plaintiffs fully plowed and (prepared?) for planting 3½ acres of said land." It thus appears that after the end of the rainy season all but an acre and a half of the swamp was sufficiently dry to be plowed and planted. The evidence shows without conflict that within about two weeks after the defendant turned water into its canal in May, 1918, water began to flow into the swamp and continued throughout the irrigating season, covering the swamp and destroying the crops growing thereon. The evidence shows that the crops referred to in the findings were planted the latter part of May. Climatic conditions in the Sacramento valley are such as to make it clear that, if the drainage of the swamp was of such character as to carry off the winter's accumulation of water and render the land tillable by the latter part of May, the natural drainage water from the low foothills would not keep the land flooded during the remainder of the dry season. The evidence shows that the drainage facilities provided by the plaintiffs were sufficient to protect their crops from any natural flow of water into the swamp during the cropping season of 1918.

There was some contention that the flooding of the swamp was caused by a general rise of the water table due to the irrigation of lands in the district, but the evidence shows that the lands the irrigation of which might probably have that effect were not in fact irrigated in the year 1918 until after the swamp was flooded. Witnesses for the plaintiffs testified that the water which caused the damage seeped from the defendant's canal and flowed down in surface streams to the swamp. This testimony is corroborated by that of O. F. Oliphant, a ditch tender for the defendant, and one of its witnesses at the trial, who testified:

That he did not find any water seeping from the bank of the canal during the year 1918. "By 'bank' I mean the immediate levee or upthrow. * * * I noticed seepage water below the bank of the ditch, from the McFarland place down to the high school. * * * I noticed the water in 1917 the same as I noticed it in 1918."

Two gulches referred to in the testimony as gulches F and E merge and drain into the swamp. Mr. Oliphant testified on cross-examination:

"I paid particular attention to those drains that ran out below the canal and merge in that gulch which is marked F on the map; I noticed the branch of that gulch marked E; I noticed all of them; I noticed water coming from below the line of the canal and coming out and running down these drains. * * * There was water coming out of the hillside below the line of the canal in May and June, 1918. It came out near Diamond creek here, out through that plug, out through the cut where the Anderson water pipe went through, but I don't know whether that was seepage from the canal or from the water company. I couldn't say whether the water company's water came through a conduit of any kind, because it was under the ground. I never noticed that point prior to 1918. * * * I crossed that plain several times and found water flowing down from the direction of the canal. * * * I don't know that all that water came from the canal. * * * I wouldn't say that the quantity of water has not increased in that gulch F since the water was put into the main canal in 1918, as compared to conditions prior to that time. I noticed an increase. * * * I noticed there was more water in these gulches after the water was turned into the canal in May and June, 1918, than there was prior to that time. * * * I don't remember of seeing any of the depressions that are included in the heads of these drains and the east limits of the town site of Anderson in 1918 that were dry. * * * I noticed water percolating from the soil at the McFarland place, along the hill, and flowing off down into the flat, after the water was turned back into the canal. It was a very short distance it made its appearance, and that was some five or six rods below the canal."

Without substantial conflict, the evidence shows that the water which flooded the swamp in 1918 came from the defendant's canal.

[3, 4] Appellants concede, as under the evidence they must, that the defendant was not negligent in the original construction, but they contend that it was negligent in failing to correct a defect which developed in the actual operation of the canal. To knowingly construct a canal through loose sand or gravel incapable of holding water, in a situation such as that disclosed here, without taking any steps to prevent or control seepage therefrom, would constitute negligence. Turpen v. Turlock Irrigation Dist., 141 Cal. 1, 74 Pac. 295; Shields v. Orr Extension Ditch Co., 23 Nev. 349, 47 Pac. 195. If, in the actual operation of a canal, sudden and unexpected damage results by reason of some hidden defect which could not reasonably have been foreseen, the owner would not be liable in damages, because he is not an insurer, but chargeable only in case of negligence. Sutliff v. Sweetwater Water Co., 182 Cal. 34, 186 Pac. 766. After discovery of the defect, however, and after reasonable opportunity to correct it, if the owner continue the use, his liability for subsequent damages would be the same as if he had known of the defect at the time of construction. The officers of the defendant knew that there was a heavy seepage from the Anderson section of the canal during the time it carried water in the year 1917, and throughout the irrigating season of 1918. The only effort to remedy the defect consisted of occasional puddling and shoveling clay into the canal by the ditch tender who had a beat to walk of 17 miles a day. In view of the continuing damage being done through many months, this slight effort to correct the defect is not sufficient to overcome the charge of negligence. That the seepage was preventable is indicated by the testimony of the ditch tender, who stated that the effect of his efforts as above set forth was to stop the seepage altogether at one point and to reduce it 75 per cent. at some others. The seepage was not continuous along the canal, but for short distances only at different points. There are various common methods of preventing or reducing seepage from canals, some of which are described in the evidence. The canal may be lined with concrete at points where seepage occurs; heavy asphalt oil may be applied; the sides and bottom may be puddled; a flow of water carrying large quantities of sediment and silt during storm periods tends to lessen the seepage. Drain ditches may be constructed below the point where the seepage comes to the surface. In this case the deepening and enlargement of the drain from the swamp to the river would have prevented the damage. One of the engineers testifying for the defendant estimated the cost of such deepening and widening at something over $200. An engineer for the plaintiffs placed the cost at about $1,500. In view of all the circumstances, it must be held that the defendant did not use ordinary care to prevent the damage.

[5, 6] The defendant contends that the plaintiffs are guilty of contributory negligence in not maintaining their drain in condition to carry off the surplus water from the swamp. The trial court seems to have been impressed with this contention, for it found "that it is possible by grading said drain and annually cleaning the same to carry off from the lands of plaintiffs all surplus waters collected in said swamp or marsh or pond by the drainage from the neighboring territory and seepage from defendant's canal." As hereinbefore pointed out, the drain was sufficient to prevent the flooding of the swamp during the year 1918 from natural causes. The plaintiffs are not guilty of contributory negligence barring recovery in their failure to increase the capacity of the drain so as to carry off the additional water coming down from the defendant's canal. McCarty v. Boise City Canal Co., 2 Hasb. (Idaho) 10 Pac. 624. Evidence that plaintiffs failed to use ordinary care to prevent the injury after the seepage water began to flow down upon their land may be considered in mitigation of damages, but if by the exercise of such care they could have avoided the injury to their crops altogether, they would be entitled to recover as damages the reasonable expenditures made necessary by the additional water. In 3 Shearman & Redfield on Damages (6th Ed.) § 741, the rule is stated as follows:

"The plaintiff cannot recover compensation for any damage which he might have avoided by the use of ordinary care and diligence, after first becoming aware of the injury of which he complains"

—citing Lloyd v. Lloyd, 60 Vt. 288, 13 Atl. 638, where it is said:

"The plaintiff suffered damage by the wrongful obstruction of his drain. He might have gone on, and sunk the new drain made by the defendants, as aforesaid, below the outlet of the covered drain, at an expense not exceeding $25," says the referee. Without taking this precaution, he was damaged $100. * * * It is the duty of a person injured by the fault of another to use all reasonable means to protect himself against injuries consequent. If injured in his person, he must attend to his cure. If injured in his estate, he must attend to its preservation. If he fails in this duty, he cannot gather the fruits of his own negligence. The plaintiff could have indemnified himself at an expense of $25, and this is the legal measure of his damage."

Respondent contends that, since its irrigating system was planned and constructed under legal sanction for a public purpose, any detriment suffered by the plaintiffs is "damnum absque injuria," citing some of the reclamation cases wherein it was held that one owner has the right to levee against flood waters even though the effect be to throw such waters back upon his neighbor. Such decisions are based upon the theory that flood waters are a "common enemy" against which each owner may protect himself even to the damage of other owners. It has further been held in numerous cases that a reclamation district is a governmental agency to carry out a specific purpose, and that it cannot, therefore, be sued without the consent of the state. The law under which defendant district is organized, however, authorizes it to sue and be sued. Boehmer v. Big Rock Irrigation District, 117 Cal. 28, 48 Pac. 908. While irrigation adds greatly to the public welfare, districts such as the defendant are organized primarily for the benefit of the landowners therein, who ought not to be permitted to do collectively what they cannot lawfully do individually to the injury of their neighbors. As said in Howell v. Big Horn Basin Col. Co., 14 Wyo. 38, 81 Pac. 791, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 596:

"The great benefit to be derived from such enterprises as that of the defendant does not authorize the promulgation of a principle that will permit one tract of land to be reclaimed at the expense of the destruction of another without compensation."

And in the case of Bradbury v. Vandalia Levee & Drainage District, 236 Ill. 36, 86 N. E. 163, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 991, 15 Ann. Cas. 904, where the law authorized the district to sue and be sued, the district—

"was organized upon the petition of a majority of the owners of lands in the belief that they would be benefited by the organization. To deny to the plaintiffs a recovery of the damages which they have suffered by the effort of the owners of lands within the district to benefit themselves would be against natural right and every sentiment of justice."

It is not necessary to decide whether an irrigation district is liable for damages caused by seepage from its canal of a continuing nature which cannot be prevented by the exercise of ordinary care, for in this case it is shown that the defendant failed to exercise such care to prevent the damage.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank
Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition of the respondent for a rehearing in this court is denied.

[7] In so far as the opinion of the District Court of Appeal appears to indicate that the plaintiffs cannot recover damages for the injury to their land unless it appears that the flooding thereof which caused the injury was the proximate result of the negligence of the defendant in the construction and maintenance of its canal, we disapprove the same. The canal is constructed for public purposes and to serve the purpose of distribution of water to public use. Apparently the damage to the plaintiffs is caused directly by seepage of water carried in said canal through the intervening soil onto the adjoining land of the plaintiffs. In such cases the plaintiff is secured a right to damages by the constitutional provision that private property shall not be damaged for public use. Article I, section 14. In such cases the care that may be taken in the construction of the public improvement which causes the damage is wholly immaterial to the right of the plaintiff to recover damage, if the improvement causes it. This was expressly decided in Reardon v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. 505, 6 Pac. 317, 56 Am. Rep. 109, and Eachus v. Los Angeles, 103 Cal. 614, 37 Pac. 750, 42 Am. St. Rep. 149. The proposition apparently was not considered by the District Court, and perhaps was not presented in the briefs or in the court below. Nevertheless, upon a new trial the question should remain open.

All concur.

BURNS v. FAGET ENGINEERING CO.
(Civil No. 3895.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 6, 1921.)

1. Master and servant §80(10)—Judgment disallowing employer's counterclaim for advances held error.

In an action for services in which the employer offered a counterclaim for money advanced, held that, every essential and material fact in support of the counterclaim having been proved without conflict, its disallowance by the trial court was error.

2. Appeal and error §1011(1)—When conflict in evidence was merely fanciful, finding of court is not conclusive.

Respondent's contention that a judgment could not be set aside on appeal because the evidence was in conflict was without merit, where the only conflict was merely fanciful or fictitious.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by J. M. Burns against the Faget Engineering Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wilson & Wilson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Bell, Brookman, Simmons & Creech, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued defendant for the balance due for services rendered. Defendant admitted the performance of the services to the value sued for, but offered a counterclaim for $250, money advanced to the use of plaintiff. Judgment was given for plaintiff on his complaint and against the counterclaim, and defendant appeals.

[1] The facts are that for some five or six years prior to April 5, 1919, plaintiff was employed by defendant in the capacity of salesman at a salary of $200 a month. Immediately prior to that date plaintiff learned of an opportunity to install an ice plant in China on property owned by the China Mongolia Export Company. He asked defendant's permission to take the employment and, through the aid of defendant, was employed by F. E. Booth Company, the local agents of the China company, to go to China and install the plant. By the terms of the employment plaintiff was to be paid $350 a month and expenses by the China company. Before leaving for China plaintiff arranged with defendant to advance $250 a month to his wife, who remained here, the defendant to be reimbursed by the Booth company for the China concern. Plaintiff was to draw the remainder of his salary and his expenses directly from the China company. This arrangement was carried out in every particular, except that in February, 1920, defendant advanced the $250 to plaintiff's wife as before, but the Booth company refused to reimburse it because it claimed the employment had terminated. This claim was based upon the fact that plaintiff had completed the installation of the plant prior to February 1, 1920, and had returned to San Francisco on February 17th. The Booth company took the position that it was not liable for salary during the full month of February after completion of the work.

Upon his return to San Francisco plaintiff took a vacation of two or three weeks and then returned to the service of defendant. After repeated demands for an adjustment of the February account, and as many promises on the part of plaintiff that he would adjust it, defendant deducted the amount from plaintiff's salary. The advance of the sum in dispute has never been denied, the only defense to the counterclaim being that defendant was liable to plaintiff for his salary during the entire month of February.

That he sought the employment at his own instance and accepted the offer of the Booth company to pay his salary for his labor in China, which was a substantial increase from what he had been receiving from defendant, that he knew at all times that the China company and not the defendant was his employer, and that the defendant was not interested in the installation of the plant other than to recommend plaintiff to the Booth company for employment, cannot be denied. Every essential and material fact in support of the counterclaim was proved without conflict.

[2] Respondent's only argument in support of the judgment is that the appellate court cannot set it aside because there is a conflict in the evidence. But the only conflict arises out of the testimony of respondent in his endeavor to establish a relation of master and servant in a case where there was no contract of employment express or implied. His statement that appellant urged him to keep his eyes open for business for the firm, and his endeavors to interest others in the purchase of appellant's wares, are all in harmony with the evidence that, having been a salesman for appellant, he was offered a commission on any sales made on his trip. But having been unsuccessful, nothing was due him from appellant. When the conflict in the evidence is merely fanciful or fictitious, the appellate court is not bound by the judgment.

Judgment reversed.

NOCE et al. v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 3792.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 14, 1921. Rehearing Denied Aug. 12, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 12, 1921.)

1. Street railroads ☞102(1)—Persons concurrently negligent liable.

Where collision between motortruck and street car resulted from concurrent negligence of motorman and driver of the truck, and as a result thereof the street car ran wild and collided with another truck, the street railway was liable in damages for the death of driver of the second truck, unless the driver of the second truck was guilty of contributory negligence.

2. Street railroads ☞117(24)—Contributory negligence of truck driver held for jury.

In an action for death of truck driver struck from the rear by a runaway street car, contributory negligence of deceased, who was driving on the track without looking back, held for the jury.

3. Street railroads ☞85(3)—No exclusive right to portion of road occupied by tracks.

A street railroad has no exclusive right to that portion of a road occupied by its tracks.

4. Municipal corporations ☞705(1)—Statute as to signals on changing direction inapplicable to mere deviations.

A practical and reasonable construction of Motor Vehicle Act, § 20, as amended by St. 1919, p. 216, providing for signals on changing direction, does not require the driver of a motor vehicle upon every deviation from a direct course ahead to look back to ascertain the condition of traffic behind him; such situations being covered by duty to use ordinary care.

5. Trial ☞296(4, 5)—Instructions concerning contributory negligence held reversible error notwithstanding rest of charge.

Instruction that, if the jury found the deceased to have been negligent in a given particular, it could only find for the defendant in the event that the latter was free from negligence, held, in the state of the evidence, practically equivalent to directing a verdict for the plaintiff and to require a reversal, notwithstanding that in another part of the charge the court instructed the jury as to the effect of negligence on part of deceased.

6. Appeal and error ☞1064(1)—Contradictory instructions require reversal.

Where two instructions are contradictory in essential parts, judgment must be reversed.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, the widow and minor children of one David Noce, in an action for damages arising from the latter's death, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant.

The case was tried by a jury, which rendered a verdict in the plaintiff's favor for $50,000, but upon motion for a new trial the court made an order granting the motion unless the plaintiffs would consent to a reduction of the verdict and judgment to $25,000. The plaintiffs consented, and the judgment now appealed from is for the sum of $25,000.

On the 22d day of July, 1919, a south-bound electric car of the defendant left Daly City on schedule time at 1:50 p. m. and had proceeded but a short distance when it collided with a motortruck belonging to one A. G. Witt. This truck was on the right-hand car track and running at the rate of about 20 miles an hour. The car at the time of said collision was running down grade at the rate of about 40 miles an hour. According to the evidence of a number of witnesses called by the plaintiffs, the motorman gave no warning of his approach, and his car crashed into the rear of the motortruck, hurling it into an adjoining field, the vestibule of the car being smashed, and the motorman thrown to the floor unconscious. The air brake equipment and the entire front control were destroyed. In this condition, and with the motorman unconscious, the car continued on its course at a high and dangerous rate of speed, the track at this point being down grade; and while so proceeding uncontrolled it collided with a truck operated by David Noce, causing his death. This truck was also, according to plaintiffs' evidence, on the right-hand car track proceeding in a southerly direction. Of course, no gong or bell was sounded as the car approached the second truck; and, while it is conceded that the electric car at this time was running at the rate of at least 60 miles an hour, witnesses for the plaintiff stated that it made no unusual noise. It is also conceded that the Witt truck was being operated in violation of a provision of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1919 (St. 1919, p. 191), in that it was so loaded as to obstruct a view to the rear and was not equipped with a mirror by which such a view could have been had by its driver.

[1] From the evidence in the case we think it fairly appears that the first collision was the result of the negligence of the motorman driving the defendant's electric car, or of the concurrent negligence of both such motorman and the driver of the Witt truck. Consequently in either event the defendant would be liable for the death of Noce provided Noce himself was free from negligence proximately contributing to the collision which caused it.

The defendant claims that the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs cannot stand for the reason that the evidence shows that the deceased was in fact guilty of such contributory negligence: (1) In operating and driving his motortruck when the same was so loaded as to obscure his view of the highway to the rear without equipping his truck with a mirror so as to reflect a view of the highway; (2) in driving upon the track in front of this runaway car without looking or listening to ascertain whether a car was approaching or taking the slightest precaution for his own safety.

As to the first of these contentions it is true that a provision of the Motor Vehicle Act which went into effect the day before this accident occurred requires that a person operating a vehicle so covered, loaded, or constructed as to obscure the driver's rear view should have such vehicle equipped with a mirror so as to reflect a view of the highway for at least 200 feet to the rear; and it is the defendant's contention in this behalf that the omission of the deceased at the time of the collision to comply with this provision of the law rendered him guilty of contributory negligence. This contention it appears is not sustained by the evidence, which fails to reveal that the Noce truck was so loaded or constructed as to obscure the rearward view of the highway.

[2, 3] As to the other of these contentions, it is true that, according to the evidence introduced by the defendant, the deceased was driving his truck on the right-hand side of the car track, and that in order to pass two motortrucks which were standing within about four feet of said track the deceased, without looking back to learn the conditions rearward, turned upon the track just in time, unfortunately, to be struck by the runaway car. On the other hand, according to the evidence introduced by the plaintiff, the deceased did not drive suddenly upon said track, but had been upon it for some time when the collision occurred. Under these circumstances, we cannot say as a matter of law that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. The question, it is clear, was one for the consideration of the jury. The defendant had no exclusive right to that portion of the road occupied by its tracks, and in fact it makes no such contention. Nor can it be held that one driving on or near the track of a street car on a public highway shows a lack of ordinary care or is guilty of negligence per se in failing to keep a constant watch behind for an approaching car. O'Connor v. U. Ry., 168 Cal. 43, 49, 141 Pac. 809.

The court in effect instructed the jury in part as follows:

"If Noce violated the Motor Vehicle Act in driving a truck so constructed or loaded as to obstruct his rear view, without mirror equipment, he was guilty of negligence, and if such negligence proximately contributed to his injury and death, and the defendant was without negligence, your verdict must be for the defendant.

"The court instructs you that it is the law of this state that 'the person in charge of any vehicle in or upon any public highway, before turning, stopping or changing the course of such vehicle, and before turning such vehicle when starting the same, shall see first that there is sufficient space for such movement to be made in safety,' and therefore, if you find from the evidence in this case that David Noce was operating a motor vehicle and truck along the westerly or right hand side of the highway and clear of the tracks of the defendant, and did thereafter turn or change the course of such truck so as to go upon the track of the defendant, and failed before turning such truck to see first whether there was sufficient space for such movement to be made in safety, then I instruct you that said David Noce was guilty of negligence in so operating and turning said truck, and that, if such negligence proximately contributed to his injury and death, your verdict should be for the defendant United Railroads, unless you find the injury could have been avoided by ordinary care of the defendant.

"If you find that Noce failed to exercise ordinary care, and in consequence thereof received injuries resulting in his death, he was guilty of contributory negligence, and your verdict must be in favor of the defendant, unless you find the injury could have been avoided by ordinary care of the defendant."

These instructions, without the italicized portions thereof, were requested by the defendant, and the defendant contends that in giving them as thus modified the court committed prejudicial error. It is true that the court elsewhere in its charge correctly instructed the jury on the subject of contributory negligence.

It may be doubted whether the defendant was entitled to the first two of these instructions as proposed. As to the first of them, as before stated, there is no evidence in the record that the truck of the deceased was so constructed or loaded as to obscure the driver's rearward view. As to the second of them, its offer by the defendant was based upon the theory that the deceased, when he, upon arriving in the vicinity of the standing trucks, deflected his course a little to the left so as to bring his vehicle upon the car track, thus changed his course within the meaning of subdivision "n" of section 20 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1919, p. 216), reading as follows:

"The person in charge of any vehicle in or upon any public highway, before turning, stopping, or changing the course of such vehicle * * * shall see first that there is sufficient space for such movement to be made in safety, and if the movement or operation of other vehicles may reasonably be affected by such turning, stopping or changing of course, shall give plainly visible signal to the persons operating, driving or in charge of such vehicles of his intention so to turn, stop, or change his course, either by the use of his hand or arm, * * * or by the use of an approved mechanical or electrical device. * * *"

[4, 5] We think a practical and reasonable construction of this provision would not require the driver of a vehicle upon every deviation from a direct course ahead to look back to ascertain the condition of traffic behind him. This particular situation would be covered by his duty to use ordinary care, and whether or not he did so would be for the jury to decide upon the particular circumstances of the case. Had the court contented itself with simply refusing to give these two instructions, we perhaps would find no ground for the reversal of the judgment based upon such refusal; but we think it clear that by giving them with the additions indicated by italics it completely deprived the defendant of its defense of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased. This also is unquestionably the case as to the court's modification of the third of said instructions. The effect of this reiteration of the proposition that, if the jury found the deceased to have been negligent in a given particular, it could only find for the defendant in the event that the latter was free from negligence, was, in the state of the evidence in the case, practically equivalent to directing a verdict for the plaintiff, and certainly deprived the defendant of its defense of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased. If the record contained no evidence of negligence on the part of the deceased which proximately contributed to the collision, the defendant could not be said to have been injured by the modification of its proposed instruction referred to, but such is not the case. There was undoubtedly evidence before the jury from which it could have concluded that the deceased was not free from fault. The fact that in another part of its charge the court instructed the jury as to the effect of negligence on the part of the deceased simply makes the instructions as a whole irreconcilable, leaving the jury to follow one or the other as its sympathies might dictate. This being so, we are of the opinion that the contention of the defendant that these instructions as thus modified were incorrect and seriously prejudicial to its defense must be sustained.

[6] If it be suggested that the modification of the second and third of these instructions was for the purpose of instructing the jury upon the application to the case of the doctrine of last clear chance, the answer is that there was obviously no room for the application of that doctrine, since the undisputed evidence showed that the car which collided with the wagon of the deceased was one over which the defendant had completely lost control prior to the time when the deceased had come into a position of danger. Nor is there anything in the language of the modification which even remotely suggests to a body of laymen that it was meant for that purpose. From the uniformity with which the trial court introduced the modification of these instructions offered by the defendant it seems clear that at the moment of giving them the court had an erroneous view of what constitutes contributory negligence. In any event the conclusion is inescapable that as a result of the instructions the jury must have had a very confused notion on that, to the defendant, vitally important matter. The instructions are contradictory and confusing, and cannot be reconciled. In the case of Guthrie v. Carney, 19 Cal App. 145, 155, 124 Pac. 1045, as here, the charge of the court was contradictory and inconsistent in the application of the law to the vital issues of the case, and it was held that, as it was impossible to determine which of the trial court's views of the law the jury adopted as the basis of their verdict, the error of the court must be deemed to have been prejudicial. Where two instructions are contradictory in essential parts, the judgment must be reversed. Hayden v. Constantinople Mining & Dredging Co., 3 Cal. App. 136, 84 Pac. 422. See, also, People v. Ross, 19 Cal. App. 469, 126 Pac. 375.

It follows that the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

It is so ordered.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank
Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. Hearing denied.

LAWLOR, J. (dissenting). I dissent from the order denying the application for a hearing in this court. It is plain from the record on appeal that the modifications complained of did not have the effect of taking from the jury the issue of contributory negligence, or of preventing them from passing on the merits of that defense. Instructions on contributory negligence had already been repeatedly given. Among such instructions were these: One that the jury must find that the second collision occurred "without any negligence on the part of said Noce" before a verdict could be rendered for plaintiff and against defendant. The substance of this was repeated in the succeeding instruction. The jury was told in another they must find that the death of Noce was caused by the negligence of the defendant and "without fault" on his part before they could find for plaintiff. In another the charge was given that it was the duty of the motorman to save Noce from injury, and that it was his duty to exercise ordinary care to save himself from injury; that the duty was reciprocal. In another it was declared that—

"Contributory negligence is such an act or omission on the part of David Noce, deceased, amounting to a want of ordinary care as, concurring or co-operating with the alleged negligent act of the defendant, proximately contributed to the injuries resulting in his death. The court instructs you that the basis for the rule of contributory negligence is that the party whose negligence proximately contributed to his injury must bear the harm which he brings on himself and which he might have avoided by reasonable care for his own self-preservation."

In another the jury was charged that—

"The tracks of a street railway company are in themselves a sign of danger, and one who approaches same must exercise his faculties of sight and hearing to wait and listen for cars, and his failure to so act is negligence."

In another the jury was instructed that, if Noce was not exercising ordinary care and prudence for his own safety, and such failure on his part continued up to the moment of the accident and proximately contributed to the injuries resulting in his death, the verdict must be for the defendant, and that, even if they find that the motorman was guilty of negligence, nevertheless, if they find that Noce also was guilty of negligence and such negligence contributed to the injuries which resulted in his death, the verdict must be for the defendant. In another it was stated that, if the jury found Noce could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have seen the car approaching, and have avoided the collision, and his death resulted from a failure to exercise such care, he was guilty of contributory negligence, and the verdict must be for the defendant. And in still another it was declared to be the duty of Noce to make reasonable use of his faculties of sight and hearing to watch and listen for approaching cars, and that it was his duty to use ordinary care for any car that might be approaching from the rear, and, if known to him, to seasonably leave the track in order to permit any such car to pass.

It is to be kept in mind that the modified instructions themselves are addressed to the defense of contributory negligence. In view of the evidence the contentions of the parties, and the elaborate character of the preceding instructions on that subject, the jury could not fail to understand that, if Noce contributed to his own death, the verdict must be for the defendant. I find no warrant for the conclusion that defendant's rights were prejudiced by the modifications. It would be more in harmony with the charge as a whole to conclude that, if the modifications carried any particular meaning to the jury, it was that the court was only repeating to them what it had already declared in varying phrases in a number of instructions—that, if the motorman's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, and plaintiff did not contribute thereto, defendant would be liable.

The reversal of the judgment rests upon the single proposition that the jury understood, or might have understood, the legal distinction, and thereby became confused, between the instructions first given on the subject, which declared that, if the motorman's negligence was the proximate cause of the accident, and plaintiff was free from contributory negligence, defendant would be liable, and the modifications that plaintiff's contributory negligence would bar his recovery.

ery unless the defendant "was without negligence," or unless "you find the injury could have been avoided by ordinary care of defendant," the latter being repeated in the third instruction. Of course, the distinction is plain to the trained legal mind, but I do not believe that substantial justice can be done on appeal if verdicts are to be set aside upon any such ground. Considered in its entirety, the charge was more than fair to the defendant; indeed, it may with truth be said that it was more favorable to that side of the case. This decision is in the face of section 475, Code of Civil Procedure, and section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution; for to hold that but for the error in the instructions a different result would have been probable, or that it resulted in a miscarriage of justice, is in effect to declare that, if the judge, in the course of an elaborate charge, inadvertently happens to make a single error, the judgment must be set aside, and the case tried over again, with the attendant delay and expense. It is against every reasonable probability that the jury noticed the contradictory statements in the charge, and therefore, under the rules of decision on appeal, the error should have been held harmless. It is not enough that the jury might have been misled; the appellate court must be of the opinion after an examination of the entire record that such was the result of the error or the judgment must be affirmed. It is entirely problematical whether the jury detected the contradictions in the instructions, and how then can it be said in the presence of overwhelming proof of negligence on the part of defendant's servants that the misdirection resulted in a miscarriage of justice? Moreover, the failure of the District Court of Appeal to weigh the error under the constitutional rule of decision on appeal alone furnishes sufficient ground for granting the petition.

In the next place, it is far from clear that the evidence would support a finding of contributory negligence, and, if this be so, the giving of instructions on that subject, even if erroneous, would not, of course, be prejudicial. Before the first collision occurred the car was traveling at the rate of over 60 miles an hour, and after that, according to the opinion, it slowed down to 45 miles an hour. There is testimony that Noce had been on the track for some prior to the first collision. Besides, it is extremely doubtful whether the jury accepted defendant's theory that Noce turned sharply to go upon the track, and there is ample ground for an assumption that the jury believed he looked in the direction from which the car came before making the turn. It is plain from the evidence that, once on the track, he had no chance to escape. The required warnings were not given by the employees of defendant; the car continued at break-neck speed even after the first collision; and the impact was so great as to render the motorman unconscious. As indicating the high speed at which the car was traveling, the truck was carried 150 feet after it was struck, and it was impossible to stop the car before it had gone 2,000 feet. In short, the servants of defendant showed so flagrant a want of care in the operation of the car that the jury must have decided from the evidence that it was the proximate cause of the injury and that plaintiff was free from contributory negligence.

This is not a case where the evidence on the issues of defendant's negligence is evenly balanced or open to doubt. The gross negligence of defendant's servants is conceded, and by the decision the negligence of defendant has become the law of the case. Between the evidence of gross negligence, on the one hand, and the doubtful claim of error, on the other, it is our duty to grant the petition.

CITIZENS' TRUST & SAVINGS BANK v.
BRYANT. (Civ. 3139.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 3, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 29, 1921.)

1. Guaranty §16(2)—Contract of guaranty held founded on sufficient consideration.

Where defendant entered contract of guaranty dated November 5th for a note secured by mortgage dated October 16th, and plaintiff lent money in reliance on the guaranty after the contract was made, the guaranty was a part of the original transaction, and was founded on sufficient consideration, under Civ. Code, § 2792, providing that, when a guaranty is entered at the same time with the original obligation, or with the acceptance of the latter by the guaranty, and forms part of the consideration, no other consideration need exist.

2. Guaranty §77(2)—Suit may be maintained on unconditional guaranty without pursuing remedy against debtor.

Where, according to the terms of a contract of guaranty, the liability of the guarantor was not contingent upon the exercise of rights of guaranty under a mortgage which secured the debt guaranteed; the guaranty was unconditional, and the guarantee may enforce the obligation of the guaranty immediately upon default of the principal debtor, and without notice to the guarantor, and without exhausting a mortgage security as a condition to suit.

3. Guaranty §91—Default of debtor and loss thereby warrant judgment.

In a suit on a contract of unconditional guaranty, where the principal debtor was in default, and the sum due from him was in excess of the amount of guaranty, no other conditions need exist to entitle plaintiff to judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank against W. J. Bryant. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. G. Reily, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Daniel M. Hunsaker and Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal by the defendant from a judgment entered upon a complaint which asserted a claim for the principal sum of $2,000, alleged to have accrued on an instrument of guaranty.

[1] In the month of October, 1915, appellant, as the agent for George A. Bryant, negotiated with respondent for a loan of $10,000. This loan was made and a mortgage was given to the bank on real property owned by George A. Bryant. The note and mortgage bore date October 16, 1915. However, the respondent bank declined to make the loan on the note and security offered by George A. Bryant, but insisted as a condition to the making of the same that appellant guarantee payment of the debt to the extent of $2,000. Appellant agreed to do this, and executed the guaranty sued upon, which was dated the 5th day of November, 1915. It was after the execution of this contract by appellant that the bank paid over the money agreed to be loaned and accepted the several papers hereinbefore mentioned. One of the points made by appellant is that there was no sufficient consideration for the contract of guaranty, and that the obligation thereof must fail because it was not entered into at the time of the loan transaction. This contention has not the semblance of any real facts upon which to found it, unless the mere difference in the date of the note and mortgage and that of the contract of guaranty affords such ground. Section 2792, Civil Code, provides:

"Where a guaranty is entered into at the same time with the original obligation, or with the acceptance of the latter by the guarantee, and forms with that obligation a part of the consideration to him, no other consideration need exist."

All of the evidence, including the terms of the contract of guaranty itself, shows conclusively that there was but one transaction, and that the note and mortgage of George A. Bryant was not accepted by the bank until the guaranty was furnished.

[2, 3] Appellant urges further that there could be no recovery on the guaranty contract until the mortgage security had been exhausted. The guaranty contract was an unconditional one. If the general terms in which it was first expressed left any doubt upon that question, the closing paragraph placed its character beyond the reach of debate. In that paragraph it was stated over appellant's signature:

"I hereby agree that my liability hereunder as to the sum of $2,000 shall become immediately due and payable to the Citizens' Trust and Savings Bank upon the happening of any default in any of the terms of said note, whether said default be made by said George A. Bryant, his heirs, or assigns, and that my liability as to $2,000 shall in no wise be contingent upon the exercise of rights of the Citizens' Trust and Savings Bank as mortgagee under said mortgage to said liability."

The guaranty being unconditional, and in no wise a mere contract of indemnity, respondent was entitled to enforce the obligation thereof immediately upon the default of the principal debtor, and without notice to the guarantor, and was under no requirement to exhaust the mortgage security as a condition to suit. Section 2807, Civ. Code; Pierce v. Merrill, 128 Cal. 464, 61 Pac. 64, 79 Am. St. Rep. 56; Adams v. Wallace, 110 Cal. 67, 51 Pac. 14; Cooke v. Mesmer, 164 Cal. 332, 128 Pac. 917.

[3] At the time of the bringing of respondent's action, the principal debtor was in default and the sum due from him was in excess of the amount of the guaranty. No other conditions were required to exist to entitle respondent to the judgment entered in its favor.

The judgment is affirmed.

53 Cal. App. 709

SITTIG v. RANEY, County Auditor.
(Civ. 2233.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 29, 1921.)

1. Highways §113(3)—Supervisor of district may contract for work at cost not to exceed $1,000 without advertising for bids.

Under Pol. Code, § 2645, subd. 1, requiring board of supervisors to comply with certain requirements as to advertisement for bids, etc., before entering into a road contract where estimated cost of work amounts to more than $1,000, the supervisor of a district, under the rule of expressio unius, acting as ex officio road commissioner, can make a contract involving expenditure of not more than $1,000 without compliance with the formalities prescribed by such statute.

2. Highways §113(3)—Evidence held to support finding that supervisor's purchase of rock for less than $1,000 without bids was a transaction separate from purchase at other times from same claimant.

On the issue of a county's liability, depending on whether a supervisor as road commissioner, had ordered of claimant more than $1,000 worth of rock without advertising for bids as required by Pol. Code, § 2643, subd. 11, as amended by St. 1919, p. 168, where estimated cost is more than $1,000, evidence held to support findings that the purchase of rock for which payment was sought was a transaction separate and distinct from the purchase by the supervisor of other rock at other times for other roads.

3. Appeal and error ☞1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Trial court's determination of question of fact on conflicting evidence is conclusive.

4. Highways ☞113(3) — Contract involving less than $1,000 may be made without bids, though aggregate of similar contracts with same party exceeds $1,000.

Supervisor could purchase crushed rock for an amount less than $1,000 without advertising for bids under Pol. Code, § 2643, subd. 11, as amended by St. 1919, p. 168, requiring board of supervisors to advertise for bids before letting contract involving expenditure of more than $1,000, though he purchased rock from same party at different times for different roads as separate and distinct transactions in an amount in excess of $1,000.

5. Mandamus ☞167—Variance between claim and complaint in mandamus for issuance of warrant held not fatal.

Variance between claim as presented to and allowed by board of supervisors for "rock crushed and hauled and spread on" named street, and complaint of claimants in mandamus proceeding to require issuance of warrant in payment of claim, describing claim as for "rock crushed and hauled," held not fatal, where both claimant and supervisor understood that the word "spread," as used in the claim, had reference to the unloading of truck load of rock by opening the bed of the truck while truck continued in motion, so that the rock would be scattered on and over the road.

6. Counties ☞202—Omission of claimant's affidavit and certificate of clerk or auditor cured by board's allowance of claim.

Omission of claimant's affidavit to claim presented to board of supervisors, and the certificate of the clerk of the board or the county auditor as to the correctness of the computation of itemized statement of the claim, required by Pol. Code, § 4076, subd. 3, held cured by action of the board in allowing the claim.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Application of A. R. Sittig for a writ of mandamus against James M. Raney, as County Auditor of Napa County. Writ granted, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, for appellant.
Frank L. Coombs, Nathan F. Coombs, and John T. York, all of Napa, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff petitioned the superior court of Napa county for a writ of mandate to compel the defendant, as auditor of said county, to issue to him his warrant on the treasurer of said county for the sum of $873.80, for services and materials alleged to have been performed and furnished by him for road repair purposes in said county. Judgment awarding a peremptory writ of mandate as prayed for in the petition was given and entered, and from said judgment the defendant auditor appeals.

The claim which is the foundation of this suit is for the furnishing and delivery, upon the order of the supervisor, as ex officio road commissioner of supervisorial district No. 1, in Napa county, of crushed rock at certain points on a road known and designated as "Orndorff street," in said district and county, for use in repairing said road. "Orndorff street" is a road lying outside and terminating or beginning at one end of the municipal limits of the city of Napa, and, as the witnesses described it, "is a little piece of road lying between the Brown's Valley road and West Linn street," the latter street being within and running up to the "end of the city limits."

The complaint sets out the facts respecting the ordering of the rock by Mark Hein, supervisor of supervisorial district No. 1, the filing of the claim with the defendant, as auditor, etc., the presentation of said claim by said auditor in due legal form to the board of supervisors, the consideration and allowance of said claim by said board, and the ordering of the payment of the same by the drawing of a warrant therefor by said auditor against the county treasurer of said county, payable from road district No. 1 fund, the indorsement on the claim by the clerk of said board of his certificate certifying that the claim had been allowed in the sum of $873.80 by said board, at a regular meeting thereof, and the approval in due form of said claim by Mark Hein, supervisor of said supervisorial district No. 1, the delivery of said claim and warrant form, "and the said attached papers," with the said certificates indorsed thereon, to the said auditor, and alleges that the auditor has ever since held in his possession said claim, etc., and refuses and has at all times refused to issue and deliver to plaintiff his warrant for the said claim.

The answer, after denying the essential or material averments of the complaint, pleads three separate and distinct special defenses. The special defenses raise the principal question in this case, and present the theory upon which the defendant refused and still refuses to draw his warrant on the treasurer for the amount of the claim. The specific grounds taken in the several special defenses are not the same, but the three practically involve the same ultimate proposition which follows from the theory upon which the question of the validity of the claim was contested at the trial of the action, and is contested upon this appeal, to wit: That Mark Hein, supervisor of said supervisorial district, and as ex officio road commissioner of the road district embracing said supervisorial district, in violation of subdivision 11, section 2643 of the Political Code, as amended by the Legislature of 1919 (St. 1919, pp. 167, 168), himself undertook to enter into a contract with the plaintiff for the rock, and the delivery and "spreading" thereof over and along the roads in said district, at a sum in excess of the amount which it is legally competent for a county road commissioner to expend in the absence of a contract duly let and entered into for such a purpose by the board of supervisors.

It is further contended that there is a fatal variance between the claim as presented to and allowed by the board of supervisors and the claim as set out and relied upon in the petition for the writ of mandate. Objection is also made to the claim on the ground that it was not presented to the board in the form required by law. Several other like objections are made, all of which will hereinafter receive such notice as it may be conceived is required in disposing of this appeal.

That the principal question propounded here may, in the consideration and solution thereof, be the more clearly understood, it is orderly to present here the statutory provisions which are particularly pertinent thereto. Subdivision 11 of section 2643 of the Political Code, supra, reads as follows:

"Whenever it shall be determined that any grading, graveling, macadamizing, ditching, sprinkling, or other work upon highways is necessary, and is to be done, and where the estimated cost of such work amounts to more than one thousand dollars, the board of supervisors must, by proper order, direct the county surveyor to make definite surveys of the proposed work, and to prepare profiles and cross sections thereof, and to submit the same with the estimate of the amount or amounts of work to be done, and cost thereof, and with specifications thereof. Said report shall be prepared in duplicate, one copy to be filed in the surveyor's office, and the other to be filed with the clerk of the board of supervisors. The board upon receipt of such report must advertise for bids for the performance of the work specified. Such advertisement for bids must be published prior to the day fixed for the opening of bids, for at least once a week for a period of two weeks in a newspaper of general circulation printed and published in the county."

[1] It is manifest that, under the rule of expressio unius, etc., the above provision does not apply to any work that is specified therein where the cost thereof is less than or does not exceed the sum of $1,000. Where the cost of such work is no more than $1,000 or less than that amount, the same is to be done by the supervisor of each supervisorial district acting as ex officio road commissioner, under and by the authority of section 2645 of the Political Code, without observance of the formalities required by subdivision 11 of section 2643, or without the necessity of requiring any bond for the faithful performance of the work. In other words, where the work to be done does not involve a cost exceeding or which is less than the sum of $1,000, it is not necessary to let the same by contract, it being within the authority and indeed the duty of the road commissioners of a county, under section 2645, to keep their roads within their respective districts in good and proper repair, and to that end they are authorized to purchase materials and employ all help and provide equipment necessary for the proper execution of their duties in that particular.

Having thus presented the statute law which has direct application to the ultimate question of fact presented here, it is proper that we should now state in substance the evidence from which the court manifestly educed its findings of fact. This evidence may be summarized as follows:

That on the 19th day of April, 1919, the board of supervisors of Napa county adopted and passed a resolution instructing the clerk of said board to advertise for bids for furnishing 2,500 cubic yards of crushed rock at the "Harris quarry, in Carneros district," according to certain specifications; that, in pursuance of the direction so made, the clerk published a notice in a local newspaper calling for such bids, and stating that the rock was to be "screened in two sizes, as directed by Supervisor Mark Hein," one-third of said rock to be ready for delivery "immediately after June 1, 1919, and up to July 1, 1919, and the remaining two-thirds of said rock to be delivered before September 1, 1919." The notice further stated that "Napa county will furnish the rock crusher and power line leading from the county road to the quarry and transformers," the successful bidder or bidders to supply the necessary electric power and quarry equipment. Two several bids or tenders were duly filed in response to said notice, viz.: One by J. H. Hein (a brother of Supervisor Hein), for $1.25 per cubic yard, or an aggregate of $3,125 for the entire contract, and one by Simon Lenz, for $1.10 per cubic yard, or for the entire contract a total of $2,750. These bids were opened and considered by the board on the 14th day of May, 1919, and, upon motion of Supervisor Hein, the same were rejected.

Supervisor Hein, when testifying, explained the reasons for the rejection of both bids as follows:

"Prior to the opening of the bids, between the time of the advertising and the opening of the bids, we had given a Mr. Errington permission to use the quarry on the Harris ranch, and there was not room in the quarry for two operators; that is one of the reasons, and the other reason was, when I got far enough along, that is to open the bids, I found I could not comply with the specifications, as I had not the funds in district No. 1 to comply with our end of the specifications there."

It appears that the several different roads in Hein's district were in need of repairing, and that, subsequent to the rejection of the bids above spoken of, Hein, in order to put the said roads in proper condition, purchased and ordered from the plaintiff the quantity of crushed rock to be delivered and distributed at certain points on the different roads referred to. Hein testified that the ordering and purchasing of the rock for the roads was made at different times in the months of June and July. In other words, the order for the so-called "Fly District road" was given on June 25, 1919; and for the "Brown's Valley road" June 28th; for a cross road from Brown's valley to Carneros, 120 yards, July 3d; for the "Struve road," 90 yards, July 7th; for the "Mt. Veeder road," 80 yards, July 9th; for the "Jensen road," 10 yards, "Kilburn Street road," 10 yards, the "Steve Henry road," 60 yards, and the "Old Sonoma road," 75 yards, July 11th; for the "Raven Place road," 60 yards, July 16th; * * * for the "Orndorff Street road," 350 yards (the basis of the claim involved herein), July 26th. Hein testified that each of these orders was given separately, and separate delivery of the material made by the plaintiff. He also testified that the full scope of his arrangement with plaintiff was that the latter should furnish and deliver the rock at points on the road designated by him; that Sittig, himself, used his own equipment for transporting the rock from the quarry to the road, and hired and paid the men employed by him (plaintiff) to assist in such transportation. On the latter point Hein was corroborated by plaintiff. The said witness testified that the rock for the Orndorff street road was delivered between the 25th day of July and the 1st day of August, 1919.

Said Hein further testified that the work of scarifying the road preparatory to macadamizing it with the rock so furnished, and the work of macadamizing or spreading the material over and on those portions of the road which required repairing, were done by himself, personally (without expense to the county so far as his own labor was concerned), and one Franco, whom he had employed to assist him.

Franco testified that he worked 16½ days on several roads in road district No. 1, the Orndorff road being one, and for his services for all the work so done he was paid at the rate of $6 per day; that he presented two claims to the board for his services, one of them being for $84, for services performed on the Brown's Valley road. Franco said that he worked on the roads under the immediate direction of Supervisor Hein and that he so worked only as a laborer, and had no control of other laborers doing like work.

The plaintiff testified that he procured the crushed rock furnished by him for Supervisor Hein from the latter's brother, J. H. Hein, who was the same J. H. Hein who submitted one of the rejected bids for supplying road district No. 1 with that material. He further stated that he hauled and delivered the rock for use on Orndorff street at the points on said road designated by Supervisor Hein at some time after the 22d day of July (the date on which the statute of 1919 went into effect), and the 1st day of August, 1919, on which latter date, it should here be stated, the record shows that the county engineer, previously appointed by the board of supervisors, entered upon the discharge of his duties as such in pursuance of the terms of his appointment, and to whom, from said date on, the duties of the supervisors of Napa county, as ex officio road commissioners, were transferred and committed under the law.

The record of the proceedings of the board of supervisors showing the presentation and the allowance of the claim in dispute, on the 12th day of November, 1919, was introduced in evidence, as were likewise the certificate of plaintiff to the effect that the claim, as presented was correct, the certificate of Mark Hein, as supervisor of district No. 1, certifying to the necessity for the materials and services specified in the claim, and that he ordered the same, and that the rock was delivered, and the services performed as set forth by claimant in the claim, the warrant, with the indorsement of said Hein approving and ordering the same, paid, an unsigned blank certificate of the auditor, and a brief statement by the district attorney to the effect that the claim as presented was illegal.

The auditor testified that, upon the presentation of the claim to him, he filed the same, and then presented it to the board of supervisors, after which it was allowed by said board and returned to him by the clerk of the board, indorsed as above indicated. The claim was not itemized but was for the lump sum of $873.80 for "340 yards of rock crushed and hauled and spread on Orndorff street."

The evidence showed that some 11 other claims than the one for the rock furnished by plaintiff for Orndorff street were presented at the same time to the board of supervisors for rock furnished by said plaintiff to be used on other roads in the same district. The plaintiff testified that these claims were presented separately, because they were for purchases of rock ordered at different times, delivered at different times and used or to be used in the repair of different roads in said district.

From the evidence, of which the foregoing statement embraces a brief digest, the court found, in substance, as follows:

That between the 22d day of July, 1919, and the 31st day of July, 1919, the said Mark Hein, as road commissioner of road district No. 1, Napa county, purchased for said county from the petitioner, for the repair of the roads and highways in said road district, and the petitioner furnished, sold, and delivered to said county for said purpose of repair, 340 cubic yards of crushed rock, said rock having been delivered within the time above mentioned, and which was used for repair on a county road known as "Orndorff street," for the price of $873.80; that said Hein did not, as such road commissioner, nor otherwise, ever employ or engage petitioner to spread said rock upon said road, and that said petitioner did not spread said rock thereon, and that the said sum of $873.80 was the price of said 340 cubic yards of crushed rock, and did not include or comprise any sum whatsoever for any work, labor, or services appertaining to the spreading of said rock upon said road; that said Hein, at other times and on other occasions, also purchased crushed rock from petitioner for the repair of the roads in his supervisorial district other than the Orndorff Street road, and the same were delivered at different places and different times and in different quantities along and adjacent to such other roads in said district according as repair of said roads necessitated, the same to be so delivered and as might from time to time be determined by said road commissioner, "and that none of the said purchases included the spreading of rock upon said roads, or any thereof, and each and all of said purchases and deliveries of said crushed rock were independent of each other, and each purchase and delivery was complete in and of itself, and each comprised a separate and distinct transaction;" that the board of supervisors did not pursue or act upon the procedure set forth in subdivision 11 of section 2643 of the Political Code in the purchase and delivery of said rock for Orndorff street or any other roads for which such rock was purchased by the road commissioner of said district, "but, in each and all of said instances, including said Orndorff street, said rock was purchased by the said road commissioner for the repair of the roads in said road district as the conditions of said roads necessitating such repairs might from time to time arise or require of him or his successor, in performance of their official duties."

The court further found:

"That it is true that 11 other claims against said county of Napa were presented by petitioner to said board of supervisors, but each one of said claims related to transactions independent of, and not embraced within, nor in any manner dependent upon or forming a part of the transaction for the purchase of said rock for said Orndorff street, upon which these proceedings are based, and that each of said eleven claims so presented were separately considered, acted upon, and allowed by the said board of supervisors, and separate warrants were issued by said auditor of said county of Napa for the payment of each thereof, and each and all of said warrants were delivered to said petitioner by said auditor, and paid by the county treasurer of said county, prior to the commencement of these proceedings."

[2-4] That the foregoing findings derive sufficient support from the evidence is plainly apparent from the above-epitomized statement of the facts. It is readily to be conceded, though, that the record discloses some evidence which tends in a measure to support the theory of the defendant that the manner in which the several orders for crushed rock were made by Supervisor Hein was adopted by that officer for no other reason than to enable him to evade the law requiring the board of supervisors to let all contracts for certain specified work on the roads of the county involving an expenditure of more than $1,000 only after proposals for doing such work have been duly advertised for and accepted; but this is only to say that there exists in the evidence addressed to that vital question a conflict which must be required to abide where its determination by the trial court has left it. It must therefore be accepted as settled propositions of fact in this case that the purchase of the crushed rock for the Orndorff street road by the road commissioner of road district No. 1, and upon which the claim in controversy arose and is founded, constituted a transaction separate from, independent of, and in no way connected with any other transaction occurring about the same time, and affecting said district, and that, the amount of the cost incident to said purchase being less than the sum of $1,000 in the purchase of said rock or the delivery thereof for said Orndorff street, the board of supervisors of Napa county did not "follow, pursue, or act upon the procedure set forth in subdivision 11 of section 2643 of the Political Code." And from these facts it follows as a matter of law, as the court below adjudged, that the claim was and is a legal one against the county of Napa and upon the fund of road district No. 1.

If the foregoing considerations embraced all that there was to this appeal, it is manifest that they would alone be decisive of this appeal, but, as seen, the counsel for the appellant presents and presses upon us certain objections to the validity of the claim founded in an alleged failure of the claimant and the board of supervisors to follow the form prescribed for the presentation and allowance of claims against the treasury of a county. It is further urged, as we have already stated, that there is a fatal variance between the claim as presented to and allowed by the board of supervisors and the claim as pleaded under an amendment of the complaint allowed by the court in the course of the trial on the application of counsel for the plaintiff. These objections we will now consider, and the last stated will first receive attention.

The claim, as presented to and allowed by the board, as will be noted, was for "340 yards rock crushed and hauled and spread on Orndorff street." The effect of the amendment of the complaint was merely to strike therefrom the words "and spread," as they appeared in said complaint in its original draft, and which, following the exact phraseology of the claim in suit, were used as descriptive of said claim. Thus, so it is argued, a variance arose between the claim as presented to and allowed by the board and the claim as pleaded.

The objection is extremely technical, and, if upon its face it does not appear to be without merit, the testimony of both Sittig and Supervisor Hein does show such to be the case. These witnesses testified that the arrangement between them for the supplying of the rock was that it should be delivered to the Orndorff street road and dumped at such places on or along said road as the supervisor should designate. Sittig said that when any of his trucks reached the road with a load of rock the bed of the truck would be opened, so that, as the truck continued in motion, the rock would be dumped or scattered on and over the road. This process was frequently referred to by the plaintiff while testifying as the act of "spreading" the rock on the road, but he explained that in thus describing the delivery of the rock he meant dumping or scattering it, as above indicated. Supervisor Hein also testified that it was not the understanding that plaintiff should do more than deliver the macadam as above described, or that the latter should spread the rock on and over the road as in repair thereof.

[5] Thus it appears quite clear that both plaintiff and said Hein, as ex officio road commissioner, so understood the signification of the word "spread" as it was used in the claim as presented and allowed. And, since such was the understanding of said Hein, a member of the board, it may be assumed that the board itself, in considering and passing upon the claim, had a like understanding of it, and was therefore not misled by the improper use of the word "spread" therein.

What is said above applies with equal force to the objection that the court found that the county was indebted to plaintiff on a liability different from that for which he presented his claim to the board of supervisors. The alleged "different liability" found by the court arises out of the amendment of the complaint above referred to, the finding as to the liability following the proof addressed to the nature of the claim as it was described by the complaint as amended.

The objections to the form in which the claim was prepared, presented to, and allowed by the board of supervisors are these: First, that the said claim was not presented and the payment thereof ordered in the form or according to the procedure adopted by the board of supervisors of the county of Napa, with the approval of the state board of control, in pursuance of section 4076 of the Political Code, in that the claimant, in the place of attaching to the claim an affidavit stating that the claim and items as therein set out are true and correct, and that no part thereof has been paid, merely annexed his certificate thereto, certifying to the correctness of the claim; second, that there was not annexed to the claim a certificate either by the county clerk or the county auditor, "as to the correctness of the computations" of the itemized statement of the claim, as required by subdivision 3 of said section 4076.

[6] It is true, as the record shows, that the claim in dispute was not supported by the affidavit of the plaintiff, nor was there annexed thereto the certificate of the clerk of the board or the auditor which is required by the third subdivision of section 4076. Of course, it cannot be doubted for a moment that these omissions constituted irregularities in the matter of the presentation to and the allowance of the claim by the board of supervisors.

We are of the opinion, however, that these irregularities, since they merely go to the form or the procedure by which the claim was presented and allowed, were cured by the action of the board in allowing the claim. In other words, inasmuch as it is, under the law as we have pointed it out above, within the general powers of the members of the board of supervisors as such, acting in their ex officio capacities as road commissioners, to order materials for and cause work to be done in the repairing of the roads within their respective road districts, where the cost thereof in no case exceeds the sum of $1,000, or is less than that amount, the allowance of a claim therefor by the board of supervisors, although said claim be irregular in form, amounted to a recognition of the correctness of the claim, and therefore a ratification of the act of the road commissioner resulting in the creation of the liability upon which the claim is founded. As is said in the case of Power v. May, 114 Cal. 207, 46 Pac. 6, quoting from the syllabi:

"The board of supervisors may, under certain circumstances, allow a claim against the county, although the formalities necessary to bind it were not originally employed. Thus, in respect to a matter concerning which the board had original power, it may, provided the service has been rendered, or the money expended for the benefit of the county in a manner authorized by law, cure informalities or irregularities in procedure by a subsequent ratification and recognition of its liability."

The doctrine of recognition by ratification of a liability against a county, arising upon an agreement or understanding which it is within the general powers of the county to make for the benefit of the county, is considered and approved by a large array of authorities, many of which may be found cited in the footnotes of 15 Corpus Juris, p. 544, § 250. The rule is stated in the text as follows:

"Not only may the unauthorized contracts of a county be given validity by curative statutes, but contracts made on behalf of the county, and within the general powers of the county to make, but made in an irregular manner or by agents without the requisite authority, may be ratified by such county through the agents who would have been authorized in the first place to make such contract, and this ratification may be either express or implied, provided some official action by the proper authorities is taken in reference to the particular matter in question. The ratification must be made by the proper authorities in the same capacity in which they were required to act in making the contract in the first instance, and with full knowledge of the existence and nature of the contract in question. The unauthorized agent who made the contract cannot ratify it. It is also essential that the contract be of such a nature that the body assuming to ratify it would have had the power to make it in the first instance. A contract wholly unauthorized and void cannot be ratified."

See, also, S. F., etc., v. Dunn, 62 Cal. 580 et seq.; Irwin v. County of Yuba, 119 Cal. 686, 690, 52 Pac. 35; Smeltzer v. Miller, 125 Cal. 41, 57 Pac. 668; Power v. May, 123 Cal. 147, 55 Pac. 796; Buck v. City of Eureka, 124 Cal. 61, 56 Pac. 612; Spence v. Clay County, 122 Ark. 157, 182 S. W. 573; Appel v. State, 9 Wyo. 187, 61 Pac. 1015.

It may further be added that, as to the proposition that the claim, as presented to the board, was fatally defective in that there was not annexed thereto a certificate of the auditor authenticating the "correctness of the computations" of the claim, another reply thereto is that the claim was put in for a lump sum for the total amount of the rock furnished and delivered by the plaintiff, without stating in itemized form the number of cubic yards of rock so furnished and delivered, and there was, therefore, no "computation" to be made by the auditor as to said claim. We are, of course, not to be understood as holding that the claim as presented and allowed was in due legal form. To the contrary, it is obvious that it was not; for clearly the proper way to have prepared and presented it was to state therein the number of cubic yards supplied and delivered for use on Orndorff street. What we do say, though, is that the failure to present the claim in that form amounted only to an informality or irregularity, or in other words, did not involve the omission to observe a jurisdiction prerequisite to the due consideration of the claim by the board.

The cases cited by defendant as supporting his position that the mode prescribed by the statute for the presentation of claims against a county must, to legally authorize the board of supervisors to allow such claims, be strictly followed, are not in point here. No useful purpose would be subserved by a review herein of all the cases so cited. It is enough to say, in referring to the doctrine of those cases, that it has never been questioned that, as to certain matters coming within the legal cognizance of the governing board and other officers of a county, the mode prescribed by the statute is the measure of the power of such officers, and that in such cases "the method of initiating the proceeding must be followed in order to make a valid exercise of the power there conferred." Larsen v. City & County of San Francisco, 182 Cal. 1, 6, 186 Pac. 757, 760. But we think it will be found to be generally true that in those instances where the mode prescribed for the doing of certain official acts is the measure of the power for doing them, the acts so required to be done are essentially jurisdictional—that is, they constitute jurisdictional prerequisites to a valid exercise of the power conferred and sought to be exercised. For, instance, let us take the case of Reams v. Cooley, 171 Cal. 150, 152 Pac. 293, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 1260, one among the more recently decided cases cited by defendant. In that case a writ of mandate was sought to compel the superintendent of schools of Imperial county to approve and allow a warrant in the sum of $531 drawn in favor of the appellant by the board of trustees of the central union high school district of Imperial county. The claim upon which the warrant was allowed by said board of trustees was for doing certain plastering work on the school building in said school district, the same not having been done according to the method prescribed by subdivision 22 of section 1617 of the Political Code, as that section and subdivision read prior to the amendment thereof by the Legislature of 1913. The said subdivision of said section provided that before making any contract for the expenditure of more than $200 it was necessary for the board of trustees of a school district—

"to publish a notice calling for bids, stating the work to be done or materials or supplies to be furnished, and the time when and place where bids will be opened, at least once a week for two weeks in some daily or weekly newspaper published in the county," etc.

This course was not pursued. It was held that the claim was illegal and a writ of mandate was refused. The court said:

"Where the statute prescribes the only mode by which the power to contract shall be exercised the mode is the measure of the power. A contract made otherwise than as so prescribed is not binding or obligatory as a contract and the doctrine of implied liability has no application in such cases"—citing a number of cases.

The distinction between that case (Reams v. Cooley) and the instant case is obvious. In the former, there were certain steps required to be taken before the board of trustees could legally authorize the work to be done. In the present case, it was, under the law, within the discretion of the road commissioner and his duty to keep the roads in his district in repair, and, without resorting to any formalities for that purpose, purchase such materials and employ such labor as might be necessary to enable him to discharge that duty. When he has done this, and the cost has not exceeded the sum of $1,000, a legal liability thereupon has arisen against the county for the materials and labor so furnished.

Manifestly no such liability could arise under subdivision 11 of section 2643, unless the terms upon which such liability may be created as prescribed by said subdivision are followed with substantial strictness; and this is precisely the situation that is presented in the case of Reams v. Cooley. The procedure prescribed for the presentation to and consideration by the board of supervisors of a claim based upon a liability created under section 2645 of the Political Code, vesting supervisors, as road commissioners, with the power, discretion, and duty of keeping the roads in their respective districts in good repair, is, as we have before declared, merely formal, and in no sense jurisdictional.

The judgment is affirmed.

53 Cal. App. 744

PEOPLE v. KRUVOSKY. (Cr. 962.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 5, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §74(1), 742(1) — Weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses for jury.

The weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses are, in the first instance, peculiarly within the province of the jury.

2. Criminal law §1160—Trial court's conclusion as to evidence supporting verdict not disturbed unless evidence inherently improbable.

After the verdict has been rendered, the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses are for the trial judge on motion for new trial, and his conclusion as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict will not be disturbed by the appellate court unless it is obvious that the testimony upon which the conviction was had is so inherently improbable as to be impossible of belief.

3. Criminal law §1170½(5)—Admission of testimony harmless where defendant himself testified as to same facts.

The action of the court in permitting cross-examination claimed to be improper, if error, was harmless, where the defendant himself testified as to the facts elicited on such cross-examination.

4. Witnesses §379(11)—Statement of witness held properly admitted for impeachment where no evidence of duress.

A signed statement previously made by a witness was properly admitted for purpose of impeachment over the objection that it was secured by duress, where there was no evidence of such duress.

5. Criminal law §369(2), 372(1)—Evidence of other crimes stated admissible where crimes are intermixed or details of criminal scheme.

Generally, evidence of an offense other than the one for which the defendant is being tried is not admissible, but if several crimes are intermixed or connected, so that they form an indivisible criminal transaction, and full proof of any one of them cannot be given without showing the others, evidence of one or all is admissible against a defendant on trial for any offense which is itself a detail of the whole criminal scheme.

6. Criminal law §369(8)—Evidence as to assault on prosecutrix's companion at same place and time admissible.

In a prosecution for rape, evidence as to an assault with intent to commit rape upon a companion of the prosecutrix, by the defendant and others, at the same place where the attack was made upon the prosecutrix, and at about the same time, held admissible, the crimes being so connected as to form an indivisible criminal transaction.

7. Criminal law §372(1)—Testimony as to other crime held admissible in view of conspiracy.

In a prosecution for rape, testimony as to an assault with intent to rape made upon a companion of the prosecutrix by defendant and others associated with him, at the same place that the rape was committed, and at about the same time, held admissible, in view of evidence establishing a conspiracy between defendant and others to commit the crime charged, and showing that both crimes were committed as a part of the same plan and design.

8. Criminal law §374—Conspiracy may be proved by circumstantial evidence.

In proving a conspiracy, so as to warrant admission of evidence of other offenses committed as a part of the same plan it is not necessary to prove that the parties met and actually agreed to undertake performance of the unlawful act, but conspiracy may be shown by proof of circumstances sufficient to satisfy the jury of its existence, leaving the weight and sufficiency of the evidence to the triers of questions of fact.

9. Rape ⚡40(1) — Witnesses ⚡340(3) — Testimony as to moral delinquency of prosecutrix admissible to show consent in rape case, but not admissible as affecting her credibility.

In rape prosecution, evidence as to the unchastity of the prosecutrix is admissible on the question of consent, but evidence of her moral delinquency is not admissible as affecting her general credibility as a witness.

10. Criminal law ⚡940—Denial of new trial for newly discovered evidence held not error where materiality not shown.

In prosecution for rape, in which the prosecutrix stated the different residences at which she had lived, denial of new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence that she had resided at a place not enumerated by her during such testimony held not error, in the absence of a showing as to the materiality of such testimony.

11. Witnesses ⚡344(2)—Prosecutrix cannot be impeached by evidence of sexual relations with men other than defendant.

In a prosecution for rape, prosecutrix could not be impeached by testimony as to sexual relations with men other than the defendant, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, providing that a witness cannot be impeached "by evidence of particular wrongful acts."

12. Rape ⚡51(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

Evidence held to sustain conviction for rape as against contention that it was so improbable as to be unworthy of belief.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Edward Kruvosky was convicted of rape, and from the judgment and an order denying defendant a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Edmond H. Lomasney, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Matthew Brady, Asst. Dist. Atty., and Stanislaus A. Riley, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of the crime of rape. The first objection of the appellant that the verdict of the jury is contrary to the evidence may be disposed of briefly. The verdict is supported by the testimony of Jessie Montgomery, the prosecutrix, and by the testimony of Jean Stanley, who was her companion on the night of the crime. The jury believed this testimony, which was corroborated in part by the physical condition of the two women, who were bruised and beaten when found by the police within a short time after the assaults upon them, and by other evidence. Counsel for appellant argued to the jury, and now argues to this court that the testimony of the two girls should not be believed. It is urged that the testimony of the prosecutrix in the present case differs from her testimony in the trial of a similar case against another defendant for a crime committed at the same place on the same evening. The testimony in the other case was introduced in evidence in the present case. Any apparent contradiction between it and the testimony in the present case was explained by the witness herself upon the stand. The argument of the appellant as to the improbability of certain testimony given by the prosecutrix concerning the matter of defendant's return to the house where she was lying helpless after his earlier assault, and his subsequent assault upon her, together with his argument as to the improbability of the testimony of the prosecutrix with reference to being forced to drink intoxicating liquor, was made to the jury; but evidently the testimony did not seem so improbable to them as to destroy its weight.

[1, 2] The weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses are in the first instance peculiarly within the province of the jury when deliberating upon the guilt or innocence of a defendant. After their verdict has been rendered, the determination of such questions rests solely with the trial judge in passing upon a motion for a new trial. His conclusion as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict will not be disturbed by this court save in those rare cases where it obviously appears that the testimony upon which the conviction was had is so inherently improbable as to be impossible of belief. People v. Von Perhacs, 20 Cal. App. 48, 127 Pac. 1048. In the present case the jury, in its verdict, and the trial judge, in denying the motion for a new trial passed upon the weight and sufficiency of the testimony against the defendant.

[3] The second objection made by appellant is as to the scope of the cross-examination which was permitted of the witness Allen McDonald. It is not necessary for us to decide whether or not this cross-examination covered too broad a field, for the reason that objection was made to but two questions upon that ground, and the answers thereto permitted, over the objections of defendant, were not in the least prejudicial to the defendant. The prosecutrix had testified that the defendant had assaulted her, and had later left the house; that she was lying on a mattress on the floor, stripped of her clothing, and bruised and exhausted; that after a time the defendant and the witness McDonald returned to the house and again assaulted her, and remained there until they were taken into custody by the police.

The defendant had testified to having been at the house in question during the hours covered by the testimony of the prosecuting witness, and had admitted leaving the house and returning to it again with McDonald, but had denied the assaults. He stated that he returned to the house to get his overcoat, which he had forgotten. McDonald was put upon the stand by the defendant, and interrogated regarding his meeting with defendant on the street after defendant had left the house, and regarding their return to the house together. He testified as to what occurred from the time they re-entered the house until the arrival of the police.

Upon cross-examination, the district attorney asked: "Q. Was that the first occasion on that evening when you saw Krivosky, when you met him at Ninth and Howard?" Objection was made to this question upon the ground that it was not cross-examination, and did not relate to anything testified to on direct examination. The objection was overruled, and the answer was: "No, sir." No prejudice could possibly have been suffered by the defendant by reason of this answer, because he himself had testified that McDonald had been at the house, and that defendant himself had been there during the hours covered by the testimony of Jessie Montgomery and Jean Stanley. No further objection was made to the cross-examination upon this ground until the following question was asked the witness: "Now what part of the house did this party go into?" This was objected to, on the ground that the witness had not been examined on direct examination about anything regarding the "party." The objection was overruled, and the answer was: "They went into the room as you enter on the left—the front room on the left."

Certainly, the defendant was not prejudiced by this answer. He had himself testified that when he arrived with the others at the house where the crime was alleged to have been committed, the party entered the house and went into the front room "on the left-hand side." There was no dispute about this fact whatever, and this answer by the witness McDonald could in no way have been prejudicial to the defendant. Later in the cross-examination objection was made by the attorney for the defendant to the use by the district attorney of the word "party" in referring to those who were at the house at the time under discussion. The objection was stated as follows: "Now, if your honor please, I object to the 'party,' and ask that the district attorney say who they were. There were several there." The district attorney amended his question so as to refer to "the party comprising Krivosky and his companions," to which counsel objected on the ground that "his companions" was not a sufficiently definite term, and asked that the parties be named.

[4] There was no objection interposed to any of the other questions asked upon cross-examination. The prosecution introduced in evidence, for the purpose of impeachment, a signed statement previously made by the witness. Counsel for defendant objected to the introduction of this statement, on the ground that it was "secured from the man under duress, that he signed it against his will, that he was beaten and abused by the police before he signed it, and the only reason that he signed it was so that they might cease their brutal treatment." There was no evidence of any kind offered to sustain these charges. The record contains not one word upon these matters except the statement of counsel. Under such circumstances, this objection was properly overruled.

[5, 6] The next objection is to the admission of evidence as to an assault with intent to commit rape made upon Jean Stanley, the companion of the prosecuting witness, by the defendant and others at the same house where the attack upon Jessie Montgomery was made, and at about the same time. While it is the general rule that evidence of an offense other than the one for which the defendant is being tried may not be admitted in evidence against him, there are certain exceptions to this rule. An exception applicable to the present case is well stated in the case of People v. Ciulla, 187 Pac. 46, where it is said:

"If several crimes are intermixed or blended with one another, or connected so that they form an indivisible criminal transaction, and full proof by testimony, whether direct or circumstantial, of any one of them cannot be given without showing the others, evidence of one or all of them is admissible against a defendant on trial for any offense which is itself a detail of the whole criminal scheme."

In the present case the testimony of Jean Stanley bearing upon the crime with which the defendant was charged could not be given without the recital of offenses against herself. The whole brutal story is so interwoven, and its incidents are so inseparable, that proof of the crime with which defendant is charged here must necessarily involve a reference to other offenses by him, such as assault with intent to commit rape, assault and battery, illegal purchase of intoxicating liquors, etc. But, under the rule laid down in the case of People v. Ciulla, supra, this testimony may, nevertheless, be admitted under the circumstances shown here.

[7, 8] Furthermore, the evidence in the record before us is sufficient to establish a conspiracy on the part of the defendant and others to commit the crime with which he is charged. In proving a conspiracy it is not necessary that proof be made that the parties met and actually agreed to undertake the performance of the unlawful act, but a conspiracy may be shown by proof of facts and circumstances sufficient to satisfy the jury of the existence of the conspiracy, leaving the weight and sufficiency of the evidence to the triers of the questions of fact.

People v. Schmidt, 33 Cal. App. 426, 444, 165 Pac. 555.

In the present case, the evidence shows that the crime against Jessie Montgomery and the crime against Jean Stanley were both committed as part of a plan and design entered into by the defendant and others. The evidence showed that the defendant and several other men held a whispered conversation in the Stroller's café, after meeting the girls, which conversation was not overheard by the girls. Shortly thereafter the girls and their escorts left the café and entered an automobile. The defendant and several other men also left the café and entered the automobile, which was driven to the house on Howard street where the crime was committed. The men entered, and the girls were later persuaded to enter. The door was opened by a man in charge of the house, and when the party entered the doors were locked after them. The girls later found, upon trying to escape, that all the doors had been locked. Intoxicating drinks were served frequently and regularly, and one of the girls was forced to drink, after she had refused to drink any more willingly. Several of the men assisted in this compulsion. One of the girls was then taken into the kitchen and told to remove her clothing and dance for the men there. Upon her refusal she was knocked down by a blow from the defendant. The other girl, upon coming to her rescue, was struck a severe blow in the face, which loosened her teeth and broke her nose, and otherwise injured her. One girl was then dragged into the bathroom, where she was assaulted by the defendant. The other girl was attacked by several men, and succeeded in escaping through a window, which she broke. The men had, in the meantime, turned their attention to the girl who was lying in the bathroom stunned—Jessie Montgomery—and upon becoming conscious she found herself in another room upon a mattress, where she was again assaulted by the defendant and others, after they had torn off all of her clothing. It appears that one of the men whom she charged with having assaulted her left the house at one time, and stood outside on guard to learn if the noise and cries of the girls could be heard from the outside. It was he who turned out the lights after one of the girls had escaped through the window, and who warned the others to leave, as "the cops" were coming.

Substantially the same facts were considered by division 1 of this court in the case of People v. Murphy, 200 Pac. 484, which was a prosecution of one of the other men who assaulted Jessie Montgomery upon this evening. In that case the court held that the conspiracy was established, and the testimony of Jean Stanley regarding an attempted crime against herself was properly admissible upon that theory.

[9] Appellant objects to an instruction by the trial court "that the moral delinquency of the girl complainant, if there be such moral delinquency, is not to be considered as affecting her credibility." In this state, in cases of this character the rule is that evidence of the unchastity of the prosecutrix is admissible as bearing on the question of consent, but evidence of her moral delinquency is inadmissible as affecting her general credibility as a witness. People v. Murphy, 200 Pac. 484. While we do not lend our approval to the instruction as given in this case, yet, for the reasons given in the case of People v. Murphy, supra, we do not believe that it was prejudicial.

Appellant's next objection is predicated upon the refusal of the trial court to permit the filing of certain affidavits in support of defendant's motion for a new trial. The affidavits were sworn to by Ludwig Achsman and Frieda Achsman, his wife, and were to the effect that on a certain date there had been residing at their home at 67 Crocker street, San Francisco, a young woman who had given her name to them as Jeanette Warden; that from the pictures appearing in the newspapers of the witness Jean Stanley, affiants believe that Jeanette Warden and Jean Stanley are one and the same person; that said Jeanette Warden worked at the Sanitary Laundry at the time she resided at the home of affiants; that while said Jeanette Warden was so residing at the home of affiants, the said Ludwig Achsman discovered a strange man in his kitchen one morning at about 4 o'clock; that this man was in his shirt sleeves, and that the kitchen of said residence was a room next to the room occupied by Miss Warden; that said Ludwig Achsman pursued said strange man into the street, but failed to catch him; that later in the day, when Miss Warden returned from her work, the said Achsman accused her of knowing this man, and of having received him in her room. She replied that the man must have been a burglar, and later said that she would rather go to jail than tell anything she knew. Said Achsman then told Miss Warden to leave his home, which she did.

[10, 11] Appellant contends that these affidavits furnished evidence impeaching the witness Jean Stanley, and that their subject-matter was newly discovered evidence, material to the defense. This argument is predicated upon the fact that, in the cross-examination of Miss Stanley, she had been asked if she had ever worked at the Sanitary Laundry, to which she had replied in the affirmative. Witness was then asked:

"At the time you worked in the Sanitary Laundry where did you reside? A. I lived at the Osirin Apartments, at Sixteenth and Mission."

Appellant contends that, because the affidavits indicate that Miss Stanley lived at 67 Crocker street for at least a part of the time that she worked at the Sanitary Laundry, therefore such affidavits contradict the testimony of the witness above quoted. It is possible, of course, that the witness may have moved to the Osirin Apartments after leaving 67 Crocker street. Appellant contends, however, that at another place in the testimony of this witness she enumerated the places at which she had lived since her arrival in San Francisco, and that 67 Crocker street was not enumerated among them, and that she stated that the places of residence which she so enumerated were the only places where she had lived in San Francisco. Even though this be true, it was not a contradiction in a material matter. The affidavits themselves state that the young woman known as Jeanette Warden lived at 67 Crocker street for only about 10 days, and it does not appear that this matter is of any materiality. Under these circumstances, this portion of the affidavit, taken in connection with the testimony of the witness, was clearly insufficient to cause the court to grant the defendant a new trial, and the remaining portions of the affidavit were clearly inadmissible for any purpose, and it was doubtless because of their inclusion therein that the trial court properly ordered the affidavits stricken from the record.

Jean Stanley was not the prosecutrix. Had she been, evidence of sexual relations with men other than the defendant might have been relevant upon the issue of consent, had that been made a defense. But the defendant not being charged here with having assaulted Jean Stanley, evidence of her sexual relations with another man was quite irrelevant and immaterial. The Code provides the method of impeaching a witness (section 2051 Code Civ. Proc.), namely: By contradictory evidence or by evidence that his (her) general reputation for truth, honesty, or integrity is bad, but not by evidence of particular wrongful acts, except that it may be shown by the examination of the witness, or the record of the judgment, that he (she) had been convicted of a felony. Appellant contends that these affidavits were to lay a foundation for impeachment of the witness, but we think they were not admissible for such purpose. At most, they furnished inconclusive and merely circumstantial evidence of a particular wrongful act on the part of the witness.

[12] The foregoing constitutes the specific assignments of error made by the appellant. In addition, he complains of the condition of the public mind at the time of the trial of the defendant, and of the effect upon the rights of the defendant. No motion was made for a change of venue. Reference is made to the sensational accounts printed daily in the newspapers about matters connected with the orgy at the Howard street shack. The jury was carefully instructed by the trial judge not to read the newspapers, nor to discuss the case with any one, and there is no evidence in the record that any of them disobeyed these instructions. The record contains so much that is brutal and revolting that it would be strange indeed if there had not been an outburst of indignation from all good citizens. These things are inherent in the crime itself. But, despite the righteous indignation that must be aroused in all decent persons by the sordid testimony contained in the record in this case, there is nothing in the record to suggest that the defendant was not accorded a fair trial in every particular. On the contrary, the record is extraordinarily free from error, and every substantial right of the defendant was therein fully protected and freely accorded. The record overwhelmingly convicts him. There could be but one verdict upon such evidence, and that the jury has correctly rendered.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CAREY. (Cr. 969.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 5, 1921. Rehearing Denied Sept. 3, 1921.)

1. Criminal law §811(5)—Instruction on credibility of one witness singled out from others held improper.

In prosecution for rape, instruction that "the moral delinquency of the girl complainant, if there be any such moral delinquency, is not to be considered as affecting her credibility," held improper, in that it singled out one witness from all of those who had appeared before the jury.

2. Criminal law §1172(2)—Instruction on credibility of witnesses held harmless in view of evidence.

In prosecution for rape, instruction as to credibility of prosecutrix, though improper in that it singled out such witness from others who had testified, was not ground for reversal where a careful review of the entire evidence fails to show that defendant was prejudiced thereby.

3. Criminal law §1172(1)—Instruction held harmless in view of evidence.

In prosecution for rape, instruction that one who aids and abets in a crime is a principal, though jury might have found that defendant might merely have aided others in the commission of the crime, held harmless where evidence of the assaults of all the others was admitted without objection.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

James Carey was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Herron, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Matthew Brady, Asst. Dist. Atty., and Stanislaus A. Riley, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for the People.

NOURSE, J. Appellant was convicted on an indictment charging forcible rape upon Jessie Montgomery. He appeals from the resultant judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is first urged that the testimony of the prosecutrix is inherently improbable and insufficient to justify the verdict. This testimony is substantially the same as that reviewed in People v. Murphy, 200 Pac. 484, and in People v. Kruvosky, 200 Pac. 831, this day decided. It is not necessary to review it here. It is enough to say that it was sufficient, if believed, to justify the verdict, and that it is not so improbable as to warrant this court in setting aside the verdict. The fact that when the prosecutrix was confronted with appellant she merely identified him as one of the party, and did not specifically charge him with rape, is said to be highly significant. But the prosecutrix was merely asked to make the identification.

[1, 2] Criticism is made of the following instruction:

"You are further instructed that the moral delinquency of the girl complainant, if there be any such moral delinquency, is not to be considered as affecting her credibility."

The vice of this instruction is that it singles out one witness from all those who appeared before the jury. The jury is told that the moral delinquency of that one cannot be considered by them, thus giving the impression that the moral delinquency of others might be considered. Though the instruction, as given, cannot be defended, a careful review of the entire record in this particular case fails to show that defendant was prejudiced by it. People v. Murphy, supra. The same criticism of the instruction on the flight of defendant which was made in the Murphy Case is made here, and the court in that case correctly disposed of that objection.

[3] Appellant was charged in the indictment as a principal. The court instructed the jury that one who aids and abets in the commission of a crime is a principal. This instruction is criticized upon the ground that the jury may have found that appellant merely aided Kruvosky or some other member of the party in the commission of the crime, whereas the indictment does not designate such person as a principal. But evidence of the assaults of all the others was admitted without objection, and no prejudice resulted from this instruction.

On the hearing of appellant's motion for a new trial, the court made use of the transcript of the proceedings in People v. MacDonald, 200 Pac. 491. The record discloses that the discussion between court and counsel on this subject occurred after the court had determined to deny the motion, and that the MacDonald record was used by the court to satisfy counsel of the correctness of that ruling, rather than as a basis for it.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Ex parte SPAGNOLI. (Cr. 1005.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 14, 1921.)

1. Habeas corpus ☞3—Writ held not to be proper remedy for failure to proceed to trial of indictments.

Where defendant, convicted and imprisoned for rape, and indicted for five other felonies growing out of the same offenses, complains that the court refuses without cause to proceed to trial on the other indictments, habeas corpus is not the proper remedy, mandamus being available to petitioner.

2. Mandamus ☞61—Mandamus is the proper remedy for a refusal to try a defendant on an indictment within the statutory period.

Where the superior court, without good cause, has postponed the trial of defendant without his consent beyond 60 days allowed by statute, he is entitled to relief by a proceeding in mandamus, on a proper showing, to compel a dismissal of the indictment.

In the matter of the application of Ernest E. D. Spagnoli for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of Edmund Murphy. Writ denied.

PER CURIAM. [1] This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus. From the facts alleged in the petition, it appears that Edmund Murphy is confined in the state prison at San Quentin under and by virtue of a certified copy of a judgment of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco based upon the conviction of said Murphy of the crime of rape. Coincident with the return of the indictment upon which he was convicted, the grand jury returned five other indictments, accusing the defendant with various felonies growing out of the same offenses. Petitioner complains that the superior court refuses, without cause, to proceed to trial on any of the charges contained in said last-mentioned indictments.

[2] Assuming that to be true, the petitioner is not in a position to avail himself of this proceeding in habeas corpus. Where the superior court, without good cause, has postponed the trial of a defendant, without his consent, beyond the 60 days within which the statute requires he must be tried or the indictment against him dismissed, he is entitled to relief by a proceeding in mandamus on a proper showing, to compel a dismissal of the indictment. Ex parte SPAGNOLI. (Cr. 1009.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 12, 1921.)

Criminal law ⇨1218—Statute allowing jury to determine place of imprisonment construed as applying to rape committed without force.

Where in a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 3, for rape by force on a woman over 16 and less than 18 years of age, it was not incumbent on the jury under Pen. Code, § 264, to determine whether defendant should be imprisoned in the county jail or the state penitentiary, since section 264 applies only to subdivision 1 of section 261, relating to rape committed without force.

Application of Ernest B. D. Spagnoli for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of Edmund Murphy, to be directed to the Warden of San Quentin prison. Writ denied.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli, of San Francisco, pro se.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of Edmund Murphy, who is imprisoned in the state prison, under conviction and sentence for the crime of rape of Jessie Montgomery, accomplished against her will and consent, and over her resistance. The jury rendered a general verdict of "guilty of the crime of felony, to wit, rape, as charged in the indictment." The court thereupon sentenced the defendant to imprisonment in the state prison at San Quentin.

On this application it is contended that because, during the trial, Jessie Montgomery testified that she was but 17 years of age at the time the rape was accomplished, it became incumbent upon the jury, under section 264 of the Penal Code, to determine whether or not the defendant, if found guilty, should be imprisoned in the county jail or in the state prison. A complete answer to the contention is that said section is, by its terms, only made applicable in cases in which the prosecution is for offenses under subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code, the rape being accomplished without force, and the female being over the age of 16 years and under the age of 18 years, in which cases the jury has discretionary power to fix the place of imprisonment in either the county jail or in the state prison. In the case at hand, the offense was under subdivision 3 of the section, being accomplished over the resistance of the prosecutrix, by means of force and violence.

The application for a writ is denied.

BERONIO v. EVERETT-JOHNSON LUMBER CO. (Civ. 3795.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 9, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 6, 1921.)

Brokers ⇨94—Mere soliciting agent could not bind seller.

A mere soliciting agent employed to obtain orders, which were subject to the approval of the seller, and for which, when accepted, he received a commission, had no power to bind the seller by making a sale.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by A. V. Beronio against the Everett-Johnson Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Brownstone & Goodman, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Henry A. Jacobs and G. B. Blanckenburg, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. Action for damages for failure on the part of defendant to deliver a carload of lumber. Plaintiff had judgment for $562.50, and defendant appeals. Appellant urges several grounds for reversal. It is first contended that the alleged order of sale was taken by a soliciting agent of defendant, subject to confirmation, which was never had, and that such agent had no express or implied authority to make the sale. It is also urged that the parties never reached an agreement with respect to the terms of sale. Objection is also made that whatever agreement was entered into was violative of the statute of frauds, for the reason that it did not contain the essential terms and conditions of the alleged sale, nor was it signed or delivered or intended to bind defendant.

There is no conflict in the testimony concerning the transaction leading up to the alleged sale. The entire case in this respect rests upon the testimony of plaintiff and the agent of defendant company. It appears therefrom without contradiction that defendant was engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling lumber, its principal place of business being at Portland, Ore. One E. L. Fifield was employed by the company as a soliciting agent for the sale of its products. Fifield maintained an office in San Francisco. On or about April 10, 1919, plaintiff called upon him at his place of business concerning the purchase of certain lumber. Fifield informed plaintiff that he had a carload of the character of lumber desired, and they then proceeded to discuss the price and terms of sale. These they agreed upon. The alleged sale consisted of 25,000 feet of manufactured lumber at the price of $38.50 per 1000 feet. This agreement between plaintiff and Fifield was entirely oral. They then discussed the terms of payment, but the record is not clear that any definite arrangement was agreed upon between them upon this subject. Plaintiff testified that he was willing to pay in the usual way—80 to 90 per cent. after receipt of the bill of lading. Whatever these terms might be, they were acceptable to Fifield. Upon concluding these arrangements Fifield forwarded a memorandum of the agreement, signed by himself, to defendant. Both plaintiff and defendant testified that the order was sent to defendant for confirmation. Upon receiving the order defendant company refused to accept the same unless plaintiff would agree to honor a sight draft in payment of the lumber, and so advised Fifield. Plaintiff would not agree to these terms, and nothing was further done in the matter.

We have examined the record carefully, but we fail to find any evidence which shows that Fifield had any authority to complete a sale for the account of defendant. On the contrary, it affirmatively appears without contradiction that he was a mere soliciting agent employed to obtain orders, which were subject to the approval of the company, and for which, when accepted, he received a commission. This being so, he had no power to bind defendant, and, if his act could be construed as an attempt to do so, it was without authority.

The conclusion we have reached makes it unnecessary to discuss the various questions arising under the statute of frauds relating to the sufficiency of the memorandum made by Fifield.

The judgment is reversed.

WAGNER v. MEINZER. (Civ. 3823.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 9, 1921.)

1 Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Findings based on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Findings of trial court on conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed on appeal.

2. Adverse possession ⇨90—Payment of taxes on land described sufficient establishment of title to overlap by adverse possession.

The payment of taxes on land assessed according to description in a deed is a payment of taxes on land included in an overlap, for the purpose of establishing a title thereto by adverse possession.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1170(3)—Misstatements in pleadings held harmless.

Inaccuracy in stating facts in answer and cross-complaint in ejectment suit were harmless, and a reversal could not be had of a judgment in favor of the defendant where all the facts proven were beyond dispute, and were within the knowledge of both parties before the trial, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1097(1)—Decision on former appeal law of case.

The decision of a case on appeal is the law of the case on a subsequent appeal, where the facts are substantially unchanged, except that on the second trial there was a conflict in the evidence on a question which on the first appeal was admitted, which conflict was resolved by the trial court in favor of the party that prevailed on the prior appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Anna M. Wagner against Gottlieb Meinzer. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 189 Pac. 435.

Fabius F. Finch and Paul F. Fratessa, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Carl W. Mueller, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an action in ejectment to recover possession of about 7 feet 10 inches of land on Nebraska street, San Francisco, together with damages for its retention. The judgment was in favor of the defendant, from which the plaintiff appeals.

[1] This is the second trial of the action. Upon the first trial, judgment was in favor of plaintiff, defendant appealed, and the judgment was reversed. The opinion of Division 1 of this court upon the former appeal appears in 38 Cal. App. 670, 177 Pac. 293. From the statement of facts in the opinion upon the former appeal, it would seem that the facts shown are substantially the same upon both appeals. The additional testimony upon this appeal is stated by appellant to be the testimony of Jacob Corinson, called by plaintiff in rebuttal, but this negative testimony at best raises a conflict in the evidence which was resolved against the plaintiff by the trial court, and cannot be disturbed here. It would therefore appear that there is no substantial difference in the record upon the two appeals which would change the rule of law announced by the court upon the former appeal.

[2] Appellant also urges that, because the defendant paid taxes upon land assessed in the manner described in his deed, and not upon land assessed in accordance with the proper description of the land actually occupied by him, he has not complied with the statutory rule with reference to payment of taxes upon land held adversely. That contention is fully met by the case of Price et al. v. De Reyes, 161 Cal. 484, 119 Pac. 893, where it was held that as a division line, established as in the present case, attaches itself to the deeds of the respective coterminous owners, and defines the lands described in each deed, so that the one in possession of the overlap holds title thereto by the same tenure as he holds the lands technically embraced in the description, the payment of the taxes on the land assessed according to such description is a payment of taxes on the land included in the overlap, for the purpose of establishing a title thereto by adverse possession.

[3] The only other matter deserving attention is with reference to the pleadings. Counsel for appellant has most ably made the most of every possible technical argument on this point. It is true the defendant, in his answer and cross-complaint, has opened the way to these objections by reason of certain errors in descriptions, and other inaccuracies in stating the facts, as they were developed without controversy, by the evidence. However, there are two answers to appellant's objections. One is, that the defendant would have been entitled to amend to conform to the proof, and there is no claim that such an amendment would have taken the plaintiff by surprise. On the contrary, it is perfectly clear that all the facts proven are beyond dispute, and were within the knowledge of both parties before the trial. Therefore, no prejudice was suffered by appellant on this account. The other answer to these objections is that the record presents essentially the type of case to which section 4½ of article 6 of our Constitution was intended to apply. It is apparent from the entire record that substantial justice has been done between the parties, except for the fact that the defendant has been done an injustice in being subjected to this needless second appeal upon a record substantially the same as the one previously passed upon in his favor by the appellate court, and by the Supreme Court in its denial of a hearing of the case.

[4] The decision of this case upon the former appeal is the law of this case, because the facts are substantially unchanged, the difference being that on the present appeal there is a conflict upon a question which on the former appeal was admitted, but that conflict was resolved by the trial court in favor of the defendant.

The judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 4, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 4, 1921.)

1. Evidence ☞13—Common knowledge that live stock may tramp out alfalfa.

It is a matter of common knowledge that alfalfa may be tramped out or damaged by live stock when land is not wet.

2. Landlord and tenant ☞105—Lease held to entitle lessor to cancel for damage to alfalfa.

A lessor might forfeit where lessee breached covenant not to turn live stock upon alfalfa when land was wet, although the lessor under the lease had the option of requiring the lessee to reseed.

3. Landlord and tenant ☞105—Notice to lessee to keep stock off of wet alfalfa held unnecessary before forfeiture.

A notice to surrender possession was not insufficient because it did not require the performance of lessee's covenant to keep his stock off of alfalfa land while wet, since the performance of the covenant was impossible in so far as past breaches were concerned, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1161.

4. Landlord and tenant ☞105—Lease held properly cancelled for breach of covenant.

In action to cancel lease because of breach by lessee of a covenant not to permit live stock to go upon alfalfa land while wet, held that a forfeiture was properly granted as against an objection that the injury caused by the breach was capable of compensation in damages under Civ. Code, § 3275, lessee having willfully refused to comply with such covenant.

5. Appeal and error ☞1170(3)—Use in pleading of term rental value instead of damages held not prejudicial.

In an action by lessor to cancel lease, held that plaintiff's use in his complaint of the term "rental value," rather than the word "damages," was harmless in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1174, and Const. art. 6, § 4½.

6. Landlord and tenant ☞286—No adjudication of future damages.

Civ. Code, § 3283, providing that damages may be awarded for detriment certain to result in the future, does not authorize a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to cancel a lease in addition to past damages, "the further sum of $4.05 per day for each day hereafter during the time that defendant occupies said premises."

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by William Pfitzer and another against A. S. Candeias. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

L. C. Pistolesi, of San Francisco (O. F. Meldon, of Sacramento, of counsel), for appellant.

F. W. Henderson, of Merced, for respondent.

FINCH, J. Plaintiffs were given judgment, under the provisions of section 1174 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the cancellation of their lease of certain premises to the defendant, on account of his breach of one of the covenants thereof, and for damages to the lands leased and those occasioned by the unlawful withholding thereof after the default of which complaint is made.

The defendant was in possession of the premises under a lease for the term of five years from the 1st day of January, 1918. A large part of the lands leased was in alfalfa. By the terms of the lease the defendant agreed "to keep all stock off the alfalfa land when the same is wet." The lease further provided:

"If default shall be made in any of the covenants herein contained, that it shall be lawful for the said parties of the first part to re-enter said premises, and to remove all persons therefrom."

From evidence in which there was a substantial conflict, the court found:

"That said defendant * * * has failed and refused to keep his said stock off of said alfalfa land when the same was wet; that said defendant suffered and allowed his stock, consisting of dairy cattle in large numbers, to run upon the land seeded to alfalfa upon said premises while the same was wet; that on numerous occasions in the year 1920, prior to the filing of the complaint in said action and the service of the notice requiring possession as hereinafter found, said defendant suffered and allowed his said stock to run upon the land in alfalfa so leased to him while the said land was wet; that there was a good stand of alfalfa upon not less than 45 acres thereof; that, by reason of its being wet, cattle pasturing thereon bogged into same, tracked it up and injured and destroyed to a great extent the alfalfa growing thereon."

The lease provided that—

"In the event that any of the alfalfa is tramped out or damaged by stock, said second party agrees to reseed the same at his own cost and expense."

[1, 2] Appellant contends that—

"The idea that a forfeiture was intended to result from the mere circumstance of stock going upon the alfalfa land when wet is negated by the provision requiring the lessee to reseed such land."

It is a matter of common knowledge, however, that alfalfa may be "tramped out or damaged" by live stock when the land is not wet. Therefore the provision requiring reseeded can be given effect independent of its application to injuries of the character charged. Doubtless the lessors could have waived the forfeiture and required the lessee to reseed the land, but they were not limited to the latter remedy. The lessee expressly covenanted "to keep all stock off of the alfalfa land when the same is wet," and that his breach of "any of the covenants" should work a forfeiture. Under the findings of the court, he willfully refused to comply with his agreement, and the choice of remedy for the breach is not with him, but with the lessors.

[3] Appellant urges that the notice to surrender possession was insufficient, because it "did not require of him the performance of his covenant to keep his stock off of the alfalfa land while wet." The contention is without merit. Manifestly the performance of the covenant was then impossible in so far as past breaches were concerned. Section 1161, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that, where performance of a covenant is no longer possible, demand for the performance thereof is not required. Schnittger v. Rose, 139 Cal. 656, 73 Pac. 449; Zucco v. Farullo, 37 Cal. App. 562, 174 Pac. 929; Mathews v. Digges, 188 Pac. 283.

[4] It is next contended that it was error to declare a forfeiture of the lease, because, it is argued, the injury caused by the breach was capable of compensation in damages, citing section 3275, Civil Code. That section provides:

"Whenever, by the terms of an obligation, a party thereto incurs a forfeiture, or a loss in the nature of a forfeiture, by reason of his failure to comply with its provisions, he may be relieved therefrom, upon making full compensation to the other party, except in case of a grossly negligent, willful, or fraudulent breach of duty."

In the case of Parsons v. Smilie, 97 Cal. 647, 32 Pac. 702, it is said that the word "willful," as used in section 3275, means "voluntary" or "intentional" and does not imply a malicious breach. The opinion further states that—

"The authorities clearly show that the cases where compensation has been allowed were * * * where, as was said by Chief Justice Redfield, it would not be necessary to send the issue of the amount of damages either to a jury or masters, before the court could grant relief. In Wafer v. Mocato, 9 Mod. 112, it was said: 'For this court never relieves but in such cases * * * where there is some rule to be the measure of such damages, to avoid being arbitrary.'" premises"—and as so modified, the judgment is affirmed, neither party to recover costs of appeal.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

[5] The plaintiffs were given judgment for the amount due as rent up to the time the judgment was rendered at the rate of \$4.05 a day, being $\frac{1}{365}$ part of the annual rental provided for in the lease. The answer alleges "that the rental value of said premises is no more than is mentioned in said lease." Conceding that under the provisions of section 1174, Code of Civil Procedure, a judgment for rent, as such, is authorized only in case of default in payment of rent, that section provides for the assessment of damages occasioned by the unlawful detainer, and the minimum damages in such a case is the rental value of the premises. In this case the plaintiffs alleged that the rental value was \$6 a day, and prayed for judgment at that rate. The defendant did not demur to the complaint, but alleged that the rental value was what the court found it to be. The case was tried upon the theory that the rental value was an issue, and it would be substituting form for substance to hold on appeal that the judgment must be reversed on the purely technical ground that the term "rental value" was employed rather than the word "damages." In the absence of other damages shown, the rental value of the premises was the measure of damages, and it is not perceived in what manner the appellant could have suffered prejudice by the use of the one term rather than the other. It is a clear case for the application of the rule prescribed by section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

[6] The court rendered judgment for "the further sum of $4.05 per day for each day hereafter during the time that defendant occupies said premises." Respondents contend that this part of the judgment is authorized by the provision of section 3283, Civil Code, that damages may be awarded "for detriment * * * certain to result in the future." In cases of this character, a defendant may hold possession, under certain conditions, pending appeal. It may be months, or even years, before the defendant is required to surrender possession. It does not appear by what means the court can determine what damages are "certain to result in the future." The value of the use and occupation may be greater or less than at the time of the trial. No statute or decision has been cited, and none has been found, which would authorize a judgment of the character rendered for future damages.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom the following: "And for the further sum of $4.05 per day for each day hereafter during the time that defendant occupies said

WALL v. HUNTER. (L. A. 6623.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 13, 1921.
Rehearing Denied Oct. 13, 1921.)

1. Wills ⚡159—Undue influence must operate at time of execution.

Undue influence which will invalidate a will must operate upon the mind of the testator at the time of its execution.

2. Wills ⚡286—Failure to deny undue influence held immaterial.

In a proceeding to revoke probate of a will for undue influence, where executor answered, but heirs charged with undue influence, and cited as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1328, did not answer, failure of heirs to answer the charge of undue influence did not relieve contestant from proving all material allegations put in issue by the executor.

3. Wills ⚡283—Denial of evidentiary matters unnecessary in proceeding to revoke probate.

In proceeding for revocation of probate of a will for undue influence, it was not necessary to deny allegations of matters of an evidentiary nature, such as the fact that defendants had at previous times secured property from the testator without consideration, and by the exercise of undue influence, it being sufficient that the answer specifically denied each and every allegation of exercise of undue influence upon the testator at the time of or in connection with the execution of the will.

4. Wills ⚡166(5)—Gift of small amount to wife not substantial evidence of undue influence.

A will leaving only $100 to wife was not of itself sufficient evidence of undue influence.

5. Jury ⚡70(8)—Special venire discretionary.

Court has discretion to order a special venire as provided in Code Civ. Proc. § 226, notwithstanding that there are sufficient names in the term trial jury box.

6. Appeal and error ⚡231(1)—Defect in order for venire not considered where not pointed out.

Error of the court in an order directing sheriff to summon 24 good and lawful "men" of the county, whereas, by reason of the amendment to Code Civ. Proc. § 226, by St. 1917, p. 1284, the venire should have required the summoning of good and lawful "persons," will not be considered on appeal where the objection was not specifically pointed out to the trial court.

7. Jury ⚡115—No right to challenge panel in civil case.

The right to challenge the entire panel exists in criminal cases (Pen. Code, §§ 1055, 1064), but in civil cases the right of challenge is confined to the individual juror (Code Civ. Proc. § 601).

8. Jury ⚡70(11)—Sheriff, because of relations with attorney, not disqualified to summon a special venire.

In a proceeding to revoke probate of a will, sheriff was not disqualified to summon a special venire by reason of the fact that one of the attorneys in the case who was charged with undue influence was also an attorney for a corporation of which the sheriff was a director, and there was no basis for a challenge to the entire panel, even if such a challenge was permissible in a civil case, as in a criminal case (Code Civ. Proc. § 602, Pen. Code, § 1064).

9. Wills ⚡350—Judgment for revocation of probate after reciting verdict for defendant should have formally denied petition.

A judgment against petitioner in a proceeding for revocation of probate of a will, which, after stating that the jury "duly rendered their verdict in favor of defendant," decreed that the executor recover his costs from plaintiff, was erroneous, as not formally denying the petition, but the petitioner was not injured by the omission.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Hugh H. Craig, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Thomas D. Wall, deceased. Proceeding by Sarah J. Wall, surviving wife, against J. George Hunter, executor, for revocation of probate of will. From a judgment sustaining the will, the wife appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 199 Pac. 775.

D. B. Chapin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Adair & Winder, of Riverside, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is an appeal by the surviving wife from a judgment sustaining a will in a proceeding for the revocation of the probate of a will instituted by her. The grounds of contest were undue influence and insanity. The issue of insanity was submitted to the jury, and a verdict was rendered in favor of the respondent, sustaining the will. As no substantial evidence of insanity was produced, the verdict of the jury holding the decedent to be sane is not attacked by appellant. The issue of undue influence was withdrawn from the jury on motion of the executor on the ground that there was not sufficient proof of undue influence to go to the jury, and this order withdrawing such issue appellant claims to be erroneous.

[1] The will is charged to have been secured by undue influence of John J. Wall, a brother of the testator, and Eliza Smith and Ann McLennan, sisters of the testator, and J. George Hunter and A. H. Winder, who were nominated as executors of the will, and were subscribing witnesses thereto. A. H. Winder was consulted by the deceased as his attorney and drew the will in that capacity. J. George Hunter had nothing to do with the execution of the will except to act as witness thereto at the request of the testator. There is no evidence that either of these parties exercised any influence whatever over the testator in connection with the execution of the will. There is no evidence whatever that the brother or sisters in any manner participated in or had anything to do with, or exercised any influence over or held any communication, with the testator in relation to the execution of the will. Undue influence must operate upon the mind of the testator at the time of the execution of the will. Not only is there no evidence of the exercise of influence at or about the time of the execution of the will, but also there is no evidence that at any time any of the parties charged with the exercise of undue influence, other than the attorney who prepared the will, ever addressed themselves in any manner directly or indirectly to the deceased in relation to the execution of the will in question, or any other will, and there is no evidence that the attorney exercised any undue influence over the testator. It follows that the order of the court withdrawing the issue of undue influence from the jury was proper.

[2] However, before leaving this branch of the case, we will state in a general way the position of the appellant, the plaintiff in the court below, and indicate the answer to her contentions. First. The appellant relies upon the fact that certain allegations of her petition were not denied by some of the heirs charged with undue influence. The situation in that regard is as follows: Upon the filing of the plaintiff's petition for the revocation of the will a citation was issued and served as required by section 1328, Code of Civil Procedure, directed to the executor of the will and to all the legatees and devisees mentioned in the will and heirs residing in the state, requiring them to appear and show cause why the probate of the will should not be revoked. The only answer filed to the petition was that of the executor, which he filed on behalf of himself and all other persons who had appeared in the proceeding. The answer of the executor denied the allegation of the petition now relied upon by the appellant in support of her claim that undue influence was established, but she contends that the failure of the heirs charged with undue influence to deny the allegations of the petition amounted to an admission of the truth of such allegation. This claim, and others based upon it, may be dismissed from further consideration upon calling attention to the fact that, as between the executor and the plaintiff, the facts alleged and relied upon by the plaintiff were put in issue, and that therefore the failure of the heirs to deny such allegations is of no significance whatever. The plaintiff could not secure the revocation of the will without overcoming all of the opposition to such revocation, and this required her to prove all the petitioner's material allegations put in issue by the executor.

[3] The answer of the executor directly denied the allegation of insanity, and directly denied the exercise of undue influence by any of the parties charged therewith. The petition alleged many matters of an evidentiary nature, such, for instance, as the fact that some of the brothers and sisters had at previous times secured property from the testator without consideration, and by the exercise of undue influence. It was not necessary to deny these evidentiary matters, and the failure to do so did not admit such evidence where the answer specifically denied each and every allegation of the exercise of undue influence upon the testator at the time of or in connection with the execution of the will in question. Racouillat v. Rene, 32 Cal. 450; Wormouth v. Hatch, 33 Cal. 121; Jones v. City of Petaluma, 36 Cal. 230, 233. For this reason we will not enter into a detailed consideration or discussion of the facts claimed to have been admitted. Most of these, however, were formally and specifically denied for lack of information and belief by respondent.

[4] It is claimed that the will itself is evidence of undue influence, because of its unnatural character. It is true that the will left only $100 to the wife, but in view of the fact that she alleges that decedent had already begun one action for divorce against her, and contemplated another, it is not surprising that she was not left a larger amount. Letters by the testator, written long before the will was executed, make it plain that he had no affection or regard for his wife. The will was not unnatural under the circumstances; but, even if it was, this alone could not only justify a verdict based upon undue influence. The evidence, considered without the facts erroneously claimed by the appellant to be admitted by the pleadings, falls so far short of constituting substantial or sufficient evidence of undue influence to be presented to the jury that we refrain from further discussion thereof.

The appellant relies upon other alleged errors for a reversal, and we proceed to a consideration of those which merit discussion. Plaintiff made a motion for a judgment on the pleadings. In view of the fact that all material facts were put in issue by the answer, the motion was properly denied.

[5] Plaintiff made a motion that the case be tried by a jury drawn from the trial jury box. This motion was denied, and the trial court ordered a special venire, no jury being in attendance or drawn. It is shown by affidavit that at the time the motion was made, and at the time of trial, there were 250 names in the term trial jury box, properly placed therein. The better practice is to use jurors whose names are drawn from the term trial jury box. People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 354, 360, 75 Pac. 1093. It is well established, however, that the court had discretion to order a special venire, as provided in section 226, Code of Civil Procedure, notwithstanding the fact that there are sufficient names in the term trial jury box, People v. Suesser, supra; Perkins v. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co., 155 Cal. 712, 103 Pac. 190, and cases there cited. The denial of petitioner's motion was within the discretion of the trial court.

At the time of trial the plaintiff challenged the jury panel upon the following grounds: First, that the panel was not drawn according to law; second, that the panel was not drawn in compliance with plaintiff's demand heretofore made—that it was not summoned to attend forthwith as required by section 226, Code of Civil Procedure; and, third, that the sheriff was disqualified to act.

[6] The order for a special venire was erroneous, for the reason that it directed the sheriff to summon 24 good and lawful men of the county, whereas, by reason of the amendment of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 1284) to said section 226, Code of Civil Procedure, the venire should have required the summoning of good and lawful persons. This objection, however, was not specifically pointed out to the trial court, and would, no doubt, have been corrected had the specific objection been made; and therefore we will not consider the objection upon appeal.

[7, 8] The contention that the sheriff was disqualified to summon a jury, was based upon the fact that Mr. Winder, one of the attorneys in the case who was charged with undue influence, was also an attorney for a corporation of which the sheriff was a director. This was insufficient to show disqualification. The right to challenge the entire panel exists in criminal cases (sections 1055, 1064, Pen. Code), but in civil cases the right of challenge is confined to the individual juror (section 601, Code Civ. Proc.); moreover, the basis of the challenge would have been insufficient even if such a challenge was permissible in a civil case as in a criminal case (Code Civ. Proc. § 602; Pen. Code, § 1064).

[9] Appellant complains of the form of judgment which, after stating that the jury "duly rendered their verdict in favor of defendant," decrees that the executor recover his costs from plaintiff. The judgment should have formally denied the petition for the revocation of the probate of the will, but we cannot see that the appellant is injured by the failure to expressly deny her petition.

The appellant objects to the exclusion of certain evidence offered to prove undue influence. The evidence is set out in the transcript. It is unnecessary to consider in detail its admissibility, for the reason that giving to it all the probative value claimed for it by the appellant, it is insufficient, together with all other evidence produced by the appellant, to justify the submission of the issue of undue influence to the jury.

All other alleged errors claimed by the appellant are either disposed of by what has already been stated or are too trivial to merit discussion.

Judgment affirmed.

CHAMBERS, State Controller, v. HATHAWAY et al. (L. A. 6183.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 16, 1921.)

1. Domicile ⇨4(2)—Domicile a question of intent.

Where a person has two dwellings in different places and resides a part of his time in one place and a part of the time in another alternatively, the question which of the two places is his legal residence is almost altogether a question of his intent, under Pol. Code, § 52.

2. Domicile ⇨10—Registration affidavit held to constitute declaration as to residence.

An affidavit, made by one registering as a voter, stating his residence to be at a certain place within the state, constituted a declaration that at that time his legal residence was at such place.

3. Evidence ⇨75—Failure to introduce records raised inference that property was not taxed in state.

In action tried in Los Angeles by state controller to recover inheritance taxes, where records of taxation were at hand but were not introduced in evidence, an inference arises, that there was no record of any taxation of decedent's choses in action at such place, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 6.

4. Taxation ⇨867(1)—Finding that decedent was resident of state not supported by evidence.

In an action by state controller to recover inheritance taxes, a finding that decedent was a legal resident of the state at the time of his death held unsupported by the evidence.

5. Taxation ⇨900(5) — Decree determining taxability of property of decedent held appealable.

A decree in a special proceeding by state controller under Inheritance Tax Act, § 17, determining that the property of decedent's estate was subject to inheritance tax, was appealable under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 1; subsequent appraisal and collection of the tax being merely the process of enforcement of the judgment so given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

Proceeding for collection of inheritance tax by John S. Chambers, as controller of the State of California, against Julia A. Hathaway and another. From a decree in favor of the controller, the named defendant appeals. Reversed.

Anderson & Anderson, of Los Angeles, and W. W. Wight, of Milwaukee, Wis., for appellant.

John W. Carrigan and Edwin H. Pennock, both of Los Angeles (James L. Atteridge and Robert A. Waring, both of Sacramento, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is a proceeding by the state controller, under the inheritance tax act, for the collection of inheritance tax alleged to be due upon the estate of Frederick N. Finney, deceased. Julia A. Hathaway is interested in said estate as one of the executors of the will of said decedent under an appointment by the court of probate in the state of Wisconsin, and also as a beneficiary under his will. She alone has appealed from the decree of the court below in favor of the controller.

The complaint alleges that Finney died the owner of notes, bonds, and stocks of the value of $138,300, and other property, and that at the time of his death he was a resident of Los Angeles county, Cal. The answer denied the allegations as to the residence of the decedent and averred that at the time of his death he was a resident of Milwaukee, Wis. Upon this issue the court below decided in favor of the plaintiff. The sole point for consideration upon this appeal is the question whether the decision on that issue is supported by substantial evidence.

The rules for determining the place of residence of a person are thus stated in the Political Code (section 52):

"Every person has, in law, a residence. In determining the place of residence the following rules are to be observed:

"(1) It is the place where one remains when not called elsewhere for labor or other special or temporary purpose, and to which he returns in seasons of repose;

"(2) There can only be one residence;

"(3) A residence cannot be lost until another is gained; * * *

"(7) The residence can be changed only by the union of act and intent."

Clauses 4, 5, and 6 of the above section have no application to the present case.

[1] Where a person has two dwellings in different places and resides a part of his time in one place and a part of the time in another alternatively, the question which of the two places is his legal residence is almost altogether a question of his intent.

"If a party has two residences, that will be esteemed his domicile which he himself selects or deems to be his home, or which appears to be the center of his affairs, or where he votes or exercises the rights and duties of a citizen." 9 Rul. Case Law, 558.

See, also, 19 Cor. Jur. p. 401.

Upon the trial in the lower court the parties stipulated that Finney was and had been a resident of the state of Wisconsin for many years prior to 1907, and that from that time until his death on March 13, 1916, he passed a part of each year in South Pasadena, Cal., and a part of each year in Milwaukee and the East, usually spending from October or November to May or June in South Pasadena and the remainder of the time in Milwaukee and the East. The evidence shows that he built a house of 14 rooms in Milwaukee, Wis., in the year 1884 for his permanent dwelling, and that he continuously maintained that house, having therein three or more servants and all of his furniture and a large number of curios and other articles which he had collected in his numerous travels; that his wife died in 1899, and that thereafter during the remainder of his life his son and family remained in the house with him and took care of the same, but that he paid all the expenses of the establishment; that when in Milwaukee he lived in that house. Upon coming to California in the fall of 1907 he rented a furnished house for the winter and lived in it with a Miss Renold, who had been his housekeeper in Wisconsin. In 1908 he came again and rented a furnished house, which was kept for him by Miss Renold. During that visit, some time in 1909, she purchased a house in which she continued to reside thereafter until her death in August, 1915. During his subsequent sojourns in California he lived in her house. In 1912, because of her financial distress, he purchased the house from her and continued to own the same until his death.

It is apparent, therefore, that the facts make a case where a person has two residences, either of which might be his lawful residence, according to his intention, and that the question which one was his lawful residence at the time of his death depends altogether upon his intention regarding them. Under the rule above stated, if his intent was to have his Milwaukee home as his residence, that was the place of residence at his death. If his intent was to make his California house his lawful residence, that was his lawful residence at the time of his death.

We think it must be conceded that upon all the facts in the case his intent, so far as it is to be deduced from his acts and conduct, shows that the Milwaukee residence was his real home. It was a large establishment, he had built and kept it for a permanent home, he requested his son and wife to live in it and keep it for his use, and he had paid the expenses of maintaining it, even purchasing a farm near the city, on which a tenant lived, who produced milk and vegetables for the family use. His business headquarters were in Milwaukee. He kept safe-deposit boxes there in which he stored all his stocks and bonds and other valuable papers. His son or his secretary had access thereto and in his absence they cut off the coupons from the bonds, received the dividends on his stocks, and deposited the same to his bank account in Milwaukee banks. He kept in a California bank only such funds as were required for his expenses while living there. All of his investments were made from Milwaukee and during his absences the business was carried on by his son and secretary. He had a safe-deposit box in California, but kept there only such papers as he desired to have with him while he remained away from his main place of business. Under the circumstances of the case, the fact that he lived in California during the greater portion of each year is of no substantial significance with respect to the question of his intent. 19 Cor. Jur. p. 403. The evidence shows that in 1907 he decided to spend the winters in California because the severity of the winters in Wisconsin was detrimental to his health and comfort in his declining years. It was for this reason he came and for this reason that he continued to come yearly thereafter. The fact that he rented houses in California and that he brought and kept there during his stay his two driving horses and that he also had an automobile there was of small significance, considering his wealth and station. He was a man who was given to travel, even in his later years. In the year 1912, being then of the age of 80, he spent two months traveling in Europe. His last illness occurred while he and his daughter were on a trip to Honolulu, and he died in San Francisco shortly after his return therefrom. All these circumstances go to indicate that his sojourn in California was not in pursuance of a design to change his former residence.

The only direct evidence of his intent on the subject is found in certain declarations shown to have been made by him. That upon which the plaintiff relies, and which is practically the only one favorable to the plaintiff, was a declaration made by him on May 13, 1912, for the purpose of registering as a voter in South Pasadena, Los Angeles county, Cal. In that affidavit he stated that his place of residence was in South Pasadena and that he "will have resided in this state one year, and in said county ninety days and in said precinct thirty days next preceding the next ensuing election, and will be an elector of said county at the next succeeding election." The affidavit contains blank forms for noting whether or not the person voted at any election thereafter. The record shows no entries indicating any vote by Finney.

[2, 3] This affidavit constitutes a declaration by Finney that at that time his residence was in South Pasadena, and it must be understood as a declaration that that was his legal residence at that time. If it had remained unexplained by him and there was no other evidence of a subsequent change of intention, this, of course, would be sufficient to uphold the finding of the court. The decedent, however, subsequently explained the reason for this registration and stated that he had decided not to change his residence to California, and the record contains abundant evidence that thereafter he had the fixed intent to be a resident of Milwaukee, Wis. Afterwards, in that same year of 1912, during a trip to Europe with an old friend, speaking of his house in Milwaukee, he said that he thought its value would not then exceed $45,000; that Milwaukee was his home, and that during his lifetime he had no disposition to give up that home or dispose of that residence. In December of 1913, his son, John, had written to him, and in reply he wrote from South Pasadena, December 18th, saying:

"I did intend taking citizenship here last year but their politics were so bad that I concluded not to do so. * * * I have decided not to change my residence."

In March, 1915, he purchased some land in Hennepin county, Minn., and he desired to have the title thereto registered under the law of Minnesota. He made an application therefor, duly sworn to in accordance with that law, in which he stated that his residence was No. 34 Prospect avenue, city of Milwaukee, county of Milwaukee, state of Wisconsin. In October of that year he executed two deeds for his two lots in California, in each of which he recited that his residence was Milwaukee, Wis. In the summer of 1915 one of his old friends, who at that time lived in California visited Finney in Milwaukee at his residence there. To him Finney said that he had always kept his house in Milwaukee open and intended to do so as long as he lived. In March, 1915, he executed his last will and therein recited that he was "of the city of Milwaukee in the state of Wisconsin." His will contained provisions for charitable bequests of more than one-third of his estate, and which, as to the excess, would have been void if executed in California, and with respect to the personal property which attends the person would have been ineffective as a disposition thereof if his residence was in California. This will was drawn by an attorney. It was discussed by him with the testator for several weeks before its execution. The attorney stated to him that the bequests made in the will of more than one-third of the estate to eleemosynary institutions would be in conflict with the California law if California was his residence, and thereupon Finney stated positively and repeatedly that he was a resident of Milwaukee and had always maintained his home there and that his California house was merely for his use in winter. If he had been a resident of California during these years, it would have been his duty in giving in his list of property in California to have included therein all his choses in action, and they appear to have been of great value. The evidence shows that this property was taxed regularly every year in Wisconsin and there is no evidence of any taxation thereof in California. As the case was tried in Los Angeles, Cal., where the records of such taxation were at hand, an inference arises that, since no evidence was given, no record of that character existed. Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 6.

[4] This constitutes clear and convincing evidence that whatever his design may have been at the time he registered for voting in California in 1912, he afterwards formed a decided intention to retract that decision and to have his residence at his old home in Milwaukee. As he was repeatedly present in that home, using it as a residence after the year 1912, the union of act and intent as required by our Political Code was sufficiently manifested thereby, and his residence in Milwaukee, Wis., was thereby established. There is no contradiction whatever of this evidence as to the subsequent intent and we deem it to be conclusive on the subject. The court below should have held that at the time of his death he was a resident of the city of Milwaukee, Wis., and not of the state of California.

[5] We think there is no doubt of the right to appeal from the decision in a case of this character. The Code authorizes an appeal from a final judgment in any special proceeding. Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 1. Section 17 of the Inheritance Tax Act (Stats. 1913, p. 1078) authorizes the state controller to institute a special proceeding for the determination of the liability to taxation under the act of any property which has been transferred, in cases where there is no proceeding pending in any court of this state, wherein the taxable character of such property could be determined, and it provides that in such a proceeding there may be a contest by persons interested in the property transferred, and that the court thereupon may determine whether or not the property is subject to such tax. The act (section 1) defines the word "transfer," and as so defined it includes the passing of property by will. The petition of the state controller stated the facts which bring the proceeding within the class thus authorized. The determination of the question whether or not the property is subject to the tax is the principal object to be accomplished by the proceeding. The decree or judgment on that subject is the final judgment sought. The act in effect provides that if such judgment is against the controller the proceeding is terminated absolutely. If it is in his favor, the act provides that the court must so adjudge. The status of the property as property subject to taxation in this state is thereby finally determined, and section 17 declares that in that event "the same shall be appraised and taxed as in other cases." The subsequent appraisal and collection of the tax are merely the process of enforcement of the judgment so given. In such cases the right of appeal is given by section 963 aforesaid.

The judgment is reversed.

NORTHWESTERN MUT. FIRE ASS'N v.
PACIFIC WHARF & STORAGE CO.
(L. A. 6117.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 13, 1921.)

1. Pleading ⚡434—Objection that defense not specifically pleaded not considered on appeal where evidence introduced without objection, and court found on such issue.

In an action by an insurer to recover the amount paid by it under a policy insuring lumber deposited on defendant's wharf, though the defense that defendant was relieved from liability under a contract with the owners of the lumber, whereby the deposit thereof was accepted subject to the owner's risk, was not expressly raised by the pleadings, objection on such ground will not be considered on appeal where evidence as to such contract was introduced without objection, plaintiff cross-examined the witness as to such agreement, and the trial court specifically found on such issue.

2. Warehousemen ⚡24(7)—Wharves ⚡20(1)—Notice of nonassumption of liability for loss of goods deposited during strike held sufficient to cover loss by fire.

A notice by a wharf and storage company to a lumber company that there would be a strike of longshoremen and wharf handlers on a certain date, after which it would not receive a shipment of lumber except subject to its not assuming any responsibility for delivery, loss, damages, thefts, or other cause of that nature until the strike was over, was sufficient to cover a loss by fire caused by its negligence and the negligence of its employees after the inauguration of such strike in regard to an oil tank on its wharf, and not as a result of the strike; the rule that a bailee or depository cannot restrict his duty to use care in the ordinary course of business (Civ. Code, §§ 1846, 1852, 1858e) not being applicable.

3. Warehousemen ⚡24(6)—Wharves ⚡20(5)—Liability of warehouse man.

A lumber company did not exercise business prudence or ordinary care within Civ. Code, § 1714, in placing lumber on a wharf after notice from the wharf and storage company that, on account of a threatened strike, it would not receive the lumber save on the assumption of risk by the lumber company, which was advised to leave the lumber on board the ship or take it back whence it came.

4. Warehousemen 24(3)—Wharf company not liable as depositary for loss of goods deposited on wharf but not stored by it.

Where a wharf and storage company notified a lumber company that on account of a threatened strike, it would not receive lumber save on the risk of the lumber company, which expressly agreed thereto, and placed lumber on the wharf, where it was burned by the negligence of the wharf and storage company, it was not liable as a depositary, it not having stored the lumber as it intended later to do.

5. Contracts 108(2)—Wharfinger's contract with lumber company that latter assume risk of loss of lumber deposited on wharf during strike held not contrary to public policy.

In contracting with a lumber company that the latter assume liability for the loss of lumber deposited on a wharf during a strike of longshoremen, the wharfinger violated no law against public policy.

6. Warehousemen 24(7) — Wharves 20(1)—Contract that lumber company assume risk as to lumber deposited during strike, being accepted, held not unilateral.

Where a lumber company, after receiving notice from a wharf company that there would be a strike of longshoremen and wharf handlers on a date, after which it would not receive a shipment of lumber except subject to its not assuming any responsibility for loss or damage until the strike was over, rough-piled the lumber on the latter company's wharf, there was not a unilateral contract on the part of the wharfinger, the lumber company by such act having accepted the conditions stated, and affirmatively agreed to relieve the wharf company from all risks.
